If I could indulge the supposition that Dr Kelly was as humble and docile a Christian as Apollos, and as ready to take a hint from The Protestant, as Apollos was to take a lesson from Aquila, the tentmaker, and his wife Priscilla, I would ask the Doctor, who they are whom he speaks of as the innocent youth of his communion? By a little tampering with his Reverence; that is, by a few lessons out of the Bible, I could show him that there are no innocent youth in the world, either in his communion or any other. Does he not know that every imagination of the thought of the heart of man, is evil from his youth up;—evil and only evil continually? (Gen. vi. 5; viii. 21) That all have sinned and come short of the glory of God? (Rom. iii. 23) That, in short, the whole world is guilty before God? (v. 19.) Does a man who professes to be teaching his flock in all wisdom not know this? If he does not, he is a pretty man to make such professions: if he does know it, he must stand convicted of wilfully contradicting the word of God, and misrepresenting the state and character of his flock. In a religious sense, there is no man innocent. All stand guilty before God. Those who believe in Christ are saved from their sins, and from the punishment which they deserve; but they will not speak of themselves as innocent; nor will those who know them call them innocent. They are sinners saved by grace. I most earnestly recommend the consideration of this subject to Dr Kelly, and to every Papist who reads my pages. Let them learn and understand what they all are by nature, and by practice: let them attend to the testimony of Christ, with regard to the way, and the only way by which a sinner becomes just before God, and we shall hear no more of their own innocence or righteousness. If they believe the testimony, they will renounce all trust in the Pope, or the Virgin Mary, or in any fellow-creature, and submit to the righteousness of God, which is by faith in Jesus Christ.

I think British Christians have been much to blame, because they have tampered so little with the religious principles of the poor in Ireland. We have long acted upon the principle avowed by the murderer Cain, who spurned the idea of being his brother's keeper; that is, he considered it none of his business to know where his brother was, or how he was. Christians on this side of the channel were not ignorant of the condition of their brethren in the sister kingdom; but it did not occur to them, at least for a long period, that they had any particular duty to perform towards them. If they be ignorant, superstitious, and idolatrous, let them remain so, seems to have been the general sentiment, for I do not know how long a period. This has now given place to sentiments more congenial to Christianity, and to corresponding exertions, which, by the divine blessing, will, in a few years, give a new character to the Irish population. The benign influence of the Bible has already begun to appear. Had the same efforts been made fifty years ago, the Pope would not, at this day, have had such a hold of the consciences of the Irish people; and it is to be hoped that fifty years hence he will have no hold of them at all.

Why should not this be distinctly avowed as the object and hope of Protestants, and the object of their benevolent exertions? Papists do not hesitate to express their hope, and to labour incessantly to bring Protestants over to their communion. For this purpose they are tampering with the poor people every day. I do not wish to deprive them of this privilege. I would not prevent them from doing what they can, by fair argument, to gain proselytes, if there be such a thing as fair argument among them, which I confess I have never seen or heard of; but I would have our Protestants to equal them in zeal, and to excel them in honesty;—to meet them like Protestants on every point of difference; to tell them, "we believe you are in error, and that you are training up your people in error and idolatry; that we bring to you the Bible, which is the word of God, as you yourselves allow, though you wish to keep it from your people; that we are ready and willing to have our principles tried on this ground alone; that we will exercise no power or authority to compel any man to yield to us, and we require that you exercise no authority or power over the consciences of men, to prevent them from hearing us." I know that Papists will not consent to such a trial of their principles. Their absolute power over the consciences of their people is vigorously exercised to prevent them from coming to such a trial, at the very time that they are making a hue and cry against their Protestant neighbours, who exercise no power whatever, and who pretend to none, but that of persuasion, which, with truth on their side, is sufficient for all their benevolent purposes.

No. LXXXIV.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 19TH, 1820.

"PROSELYTISM," says Dr Kelly, "is the order of the day, and the enemies of our faith, like the serpent, creep and give death under flowers." This will, no doubt, be esteemed a pretty figure of speech; but if I may be allowed to hazard a pun on so grave a subject, I would insinuate that his reverence meant leaves rather than flowers; and it must be confessed, there do lurk under the leaves of the Bible a host of enemies of the faith of Rome.

I do not deny, but explicitly maintain, that what is life to the souls of the Irish people, is death to the cause of Popery among them; and therefore I am not surprised by the strong language of the titular Archbishop. I am, however, a little surprised by the want of discretion which his language exhibits. He is, like all his brethren, no doubt, desirous of what they call emancipation. This is a boon which the more moderate Papists profess to ask from their Protestant brethren; and it must appear to every thinking person a little strange, that those who are asking the favour, should at the same time be busy publishing letters, in which these said brethren are compared to wolves and serpents. But such is the fact; and the leading men among the Irish Papists do not hesitate to speak and publish much worse than this against their Protestant neighbours, and their Protestant government, at the very time that they are preparing their humble petitions for what they call emancipation. Now, I think there is a want of wisdom, or rather a want of cunning, in this, which shows that Dr Kelly and his friends have not been long enough under the tuition of the Jesuits. Our Glasgow Papists understand the subject better; for they speak of Protestants as their Christian brethren, which, however hypocritical, is language more becoming men who are asking the favour of being put upon a footing of civil equality with them. But the language of Dr Kelly, and that of the Pope whose mandate he obeys, suggests the idea of persons asking a favour, and in the same breath reviling, by every opprobrious epithet, the men of whom they ask it:—"Ye heretics, ye schismatics, ye wolves in sheep's clothing, ye serpents, creeping and giving death under flowers, we humbly pray that you will remove all the restraints which you have imposed upon us, and admit us to a free and unfettered participation of all the good things which ye enjoy!" Surely this would be reckoned an odd way of asking a favour; but it is in the true style of the Irish petitions for emancipation, when taken in connection with the representations which the petitioners are ever making of their Protestant neighbours, and even their Protestant rulers.

To show that I am not speaking without book, I refer the reader to another pamphlet by the reverend Mr Thorpe, of Dublin, entitled, "An Address to the Protestants of Great Britian and Ireland, on the subject of Catholic Emancipation.—Third edition, 1815." This author gives a number of extracts from the published speeches and other documents of the Popish orators in Dublin, full of the most scurrilous abuse of all persons connected with the government or legislature, from the king downwards, who have shown the least hesitation about granting the Papists all that they are demanding. Thus the long continued affliction of our late venerable sovereign, and the violent death of his prime minister, Mr Perceval, are both represented as judgments of God upon them for being enemies of "Catholic emancipation." This is indeed the substance of a speech made by a gentleman who passes for a Protestant, but who attends public meetings of the Papists; makes speeches for them, and is best known as their advocate. But the following is from a speech of a real Papist—a barrister, and a leading member of the "Catholic board:"—

"The principle of Mr Pitt's administration," says Mr O'Connell, "was despotism: the principle of Mr Perceval's administration was peculating bigotry—bigotted peculation! In the name of the Lord, he plundered the people. Pious and enlightened statesman! he would take their money only for the good of their souls! The principle of the present administration is still more obvious. It has unequivocally disclosed itself in all their movements. It is simple and single—it consists in falsehood! Falsehood is the bond and link which connects this ministry in office. Some of them pretend to be our friends: you know it is not true. They are only our worse enemies for their hypocrisy." P. 7.

It is not consistent with my plan to discuss the character of the present or any former ministry; but I have made the above extract to show the inconsistency of the Popish leaders, or rather the absurdity of their conduct in professing to come from year to year to parliament, with a humble petition for emancipation, while they are doing every thing in their power to irritate the leading members of parliament against them; for let it be observed, they are not ministers of the crown alone who are objects of their abuse, nor opposers of emancipation alone who suffer their reviling. These demagogues speak of both friends and foes with equal contempt. Thus one member who stands high in the esteem of every virtuous man in the empire, and who is an advocate of "Catholic emancipation," is described by them as "the place-procuring, pray-mumbling Wilberforce." This, with a number of like things, adduced by Mr Thorpe, excites a suspicion, or rather establishes the fact, that it is not emancipation which our Irish Papists want, but the power of the state in their own hands; and they think it a most likely means to accomplish their object, to represent every man in the government or in the legislature in a most odious light, except a few who are willing to go all lengths with them; and if they, and the Pope, and Dr Kelly, can but convince the people that all the Protestants, from the highest to the lowest, are "wolves" and "serpents," ready to bite and devour them, they will not be far from having accomplished their purpose.

Our Protestant advocates of "Catholic emancipation," speak with great simplicity and good nature, of both sects living together as one family, if all distinctions were done away, and if both were alike eligible to all places of power and trust. I once entertained some such romantic notions, and therefore I cannot be surprised that some persons still entertain them. But Papists themselves have taught me better. The Pope of Rome calls us wolves, and the Popish Archbishop of Tuam compares us to serpents, for no other reason than that we are teaching the poor to read the Bible. Now, supposing the Archbishop and such as he to have power in their hands, they would find it their bounden duty, and it would be their first care, to extirpate the serpents and the wolves. It is not possible that these can live peaceably as one family with the sheep, that is, the faithful, as Papists call themselves; and therefore the shepherds must of necessity destroy them.

"Every possible exertion," says his Holiness, "must be made to keep the youth away from these destructive schools." But if the youth could not be kept away by any exertion while the schools exist, as in some places they cannot, would not the extirpation of the teachers come within the sphere of possible exertions, if Papists had the power, and if nothing else would do?

"Unless," says Dr Kelly, "we establish and support schools for the education of distressed children of our persuasion, the triumph will be eventually complete; the mystery of iniquity will have absorbed the mystery of holiness; and what the cruelty of tyrants would not have completed in this island of saints, will be speedily accomplished by softer means." The "mystery of iniquity," is nothing less than the art of reading the word of God. It is not so easy to express in half a sentence what Dr Kelly means by the "mystery of holiness;" but no doubt it is something which proceeds from him who by way of eminence is called His Holiness; and from what history records of the "man and his communications," and of those of his predecessors for a thousand years, we may guess what sort of thing the holiness is by which his children are distinguished in the "island of saints;" that is, the island of holy persons. The holiness of the children did indeed correspond with that of the father. Of this Dr Kelly bears the most ample and unequivocal testimony. He declares, in words which I gave in my last Number but one, that they were abandoned to all manner of wickedness, particularly drunkenness, sabbath-breaking, and perjury. This witness is true, as every traveller in Ireland knows; but the mystery of iniquity, that is, the reading of the Bible, has got in among them, and the mystery of holiness is in danger of being absorbed, because the people are not now so much given to the things for which they were formerly notorious. Dr Kelly will say that I pervert his meaning: but I say that he perverts the meaning of words, when he applies the term iniquity to the teaching of the Bible, and holiness to the system that opposes it; and it is not the least of the abominations of Popery that it calls good evil, and evil good.

There is such a thing mentioned in the Bible as "the mystery of iniquity;" that is, the secret working of Satan, by the means of human agents, with all deceivableness of unrighteousness, in order to ruin the souls of men. (See 2 Thess. ii. 3—10.) No Protestant needs to be told that this mystery of iniquity has its seat in the Church of Rome. But I do not recollect finding in the Bible, or any where else, except in Dr Kelly's letter, such a phrase as "the mystery of holiness." If he had said the mystery of His Holiness, or even of his Reverence, I might guess what he means; but I can attach no rational meaning to his expression as it stands. The word mystery signifies either something unknown, and which being made known, is a mystery no longer, that is simply a secret; or it signifies something, which, though made known as to its existence, is incomprehensible as to its nature. Take it either way, I do not see what it has to do with holiness, which is neither a secret nor an incomprehensible thing. Christ says, (John iii. 20, 21.) "Every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved." This is "the mystery of iniquity." "But he that doeth truth cometh to the light; that his deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God." This is holiness, but there is no mystery in it. That which is manifest is not mysterious in the sense of a secret; and that which every one can understand (good works for instance) is not incomprehensible.

Be "the mystery of holiness" what it may, we have an explicit admission by the archbishop, that the cause of Popery in Ireland is in danger from the schools and the Bible:— "What the cruelty of tyrants would not have completed in this island of saints, will be speedily effected by softer means." I hope all the societies and all the teachers engaged in the good work will take courage from this plain declaration of an enemy. The soft means of education and persuasion are the only means which can lawfully be used for promoting the knowledge of the true religion, and turning men from error. Dr Kelly admits that these means are likely to be effectual, and that "speedily," for absorbing, that is, I suppose, subverting, what he calls the "mystery of holiness," but which we know to be the mystery of iniquity.

It is, however, a little surprising that Father Kelly should not recommend to his clergy the soft means which he believes to be so effectual in the hands of Protestants. It is surprising that he should make use of such hard words, and recommend, or rather command, such vigorous measures, as are enjoined in the following extract, which he knows to be very different from the means which Protestants use. Why does he not recommend mere persuasion and instruction, since he finds these "softer means" likely to accomplish speedily "what the cruelty of tyrants" could never effect? "As pastors of the Roman Catholic Church," says he, "you must have viewed with indignation and disgust certain puerile and ignoble efforts that have lately been made to diminish our influence, and mar our interference in the religious and moral education and instruction of the youth of our communion; and though we deprecate, as sincerely as any other body of men, any attempt to excite dissension, or to make odious distinctions on account of religion, and have contributed most effectually to preserve the peace of the country, yet it is a duty incumbent on us, and from which we will never shrink, to oppose, collectively and individually, every attempt, however insidious, or from whatever source it may emanate, to tamper with the religious principles of the faithful committed to our care." Again, "Impressed with the sacredness and importance of this obligation, it is incumbent on us, to be vigilant and attentive to the religious and moral education of the people; the attention of the Roman Catholic clergy is to be particularly directed to the schools established in their respective parishes, and they are to exercise their spiritual authority in its full extent, in order to prevent Roman Catholic children from frequenting the schools where the Catholic Catechism is not taught, where Protestant Tracts are introduced, or where the moral conduct or religious principles of the master are exceptionable."

Here is the cruelty of tyrants with a witness! And does Dr Kelly expect, by such rigorous measures as he enjoins upon his clergy, to counteract what Protestants are likely to effect speedily by their softer means? If so, the cruelty of Popish tyrants must be more powerful than that of Protestant ones, as no doubt it is. The spiritual authority of the priests is directed to be exercised in its full extent to prevent the children of Papists from frequenting the Protestant schools. Now we know that this spiritual authority is infinitely greater than that of the most absolute monarch on the face of the earth; and in the full extent of it, it reaches to what Dr Kelly calls (from the Douay version of the New Testament) the day of eternity. We never heard of our Protestant governors inflicting corporal punishment upon those who refused to read the Bible, or who refused to learn to read; but though they had ordered every such obstinate Papist to be hanged, the tyranny of the thing would have fallen infinitely short of that of the priest who exercises the full extent of his spiritual authority to prevent children from going to school, to learn to read the Bible. It is universally admitted that civil governors can only kill the body; but the Popish priests profess to have the power of casting both body and soul into hell.

Now it is a fact that schools have been established in many parts of Ireland, and particularly in that district over which father Kelly professes to have spiritual jurisdiction. It is a fact that children have flocked to those schools with great eagerness, and that parents have encouraged their children to do so, from a conviction that education is the most likely means of promoting their happiness; and Dr Kelly calls upon his priests to prevent this by exercising their spiritual authority to its full extent; that is, by excommunicating, and, of course, consigning to everlasting perdition, not the children only, but also the parents who suffer their children to attend the schools in which the Popish catechism is not taught, and whose teachers they do not approve. Besides, it is well known, that great as the extent of priestly spiritual authority is, by which souls are consigned to perdition, this is not all; for they exercise also a temporal authority, by which one who is excommunicated is deprived of every earthly comfort; his brethren are forbidden to have any intercourse with him; he becomes an outlaw and a vagabond on the earth; and would be left to perish, surrounded by his fellow-creatures, if there were not some of them, who, in spite of the threatenings of their hard-hearted priests, still retain so much of humanity about them as to bestow a morsel of bread to save a fellow-creature alive, even at the risk of being excommunicated for the offence, and being reduced to the state of misery which they were guilty of relieving.

In short, the spiritual authority of the Popish priests, exercised in its full extent, subjects those who fall under their displeasure to all the miseries of this life, and to the pains of hell for ever. This is what Dr Kelly commands his priests to inflict upon all who shall attend, or suffer their children to attend, the schools in which the reading of the Bible is taught. The tyranny and the cruelty are so monstrous that the reader will scarcely believe what he reads; but let any one consider the power which the priests claim over the world to come, the misery which, even in this world, their excommunication inflicts, and the authoritative command of the archbishop, requiring his clergy to exercise this power to its full extent, and he will be convinced that there is nothing of exaggeration in what I have written.

I have been speaking of the power which the priests profess to have over the world to come, and which their blind followers believe them to have. We know that they have no such power; and we know that they cannot hurt the soul of any man who reads his Bible, and who dies in the belief of what it reveals; but since they profess to have the power, and since they make the people believe them, their cruelty and tyranny is as great as if they actually possessed it, and as if they actually exercised it, by casting into hell every Bible reader, and every parent who suffers his child to go to school that he may learn to read it; and to their fiend-like cruelty they add the wickedness of imposing upon the people, by professing to have powers which they never had, and which the Almighty never intrusted to any creature.

Dr Kelly makes a parade of what he and his brethren have done in preserving the peace of the country, though it might be insinuated that the less they said on that subject the better. It is very well known, that the more ostensible men among them make great professions of loyalty, while their subalterns are doing every thing in their power to promote a spirit of disaffection. Besides, the language of both Dr Kelly and his master the Pope, is not such as we would expect from men who are desirous of preserving the peace of the country. Do Papists expect to maintain peace by calling their Protestant neighbours, who are labouring to instruct them, wolves and serpents, and by accusing the government of tyranny, and of a design to extirpate their religion by violence and persecution, which has been abandoned only in some degree? If Ireland is happy enough to enjoy peace with such men in it, it is not in consequence of their exertions, but in spite of them.

Dr Kelly claims for himself and his inferior priests, a power and influence over the people that is inconsistent with their privileges as subjects of the British empire; and he complains of efforts lately made "to diminish our influence, and mar our interference in the religious and moral education of the youth of our communion." Now I ask what right they have to such influence? Let them show from whom they received the grant of an exclusive right to interfere with the education of either young or old. It is certain that they have received no such grant from any authority that is lawfully acknowledged in this country. If they say they have it from the Pope, then I reply that the Pope has given them what was not his own, and what he had no right to give away. I do not refuse them all the influence which their priests may lawfully derive from their talents and personal character, nor the exercise of it by persuasion and fair argument. In short, I would not deny them that influence and right of interference which Protestants have a right to exercise, and which they are exercising for the benefit of the people. But that which Papists claim is avowedly exclusive and arbitrary:—"We will oppose," says Dr Kelly, "collectively and individually, every attempt, however insidious, or from whatever source it may emanate, to tamper with the religious principles of the faithful committed to our care." This tampering, as I have already shown, signifies teaching the word of God; and if Parliament were to pass an Act for establishing schools in every parish in Ireland in which the Bible was to be read, the priests tell us before-hand that they would oppose the measure both collectively and individually. So much for their subjection to the powers that be.

I remark in conclusion, that though this Manifesto against the Bible and the schools in which it is taught, is evidently a commencement of actual hostility on the part of the Papists, against the benevolent efforts of their Protestant neighbours, it has notwithstanding given me great satisfaction. It convinces me that the labours of the teachers have begun to produce the desired effect; that the reading of the Bible has begun to tell upon the sentiments and conduct of the poor people who had formerly been kept in ignorance and bondage by their priests. In short, to use the language of the worthy Bradbury, on another occasion,—"The schools, by means of the Bible, have begun to crush the head of the old serpent in Ireland, and it is not surprising that we should hear the hissing of the generation of vipers."

No. LXXXV.

SATURDAY, February 26th, 1820.

I HAVE done, for the present, with the Pope, and the Popish archbishop of Tuam; but before I proceed to another general subject of discussion, I shall pay my respects to a more obscure son of the church, who has done me the favour of addressing me a letter, which exhibits as fine a specimen of Popish logic as any man would wish to see. This letter has the Newton-Stewart post mark; and it is the only one that I have received direct from the holy church, since I published that of W. D.

"TO THE AUTHOR OF THE PROTESTANT.

"SIR,—I have been favoured with a loan of two or three of your Numbers. In perusing No. 72, it occurred to me as rather strange, that while, with quick-sighted penetrating eye, you could discern, from the circumstance of the poor woman being obliged to pay eight shillings to the Catholic priest for the baptism of her child, &c., that "the good citizens of Glasgow, who," (with so much credit to their pious sentiments) "lately made so bold a stand against being taxed for the purpose of building parish churches, are actually, though indirectly, taxed for the building and support of a Popish chapel," the same sagacity did not discover to you, that the "good citizens of Glasgow," are also actually, though indirectly, taxed for the purpose of purchasing radical flags, Carlile's publications, &c. to those who, notwithstanding, from their own reports, and those of their abettors, are labouring under such distresses, as not to be able to support themselves except by public munificence.

"What are we to infer from this inequality of vision? Are we to conclude that while the author of the Protestant hates Popery, he loves radical reform and infidelity? This is not so very like real Christianity. When you have answered these questions, I will point out some more for your solution. I am, SIR,

"A FRIEND TO FAIR DEALING.

"N. B. It seems rather curious, that our good citizens, who are so zealous for their liberties that they will not permit government to find any of them guilty on a charge of constructive treason, can yet, notwithstanding, find the Catholics guilty of such remote and far-sought consequences of their conduct, as the taxing of the citizens of Glasgow, for the purpose of erecting places of worship by means of the priest exacting a fine from the poor widow, according to the rules of the church."

So then, it seems, it is a rule of the Church of Rome to fine poor widows who happen to be left with young children. If so, I must acquit Mr Scott of cruelty and extortion. He does not exact money from poor widowed mothers because he loves the money, but because it is a rule of the church to do so, and he is solemnly sworn to obey all her canons and rules. But what sort of a church must that be that has such a rule? It is a character of pure and undefiled religion, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction; and to do good to the fatherless and the widow. This evidently implies that we give them something, if they are poor: but no, say the Popish priests, we visit them that we may fine them, "according to the rules of the church."

It is not in my power to satisfy the curiosity which my correspondent expresses in his nota bene, for it never was a matter of consideration with me, or my Protestant friends, what we would, and what we would not, permit government to do. This language is peculiarly Popish; and if the priests had the power which they claim, it would soon be found that government could do nothing without their permission. As to the case in hand, the consequence is not far sought. If a poor widow receives five shillings from the Town's Hospital to buy meal for herself and children; and if instead of buying the meal and feeding her family, she gives the money, or a part of it, to the priest to pay his chapel debts, the citizens are actually paying a tax to the chapel; and both the widow and the priest are guilty of imposition. She must again apply to her neighbours to keep her family from starving; or if she can keep them by her own exertions, it is imposition to ask supply from the hospital.

I shall very soon despatch the queries which this "friend to fair dealing" puts to me; and I shall be happy to receive those which he promises, as soon as he pleases, for it is my great desire that my opponents would write. Well then, I wish my correspondent to understand that I was writing about Papists, and not about radical Reformers; and that it would have been as much out of my way to point out the imposition of which he accuses the latter, supposing I had known them to be guilty of it, as it would have been to censure the man in the moon for gathering sticks on the Sabbath-day, according to the vulgar opinion. I have, on purpose, brought this simile from a distance, that it might resemble the style of my correspondent. Perhaps he will infer that I am an advocate of Sabbath-breaking, because I have not found fault with the man in the moon for his conduct; and the inference will be as fair as that which convicts me of radicalism and infidelity, because I have not attacked the Radicals, and the readers of Carlile's pamphlets. Besides, there never was certified to me a single instance of a person who was receiving the bounty of his neighbours, for the support of himself and family, applying that bounty in the way which my correspondent describes. He may, however, know of such instances, and if he does, he can prove that the Radicals are like the Papists, which is a point that I shall not dispute with him. I will even admit that the alliance between the two, is closer than some people are aware of; I could say a good deal on this subject, but I shall defer it, at least till I know the nature of the other questions which he promises to put to me.

It will perhaps appear to some readers that I have attached more importance to the foregoing letter than it deserves. It is certainly very unimportant considered in itself; but it is of use as a specimen of the Popish mode of conducting controversy. Papists will never meet an argument or a fact in a fair and candid manner; but always endeavour to draw away their readers to something else. My statement was a very plain and simple one. A fair opponent would have controverted the facts, if he had thought them doubtful; or, finding them incontrovertible, he would have admitted them, and then have endeavoured to palliate the conduct of the priest, by pleading that the rules of his church imposed upon him the hardship of doing things that were repugnant to his own feelings; or, if this would not do, he might have admitted that in this instance, the priest's conduct was cruel and unjust, and that he left him to answer for himself. But no such candour will ever be found in a Papist. The church he considers infallible; he believes her priests can never do wrong; and when they are detected in doing things that look very like crimes, and which would be called crimes, if committed by any other person, he instantly raises a hue and cry about something else, in order to cover the guilt which he cannot deny, and which he has not the grace to acknowledge. Thus the "friend to fair dealing" would cover the extortion of the ghostly father in Glasgow, by setting THE PROTESTANT and his readers a hunting after the crimes of the Radicals.

It is worth while to remark here, that not one of the instances of priestly extortion which I have given has been controverted. The story of M'Murray, though proved to be true in every material point, had yet so much obscurity about it, as to encourage our Papists, and their hired advocate, to strain every nerve to convict me of a fabrication. All the agents which they could employ in the three kingdoms were set to work for this purpose. They failed, indeed, in proving their point; but the very zeal and activity which they showed in this case, shows, that had the truth of any of my other statements been doubtful, they would have taken care to expose them. Their absolute silence, therefore, on these points, is a tacit admission that all my statements are true; and, to adopt their own mode of expression for once, I hereby inform them, that when they have replied to these, I will furnish them with more.

The following letter is from a gentleman in the north of Ireland. It has been lying past me for two months, because I had not an opening for it sooner. The writer is an entire stranger to me; but I am sure the letter will commend itself to the reader, by the plain good sense of it. Modesty would perhaps require me to suppress the complimentary passages; but I choose rather to give it verbatim as I received it.

"FOR THE PROTESTANT.

"December 10*th*, 1819.

"SIR,—Your exertions deserve the approbation of all who know and prize the truth. You have done, and well too, what every man, enlightened by the truth, knows he should have done, and yet must reproach himself for not having done; you have contended "for the faith once delivered to the saints." In the name of this country, I thank you for the affectionate interest you have shown, in sending your publication to Dublin. Let me urge you to extend your charitable exertions; yet when I name the place on behalf of which I ask your exertions, you may object to my word "extend;" I do not call on you to go beyond Dublin, as you might suppose, both from the word, and from the notorious and depraved ignorance of the southern, that is, the eminently Popish parts of Ireland. I request your attention for a part of Ireland, much nearer to you; in fact, your next neighbour; and a part, of which, I apprehend, you on your side of the water have formed very erroneous notions. B——t is the place to which I would anxiously direct your attention, and which in my opinion requires information on the nature of Popery as much as any part of Ireland. In the Popish parts your publication cannot produce much effect; because those who might profit by it, are most diligently excluded from this opportunity by the never-failing vigilance of the priests; but here every one thinks himself able to read, and qualified to judge; and of the soundness of that opinion I shall leave you to judge, when I tell you, that liberality, as the cant of the day is, flourishes abundantly; and all professions of religion are alike in the opinion of the Liberals. God forbid, all Christian men should not abound in holy meekness and forbearance: they should be distinguished from the world by these virtues displaying themselves in the minutest part of their conduct. Their very thoughts should betray themselves in attractive scintillations of these duties. But to compromise the truth of scripture, and join in with the worthless cant of an ungodly world, and call indifference to the truth by the honourable and specious name of liberality; this a Christian dares not do, μη γενοιτο. Many persons, however, misled by this specious word, and perhaps possessed of holier views, heedlessly adopt the cry of the day, and unawares are deserting the standard of the gospel. These are persons who would read your publication, and to whom it might be useful. There is another class also, to whom I should wish your work known. They are persons of much worth and amiableness of disposition, who, in their political views, see in Papists nothing but suffering individuals, and are blinded by their own compassion and generosity, so that they see not what the true nature of Popery is. They think Popery is like any other profession of Christianity, not being aware that the most monstrous claims put forward, the most absurd doctrines taught, the most tyrannical attempts made by the villany of man on the rights and privileges of rational beings, have been by Popes; and that the immutability of the church, the boast, and peculiar ground of exultation among the Papists, on which they lay the greatest stress as proving their superiority, and from which they declare they cannot recede without impiety, renders it the extreme of folly to expect any mitigation. Here then there can be no compromise, and I wish for your publication here, because it sets this so strongly forward.

"I have gone on farther than I designed at first, but I should leave my subject grievously imperfect, if I did not present to your notice another description of persons, whom perhaps you would little expect to hear of among us.

"We boast, you know, of being here a kind of reformed specimen of the Scottish church. We have the same confession, the Assembly's larger and smaller catechisms, our elders, and presbyteries, and synods. In short, we preserve among us, the forms and formularies of those worthy men who hazarded their lives for the cause, who would have gone to death rather than not testify their abhorrence of the harlot church, drunk with the blood of the saints, who would have shuddered at the bare thought of holding any terms with the unscriptural doctrines of the Romish church. Would you not then, Sir, be surprised at hearing a Protestant dissenting teacher in this country, declaring in a public meeting, in a speech got up for the occasion, that the difference between us and the Church of Rome, were but on minor points!!! I heard this declaration myself, else I might have been tempted to suppose, that, any person reporting it to me, might have been mistaken. Let us set aside forms of discipline and church government, and must we not feel, that the man who could say, that the vital doctrines of the gospel, and the corruptions of these blessed doctrines, by the Romish church, are in themselves not materially different, is far gone from the spirit that once animated his church; and does not such a man need instruction?

"In the midst of much worldly wisdom and commercial information here, an opinion has gained ground, founded on a very illogical deduction, that wisdom in other things is a necessary accompaniment. Now, Sir, you can appreciate this mistake, but it has produced its effect. People without any pretensions to information on religious subjects, take upon them to pronounce en maître; and as they speak from the light of nature only, they necessarily declare against revelation, without being aware of it. In this state of mind they are soon and easily landed in infidelity, or if they are still for a religious profession, they are in most exquisite training to receive the doctrines of Popery, which, you know, are no more than the doctrines of the natural mind drest up in the garb of the gospel; the sentiments of the unrenewed man, set out in the gospel phrase. To aid on the career of these things, we have an active man, a member of the Romish church, among us, and some who call themselves Protestant dissenting ministers, who go hand in hand with him, to the betraying of the cause they should support. Do you not think such an emergency requires your interference? I would fain hope you do, and that you will make a trial of sending over some numbers of your publication hither. You may reckon on my exertions in its favour, as well as those of all to whom the truth is dear. Believe me your's truly, &c.

"A PROTESTANT."

In reply to the first part of the foregoing, I have merely to say, that I have no merit, and am entitled to no thanks, for sending my work to Dublin. Some gentlemen in that city, of their own accord, solicited, and were instantly granted, permission to reprint it, promising to bear the loss, if there was any; and to give the profits, if there were any, to charitable purposes. I request, therefore, that the friends of the Protestant religion in Ireland, will countenance and circulate the Dublin edition. In doing so, they will serve the double purpose of promoting a knowledge of the Protestant religion, as opposed to Popery, and of affording pecuniary aid to the societies established for the education of the poor. I have already distributed out of the profits of the Glasgow edition, about a hundred and fifty pounds, chiefly for the purpose of education; and though I am quite ignorant of the extent of the Dublin circulation, I hope something will accrue from it also, to aid the societies, whose object it is to teach the poor in Ireland to read the Bible.

There is not in the whole world, a greater enemy to real Christianity than that sentimentalism of which my correspondent complains. He calls it liberality, in condescension to the phraseology of the day; but it is a liberality which consists in thinking favourably of every thing human, and lightly of every thing divine.

It is indeed surprising to hear of a Protestant dissenting teacher, speaking of the difference between Protestants and Papists, as a difference only on minor points. But it is one of the evils of the day, that persons take upon them both to speak and write upon subjects which they have not studied, and of which they know nothing. My correspondent is surprised that among descendants of the suffering Presbyterians of Scotland, Popery should be regarded with such a favourable, at least, with such an unsuspicious eye; but what would he think if he knew that among the Presbyterians themselves of the present day, at least by many of them, who occupy the very ground which was soaked with the blood of their fathers, Popery is looked upon as a very harmless thing? Such, however, I believe, is the fact; and I think it cannot be accounted for on any other principle, than that many of our countrymen, and even of our clergy, have lost sight of the foundation on which the Protestant religion rests, and of what their fathers suffered in maintaining it.

Another correspondent in the sister kingdom, who approves of the plan which I have taken to bring Popery into utter scorn and contempt, writes as follows. His letter does not seem to have been written with a view to publication; and therefore I shall give the extract, without the names of persons, which he has given me, without reserve. "There is," says my correspondent, "a gentleman usher-like-way of handling this coarse subject, which produces no manner of effect, and this is very common in Ireland: for instance, ——— lately preached a sermon, which was praised up to the skies, and ordered to be printed, in which he says, that for our own household, God forbid that we should not teach them catechisms, &c. propounding the true Christian faith; but for others, I would have schoolmasters mild, kind, &c. but not given to proselytism."

I know no divine law that requires a man to seek the salvation of his own household, that does not require him also to seek that of his nearest neighbour, and of the child that may be placed under his care, if he has the honour of being a teacher; but the preacher above referred to would object to this, because it would savour of proselytism; and it is impossible that a Protestant teacher can do his duty without falling under the accusation. My correspondent proceeds as follows:

"Now giving a Bible, with an unmutilated Decalogue, is proselytism. Using a Testament in which the word μετανοια, that change of heart which is called genuine repentance, is not erroneously translated, "Do penance," would be proselytism. Teaching the children on any of the 143 Popish holy days, would be proselytism. But this proselytism, which we ought to attempt in season, and out of season, for the recovery of perishing sinners, is in the genteeler circles of milk-and-water Christians, utterly condemned and disclaimed. Mr ——— (a leading M. P. on the side of Catholic emancipation) once wrote to the Primate, that in the new schools (afterwards founded on this neutral plan) he would have the Christian religion, but no particular description of it, taught to the Irish peasantry. That is, he would give them a whole containing no parts; and taking for granted, which is false, that there is a kind of general Christianity, a broad cloak, under which, all who choose to call themselves Christians may nestle, each, out of complaisance, giving up his particular opinions, and amalgamate into one liberal mass of men, preferring present to future peace; and forgetting that there is but one Lord, there is but one baptism, and one faith."

My correspondent proceeds to express his approbation of the manner in which I have treated the subject; that is, the open and honest way of calling things by their own names; and openly avowing it as my object to proselyte men to the truth by all "practicable means;" that is, by all means that can be practised upon Christian principles; and I desire not to have recourse to any other.

In reply to the observations of those who think that I have not treated the Popish Archbishop of Tuam with the respect to which he is entitled from his high office, I remark, that I will yield to no man in respect for persons who hold high offices in virtue of the word of God, and the law of the land; but I do not look upon any Popish priest, however high his rank among Papists, as entitled to such respect. While the Israelites were commanded to respect the priesthood of Aaron, they were absolutely prohibited to respect the priests of idols. If I have succeeded in proving the Church of Rome idolatrous, as I think I have, I cannot consistently respect her priesthood. Kelly of Tuam is no more to me than M'Corry in the Saltmarket. Each is labouring in his own sphere to uphold the infallible church; and though the latter would tremble at sight of the former, as in the presence of a superior being, I consider him as the more honourable personage of the two, for he is more usefully employed in vending old clothes, than the Archbishop in vending the old intolerant nostrums of Rome.

No. LXXXVI.

SATURDAY, March 4th, 1820.

Rome's "mystery of iniquity" appears in nothing more palpable, than in the practice of what she calls Auricular Confession. By means of this she has access to the heart of every sinner in her communion, maintains an absolute authority over his conscience, and directs his conduct as she pleases: and this prerogative does not belong to the "Church" alone, considered in her collective capacity, nor to the Pope alone, as head of the Church: it belongs in common to every pedant of a priest, who considers himself divinely appointed to receive the confession of sinners, and authorised to absolve them from all their iniquities.

I do not know that I can introduce this subject better than by inserting a communication from a correspondent, purporting to be a "Pastoral Letter" from Rome, to the Bishops and Clergy who acknowledge the Pope for their head, and who have sworn obedience to him as such. The author has professedly made the "Franciscan" of Buchanan the ground-work of his composition, and has adapted the sentiments to the state of matters in our own day. The reader is requested to connect what follows with the lines which I inserted in my 81st Number; and he will have the epistle complete. The former quotation related to the withholding the Bible from the people; what follows, relates chiefly to confession.

A PASTORAL LETTER FROM ROME.

* * * * * * * * * *

And since this world's the rough wild field we till,
Let us disseminate the seeds of ill,
Commence our labours ever in good time,
Corrupt the hearts of youth before their prime;
Keep them from Bibles, stupify their mind,
And full returns in manhood we shall find.
Teach them to lie, to flatter and deceive,
A source of gain shall rise from every knave:
For if mankind should too religious grow,
"The Church" must half her perquisites forego.
Sin swells the Bank that feeds the Pontiff's purse,
And true Religion proves his greatest curse;
Rome's ancient fabric on some pillars leans,
The props of all her glory and her gains:
Of these, Confession holds the highest place,
That ready mode of merchandizing grace;
The fairest farm may disappoint the swain
Who looks in Autumn for the promised grain;
Tho' grapes should load the branches of the vine,
Hail, rain, or wind, may blast our hopes of wine;
War may lay waste the monarch's wide domains,
And sweep the crops and cattle from the plains;
But strict Confession, to a knowing hand,
Yields fruit more certain than the fairest land;
No rain, no storms, no dire effects of war,
Its regular returns of profit mar.
Arm'd with this weapon, princes feel our weight,
When fit occasion serves in every state;
Kings from their throne indignant have we hurl'd,
And beggars raised to rule a conquer'd world;
The Corsican usurper's friends we stood,
Crown'd, bless'd, and married him to royal blood,
Leaving his lawful wife in widowhood;
Think not our influence we over-rate,
Recounting thus our power in the state;
For when the secrets of all men we know,
Prolific seeds of treason we may sow,
And with sly hints at numbers and their force,
Incite the mob to each rebellious course:
Kindle fell rancour in the people's breast,
Against the men we envy or detest;
Marking them by some execrable name,
We blast them as the sons of sin and shame;
Doom'd in their cursed carcasses to feel
The fiery faggot or th' avenging steel;
And when we lead our friends into a scrape,
Or they are charged with murder or with rape,
We often make a way for their escape,
By large collections at our altars made,
To hired witnesses and lawyers paid,
By closely questioning and shriving those
Who must give testimony for our foes,
And by that practice which the Christian loaths,
Our Absolutions, for man's broken oaths.
Hear now to whom your chief attention's due,
Still keep this wise arrangement in your view.
Let the old matron claim your prior care,
Whose wealth and weakness seem to promise fair,
Whose abject superstition may supply
The means your avarice to gratify;
Next let the usurer attract your eye,
Who loves to live in sin, a saint to die;
The merchant next, the profits of whose trade
Require that off'rings to the church be made,
Make the transgressor compromise with gold,
The oaths he falsely swore, the lies he told:
And should your friends hold offices of state,
Should they become by blood, or plunder, great,
Or dare against our views to legislate;
Mark them as sources of abundant gain,
High must the penance be when deep the stain;
When stretch'd in agony upon his bed,
A mortal fever strikes the rich man's head;
When drugs and doctors bring no more relief,
And all his family are plung'd in grief;
Be sure ye carefully that bed attend,
As if this Dives were your dearest friend;
Though vice had stain'd his life too gross to name,
For which you witness neither grief nor shame;
Give him your transubstantiated bread,
Your off'ring for the living and the dead;
Anoint his body, whisper in his ear,
That from each mortal sin you've made him clear,
That trusting in himself and in the Pope,
He needs no stronger anchor for his hope;
And as the awful hour of death draws nigh,
Leave him in fatal ignorance to die.
For his departed soul let mass be sung,
Processions walk, and blessed bells be rung;
And offer "months minds" till the purging fire
By floods of holy water shall expire.
But let rich souls alone at rest be laid,
Send them to heaven when your fees are paid.
As for the beastly beggars when they die,
Let them for ever in these torments lie;
Guide not their lifeless bodies to the grave,
Nor waste one Mass their sordid souls to save.
No time, no pains, no thought should you bestow,
On those from whom no recompense can flow;

For where's the wise man that was ever found,
To waste his labours on a barren ground,
To spend his swiftness in a vain pursuit,
Or water gardens that produce no fruit.
If there's a man who dares to keep aloof,
Who dreads to see us come beneath his roof,
Who will not often to CONFESSION come,
That mighty main spring of the Church of Rome,
Send for his servants, and of them inquire
His mode of life, their diet and their hire,
Fish for some secret floating in their mind,
Which, if you dext'rously by questions, find,
And manage well, may bring him to his knees,
To beg for secrecy, and proffer fees.
But if no chance shall throw it in your way,
An accusation to his charge to lay,
If his pure life defies the voice of fame
A single crime against him to proclaim,
Then cry out HERESY—impeach his creed,
Call him A WOLF, and then you will succeed.
Fear will compel him to pull down his pride,
And cast the veil 'twixt him and you, aside.
But let no prayers, or tears, or length of time
Avail to gain forgiveness of his crime,
Until by fees and fasting, render'd pure,
His reconciliation he secure.
When by close care and artifice refined,
You have explored the secrets of the mind;
When the fair sinner once has told you more Than ever human ear had heard before;
When the rich rogue, to consequences blind,
Has told you what he did, and he designed;
When the pale murderer has told the tale,
Which brings him to the block if you reveal;
Then Proteus-like assume what form you please,
For all these victims may be spoil'd at ease.
Fear no refusal to your high demands,
Their character– their life is in your hands;
Nor lose your spoil by taking for your fee,
A worthless gratitude, which false must be.
For still, whoever has uncased his mind,
To dread his confidant must be inclined.
Conscious of guilt, he wishes that man dead,
Whose frown can heap confusion on his head.
When issuing edicts, dip your pens in gall,
Keep taunting nick-names ready at a call,
And when you wish to strike a Christian dead,
Pelt Latin texts of Scripture at his head.
In this we have a precedent of note,
For Lucifer himself could Moses quote.
Guard our old building, on saint Peter's rock,
With energy against each hostile shock;
And when rash men with sacrilegious eye,
Into this edifice should dare to pry,
And point out portions of the crazy wall,
Which ne'er were built by Peter or by Paul,
Blast them as heretics condemned to dwell
To all eternity in flames of hell.
Nor with less fury than the flames below,
Let purgatory's profitable furnace glow,
With this great difference, that the purging flame,
By papal bulls, and masses, we may tame.
Tell the wild Irishmen, that when they die,
Their souls must here in horrid anguish lie,
Until surviving friends their pardon buy;
And should some wag in his own vulgar way,
To your grave reverences dare to say,
I see on each of you so mild a face,
And so much feeling in your features trace,
I cannot think there can be such a place.
For if ye have the power by pray'r or spell,
Yet use it not, to quench this new found hell,
How can the fear of GOD within ye dwell?
Reply—that he with heresy is cramm'd,
And tell the clown that if he doubts he's damn'd;
And recollect, descanting on the mass,
To make our priestly dignity surpass
All competition, for no son of man,
On earth or sea's immeasurable span,
Except ourselves, can of some grains of wheat,
A living moving mass of flesh create;
Bow down to, and revere, a work so fine,
Then break in pieces, plunge it into wine,
Bruise, 'twixt the teeth, the blood, the bones, the skin,
And swallow all, a sacrifice for sin.
Thus thro' the land, your pious progress take,
At every step, some shining money make;
Rail at your king's religion—curse the fools,
Who send their children to Hibernian schools;
Absolve the ribbonman, on whom devolves
The mighty task of punishing the "WOLVES,"
Who "in sheep's clothing" have been found so bold,
As to affright the Propaganda fold.

Signata Romæ,
Sub Sigillo Piscatoris,
Prid. Kalend.—1820.
I. D. F. Sec. &c.

This subject is intimately connected with that of penance. I shall therefore give the doctrine concerning both as laid down by the Council of Trent, Sess. 4. Canon 1. Si quis dixerit, &c. "Let him be accursed, who shall affirm that penance is not truly and properly a sacrament, instituted and appointed in the universal church, by our Lord Christ himself, for the reconciling those Christians to the divine Majesty, who have fallen into sin after their baptism." They teach farther (Sess. 14. cap. 2.) "That this sacrament consists of two parts, viz. the matter and the form; the matter of the sacrament is the act or acts of the penitent, namely, contrition, confession, and satisfaction; the form of it is the act of the priest in these words, absolvo te." I absolve thee. "That therefore it is the duty of every man, (cap. 3.) who hath fallen after baptism, as aforesaid, to confess his sins at least once a year to a priest."—"That this confession is to be secret (cap. 5.); for public confession is neither commanded nor expedient."—"That this confession of mortal sin be very exact, (cap. 5.) and particular, together with all circumstances, especially such as speciem facti mutant, alter the kind or degree of sin, and that it extend to the most secret sins, even of thought, or against the 9th and 10th commandment." That is the 10th, according to our division, for the church of Rome divides it into two, to make up the number, having left out the second. And lastly, "That the penitent thus doing, (cap. 6.) the absolution hereupon pronounced is not conditional or declarative only, but absolute and judicial." That is, the priest, on receiving confession, as above described, pronounces a full and everlasting pardon of all the sins so confessed, a pardon which the sinner may take and plead at the day of judgment, against all charges that may then be brought against him on account of the sins which he has confessed.

Before proceeding to expose the wickedness of the doctrines above taught, I shall give more in detail, what Papists avow, as well as what they disavow, on the subject of confession, from Gother's "Papist Misrepresented and Represented." First, what they disavow, as in the words following:—"The Papist misrepresented believes it part of his religion to make gods of men; foolishly thinking that these have power to forgive sins. And therefore as often as he finds his conscience oppressed with the guilt of his offences, he calls for one of his priests; and having run over a catalogue of his sins, he asks of him pardon and forgiveness. And what is most absurd of all, he is so stupid as to believe that, if his ghostly father, after he has heard all his villanies in his ear, does but pronounce three or four Latin words over his head, his sins are forgiven him, although he had never any thoughts of amendment, or intention to forsake his wickedness." I hope to show before I have done, that there is no misrepresentation in the above, but let us first hear what is avowed on this subject.

"The Papist truly represented believes it damnable in any religion to make gods of men. However, he firmly holds, that when Christ, speaking to his apostles, said, John xx. 21; 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven, and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained;' he gave them, and their successors, the bishops and priests of the catholic church, authority to absolve any penitent sinner from his sins. And God having thus given them the ministry of reconciliation, and made them Christ's legates, 2 Cor. v. 18, 19, 20. Christ's ministers, and the dispensers of the mystery of Christ, 1 Cor. iv. and given them power that whosoever they loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven, Mat. xxviii. 18. he undoubtedly believes that whosoever comes to him making a sincere and humble confession of his sins, with a true repentance and firm purpose of amendment, and a hearty resolution of turning from his evil ways, may from them receive absolution, by the authority given them from heaven; and no doubt but God ratifies above the sentence pronounced in that tribunal; loosing in heaven whatsoever is thus loosed by them on earth. And that whosoever comes without the due preparation, without a repentance from the bottom of his heart, and real intention of forsaking his sins, receives no benefit by the absolution; but adds sin to sin, by a high contempt of God's mercy, and abuse of his sacraments."

From the above authorities it appears that the church of Rome makes it the indispensable duty of every member of her body to tell all his or her sins to a priest at least once a year. Now if this were literally obeyed, I venture to affirm that every member of the church would require to have a priest to himself, and that the whole year would be occupied by every priest in hearing the confessions of a single individual. There is not an hour of a man's life, in which he does not commit sin in thought, word, or deed. Every imagination of the thoughts of the heart of man is evil, and only evil continually. He who alone knows the human heart has declared this to be its character. What then must we think of that religion which teaches that a person may, in a few minutes, confess to a priest all the sins which he has committed in the course of a whole year? The thing is as impossible as to recal and relate all the thoughts which have passed through his mind during the same period; it is as impossible as to recal in an hour, and preserve in a bottle, all the air that has passed through his lungs in breathing during twelve months. Yet, according to the doctrine of the church of Rome, it is necessary that every man and woman effect this impossibility.

I know that the Romish casuists make an exception of sins which they call venial; and they require only that a man confess the mortal sins which he may have committed in the course of the year; but this is a distinction of their own making, and it involves an error the most pernicious and fatal, that ever was invented by the father of lies. Sin in every form, and every degree, is the object of divine abhorrence. The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all unrighteousness, without exception. Men, thinking only of what affects their own comfort and security in this world, look upon some sins as great, and others as little. Robbery and murder, for instance, are great sins, and swearing and false worship are little ones, because the latter do us little harm, whereas the former are hurtful to society. But this is not the rule by which the Almighty judges. It is the alienation of the heart of man from himself that constitutes the guilt of the sinner in his sight; and this alienation appears to him in the most secret thoughts, and the most trivial actions of the sinner, as really as in those actions which are most condemned by his fellow creatures. If our Popish doctors were to sit down and make out a list of the sins which they call venial, I am verily persuaded they would place that of our first parents in eating the forbidden fruit at the top of the list. I defy them to find, in the whole catalogue of human transgressions, from the creation of the world, one, considered in itself, more venial than this. What harm could there be in eating the fruit of one tree more than another? This is the cavil of infidels at this day; and, upon the supposition that any sin is venial, it is impossible to make a satisfactory reply.

But in point of fact, we know that this sin "brought death into the world, and all our woe." By this single offence of one man, judgment came upon all men to condemnation. Sin consists in disobedience to our Creator and Lawgiver; and whether this disobedience appear in things which men call great, or things which they call little, it indicates a state of mind at enmity against God, and which deserves all the punishment which he has threatened against transgressors.

What an enemy to the souls of men, therefore, must the church of Rome be, which teaches that there are some sins so venial, that is, so trifling, that it is not worth while to confess them; that God will not mark them, at least not mark them, or remember them, so as to exact punishment for them! This, however, is so interwoven with Popery as to constitute an essential part of the system; and if there was nothing else objectionable in it, this alone would exhibit it to the world, as a religion, not of God, but a mystery of iniquity emanating from the Prince of darkness.

The revelation of divine mercy, by the gospel of Christ, proceeds upon the assumption, that all men are utterly lost and undone, on account of sin. Christ came to put away sin, by the sacrifice of himself. He laid down his life as a ransom for many. Now in the whole history of this wonderful transaction, we find not the least hint that any sin was so venial, as not to require expiation. It was to put away sin, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, that the Saviour of the world laid down his life. It was sin, without distinction of great or little, venial or mortal, that rendered this infinite sacrifice necessary, in order that we might be saved. Those who are saved by grace cannot possibly look upon any sin as venial. They will, in secret, confess to God every sin of which they are conscious, encouraged to do so by his own word, "If we confess our sins he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all iniquity."

But Popery carnalizes every thing. It reduces this sublime view of Christian piety, and privilege, to the mere annual form of confessing to a fellow creature, and receiving his absolution. And as such fellow creature cannot hear the thousandth part of the confessing sinner's transgressions, but only a few of his enormous crimes, such as eating flesh on Friday, or in Lent, the penitent is taught to believe that his other sins are merely venial, or no sins at all. Thus the priests prophecy lies; the people love to have it so; and thousands annually go down to the grave with a lie in their mouths.

No. LXXXVII.

SATURDAY, March 11th, 1820.

It is imperiously required of every Papist that he confess his sins to a priest at least once every year. I showed in my last Number, that if this order were literally observed, every sinner would require to have a priest of his own; and that both he and the priest would have enough to do, though they minded nothing else, from the end of one year to the end of another. The man who believes it to be possible to confess at one sitting, or rather at one kneeling, the sins of twelve months, must have a very different notion of what sin is from the representations which the word of God gives of it; and in fact, he has the authority of the church, which he considers infallible, for regarding the most part of those things which the Bible calls sins, as mere peccadilloes, not worthy of being remembered, much less of being punished, either by God or man.

I need not stop to expose the error of this doctrine; the error is manifest to every man who reads his Bible, and who understands but the first principles of the word of God. My present object is to prove the fact, that the church of Rome teaches the doctrine that some sins are only venial, while others, and these but few in number, are esteemed mortal; and that, having persuaded her blinded adherents to believe this impious absurdity, she allows them to rest satisfied with having made a confession, though it should not embrace one in ten thousand of their real transgressions.

Thus the words of the Council of Trent, (Sess. 14. cap. 6.) are, "that this confession of mortal sin be very exact and particular;" which leaves it to be inferred, that sins, which are not considered mortal, need not be confessed at all; and as every sinner is disposed to think his own sins but venial, at least the greater part of them, he will have but few mortal ones to confess; no more in ordinary cases, in the course of a year, than he can detail to his priest, with all their aggravations, in an hour.

The Douay catechism is honourably explicit on this subject. It reduces the deadly or capital sins to seven in number. To these, of course, a penitent may restrict his confession; and if he cannot accuse himself of any of these, he has no confession to make. He has only to declare himself as innocent as on the day of his baptism, by which rite he believes he was cleansed from original sin, and to demand the body of his Creator in the sacrament of his body and blood, it being necessary, in order to the reception of this, that a man be in a state of grace, that is, free from mortal sin. The seven deadly sins are, pride, covetousness, luxury, anger, gluttony, envy and sloth. The French catechism issued by Bonaparte and the Pope, gives precisely the same number, with two slight verbal variations:—What the former calls luxury and sloth, the latter calls wantonness and idleness.

The Douay catechism has also six sins against the Holy Ghost; but as they are not described as mortal, we must consider them as only venial. There are, despair of salvation, presumption of God's mercy, to impugn the known truth, envy at another's spiritual good, obstinacy in sin, and final impenitence. The grave authors of this catechism had already placed envy among the deadly sins, but here it appears among those which are distinguished from the deadly. This arises, I suppose, from the rule of the Council of Trent, which requires a particular regard to circumstances, especially such as speciem facti mutant, that is, alter the kind or degree of sin. It is envy in general that is a mortal sin; but when it is only "envy at another's spiritual good," the species is altered; and the sin becomes venial. If we take the word of God for our rule, we shall find that there is no sin so emphatically marked as deadly as that of final impenitence; but the Douay doctors class this with sins which are not deadly, for no other reason that I know of, but that they have still a remedy for it in Purgatory.

There are four sins besides, which are particularly marked by the Douay divines in their catechism, which Amicus Veritatis says is approved by the whole church of Rome. These four sins are, wilful murder, sin of Sodom, oppression of the poor, and to defraud workmen of their wages. These are entitled, "the sins that cry to heaven for vengeance." But seeing they are not placed in the list of deadly sins, it may be presumed that their cry is not heard, that vengeance does not follow them, and therefore we must consider them as merely venial.

In this way Papists "sport themselves with their own deceivings." They are worse than the fools that make a mock at sin; for they represent the most enormous wickedness as no sin at all, or as such a trifle that it would be unjust to punish men for it, at least with eternal punishment. Thus, in answer to the question, "What is venial sin?" the Douay catechism answers,—"It is a much more pardonable offence against God or our neighbour:" that is, more pardonable than the mortal sin which is explained immediately before. In short, the Council of Mentz professed plainly, "That they cannot understand how God should be just, if he punish any for venial sins with eternal punishment." Sonnius, one of their authors, tells us, that "venial sins are worthy of pardon;" that is making them meritorious: and Bellarmine, their great champion, declares, that they "hold with a general consent that venial sins make not a man guilty of eternal death." "That God would be unjust if he punished venial sins eternally, justice requiring a forbearance to punish that offence which deserves not punishment." Again, says the same author, "some sins are so far from deserving eternal punishment, that God cannot punish them eternally, without injustice." Gregory de Valentia says, that "venial sin may be remitted without any infusion of grace." Andradius and Bonaventure assert, "That for venial sins we do not so much as need repentance." The Council of Mentz teach, "That many depart this life free from mortal sins, and for lighter sins they shall never be damned." (See the quotations, and many more to the same purpose, in a Sermon by Mr Jenkyn, entitled, "No Sin Venial.")

Thus, from the published sentiments of their greatest authors, and from their approved catechisms, it will appear, that Papists need not much concern themselves about most of the sins of which they know themselves to be guilty; nay that they may easily get quit of them all by persuading themselves of some circumstance which changes a mortal sin into a venial one; or if this cannot be done, they have only to tell their deadly sins to a priest, who not only will, but who is obliged to grant absolution, if the sinner appear to be sorry for what he has done, and promise amendment. A little penance is enjoined as a thing of course, which the penitent may either suffer in person, or compound for by a little money, and then he is declared to be in a state of grace, as pure and innocent as when he came from the laver of regeneration, that is, from the holy water sprinkled on him at baptism.

I do not believe that the grossest heathenism is so much calculated to promote sin, and to keep men at ease under their sins, as this impious substitute for Christianity, which the church of Rome has palmed upon the world; by means of which she has deceived the nations of Europe for so many ages, and led millions of souls to everlasting perdition. For let it be observed, that in the sins of her catalogue there is no mention of that which is the root and the sum of all iniquity, namely, the want of love to God. A man may be unconscious of any of the seven deadly sins—of any of the six sins against the Holy Ghost;—or of any of the four that cry to heaven for vengeance;—it may not be in the power of man to convict him of any one of these seventeen sins; and yet he may be in the gall of bitterness, and the bond of iniquity, because the love of God is not in him; and while his fellow-creatures are regarding him as a saint, worthy to be canonized and adored, all the benevolence of heaven is looking down upon him with pity and compassion, as an enemy to God in his mind; and as belonging to that description of men, for whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever.

The church of Rome endeavours, by every means in her power, to keep the eyes of men shut against this view of their character and state. She is constantly diverting their minds from reflecting upon the character of true religion, as consisting in love to God and to our fellow-men, and as manifesting itself in spiritual worship, and holy practice. She has their minds pre-occupied, by a system of false religion and will-worship; which is the more pernicious, and the more to be abhorred, because it assumes the name of Chrisitanity. In this system, the love of God, which is the essence of true religion, is declared not to be necessary; at least, not to be so necessary as that one cannot be a Christian without it.

I shall immediately prove this by quotations from distinguished writers of the church of Rome. These writers were Jesuits, and therefore their doctrines will have the greater weight with our British Papists; for I wish the reader to recollect, that after this most pestilent Society had been proscribed by all the Popish powers in Europe, they found an asylum in the heart of England; where, for thirty years past, they have been allowed to extend their influence, concentrate their powers, and mature their plans for bringing the world again in subjection to their ghostly dominion. The principal Popish writers of the present day in England, have avowed themselves on the side of the Jesuits; the Pope himself, by his recent authoritative restoration of the order, has identified with them not only himself personally, but also the church of which he is the head; and I have not a doubt, that if the Popish priests at present in Scotland and England would tell the truth, they would confess that they are Jesuits. I have not access to the original works from which the following extracts are taken; but I give them as quoted by M. Pascal, who was a devoted and zealous member of the church of Rome; but so amiable and so pious, that I cannot allow myself to call him a Papist.

In Escobar, says M. Pascal, (in his Provincial Letters, Let. X.) who has collected the various opinions of our Fathers on this subject, in the practice of the love of God by our Society, tr. 1. ex. 2. n. 21. and tr. 5. ex. 4. n. 8. you have this question: "When, or at what time, is a man obliged to have an actual love or affection for God? Suarez says, it is enough to love him a little before we die, without fixing any time. Vasquez, that it is enough to love him at the point of death. Others, at baptism; some, at the seasons of contrition; others, upon festivals. But our Father Castro Palao opposes, and justly too, every one of these opinions. Hurtado de Mendoza pretends to say, that we are obliged to love him once every year, and that we are well off, in not being obliged to love him oftener. But Father Conink believes that we are bound to do it once in three or four years. Henriquez, every five years. And Filiutius says, it is probable that we are not rigorously obliged to do it every five years."

Anthony Sirmond, another of their Fathers, discusses this doctrine in the manner following:—"St Thomas says we are obliged to love God as soon as he has given us the use of reason: but that is a little too soon. Scotus, every Sunday. What foundation has he for that? Others, in times of strong temptation. Ay, if there was no other way to avoid it. Scotus, that after some great mercy received from God, it is not amiss to thank him for it. Others, at the point of death. That is a little too late. Neither do I believe it necessary every time that the sacraments are administered. Attrition with confession, if you can come at it conveniently, will do well enough. Suarez says, he is sure we are obliged to love God some time or other. Ay, but when? Why, you are to be judge of that, for he knows nothing of the matter."

On these sentiments of Jesuit authors, expressed in their own words, Pascal remarks, "Now if such a doctor as Suarez knows nothing of the matter, I do not know who does. And he concludes at last, that in strictness, we are only obliged to keep the other commandments without having any affection for God, or our hearts the least inclined to love him; provided we do not hate him; and this he proves throughout his whole second treatise. You will see in every page, but more particularly in the 16, 19, 24, and 28, where are these words: 'God, in commanding us to love him, is satisfied if we obey him in his other commandments.' If God had said, 'Though you keep my commandments ever so well, I will damn you, if you do not moreover give me your heart and affections; do you think that this motive would have been proportioned to that end and design, which God may, and ought to have? It is therefore said that we shall love God, by doing his will, in the same manner as if we loved him affectionately, and had no other bias but that of charity itself. Should that be really the case, so much the better; but if not, we still do not fail strictly to obey the commandment of love, while we perform the works thereof: so that (observe the goodness of God) we are not so much commanded to love him as we are not to hate him."

"Thus have our Fathers (continues M. Pascal) discharged men from the painful obligation of loving God with all their hearts. And this doctrine is of that importance, that Fathers Annat, Pintereau, Le Moine, and even A. Sirmond, have stoutly defended it whenever it was attacked; as you may see in their answers to the Moral Theology, but particularly in that of Father Pintereau, 2. p. of Abbe de Boisic, p. 53, where you may judge of the value of this dispensation by the price which it cost, which was no less than the blood of Jesus Christ. But what crowns this doctrine is, that it sets you free from the troublesome duty of loving God, which is the great privilege which the Christians have above the Jews. 'It was reasonable,' says he, 'that by the law of grace in the New Testament, God should take off the troublesome and difficult duties of the law of rigour, which obliged men to acts of perfect contrition, before they could be justified; and that he should institute certain sacraments, to supply all our defects, by the help of means more easy to be performed: otherwise Christians, who are the children, could not more easily recover the good graces of their Father, than the Jews who were the slaves, could obtain mercy from their God.'"

In short, the sum of the Jesuits' doctrine on this subject is thus shortly given by Pascal: "That this exemption from loving God is the great benefit, or advantage, which Jesus Christ has brought down upon the earth;" and then he expresses his indignation against the doctrine thus inculcated by the leading men of his own church, in the following language, which would do honour to any Protestant:—"What! will the blood of Jesus Christ procure us an exemption from loving him? Before the incarnation, mankind were obliged to love God, but since God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son; shall the world, thus mercifully redeemed by him, be discharged from loving him? Strange divinity of our times! To dare to take off the curse that St Paul pronounces against those who love not the Lord Jesus! To destroy what St John says, That he that loveth not, remaineth in death. Nay, what Jesus Christ himself affirms, 'He that loveth me not, keepeth not my commandments.' Thus you make those worthy to enjoy God through all eternity, who never once loved him in the whole course of their lives. This is the mystery of iniquity complete! Open your eyes at last, my good Father, and if the former errors of your casuists are not discernible enough to strike you, may these last withdraw you, by their glaring impieties."—Vol. I. p. 227. ed. 1744.

Here I shall indulge myself in a short digression, to show the reader in what manner the Jesuits of that day treated this faithful exposure of their impieties, and the then unknown author, who published his Letters one by one, at intervals. They found it impossible to defend themselves by fair argument; and they had recourse to a weapon which their society, in every stage of its existence, has been found to handle more dexterously than any other body of men in the world; that is, lying, downright impudent lying, and calumny. Thus the author of the Provincial Letters, who was a man really concerned for the honour of his church, was asssailed by the Jesuits with every opprobrious epithet; and, to express in one word all the crimes of which they accused him, they called him a HERETIC; and, supposing him to belong to the Society of Port Royal, they accused the whole body, nuns and all, with heresy, particularly of "disbelieving the mystery of transubstantiation, and the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist." This had no connection with the subjects in dispute; for the author of the Letters was a firm believer in that absurdity; but it seems to have been intended, and it had the effect of diverting his mind, at least for a time, from exposing the impiety of their doctrines; for we find he entered immediately on his own defence, which occupies a considerable part of his second volume. In this defence, however, he makes a most pointed exposure of the wickedness of these fathers.

"I shall not only prove," says he, "that your writings are full of scandal, but I shall go farther. It is possible to say a thing that is false, believing it to be true; but the real liar is he that lies with an intention to lie. Now I shall make it appear that you, Fathers, lie with that intention; and that you load your enemies, knowingly and designedly, with crimes of which you positively know that they are innocent."—"For this doctrine of evil speaking is so notorious in your schools, that you have not only maintained it in your books, but, with the most consummate impudence, in your public disputations; as, amongst others, in those at Louvain, in the year 1645, in these terms. It is but a venial sin to ruin the credit of a false accuser, by charging him with false crimes: and this doctrine is so much in vogue with you, that whoever dares to attack it, you treat him as an ignorant fool-hardy fellow."

A capuchin friar who had been accused by the Jesuits in the same manner, is introduced as making the following defence:—"I have stopped their impudence once before, and I will do it again, in the same manner. I declare therefore to all the world that they (the Jesuits) are MOST IMPUDENT LIARS: Mentiris impudentissime. If the things they accuse me of be true, let them be proved, or let my accusers from henceforth and for ever stand convicted of a most IMPUDENT LIE. After this challenge, all men will see who is in the right, they or I."—"This honest capuchin, Fathers, has cut off from your reverences all possibility of making a retreat. You are now convicted of being professed detractors, and must defend yourselves by your maxim, that this kind of calumny is no crime at all. This father has found out the way of stopping your mouths; and indeed it is the only way, whenever your accusations want proof. The best answer to every one of you, is that of the Capuchin father, MENTIRIS IMPUDENTISSIME." Such is the character of the Jesuits, drawn, not by a heretical Protestant, but by a brother of their own communion, who knew them well.

The reader will be apt to think that I have lost sight of the subject of Auricular Confession; but this is not the case. I wish to expose, as plainly as I can, the notions which Papists entertain with regard to sin, in order to a better understanding of what they call their sacramental confession. If they knew sin in its true character, as it is described in the word of God, they would see that it is impossible for a fellow-creature to hear a true confession of it, or to grant absolution; and if by any means they should acquire this knowledge, it would ruin the trade of their father confessors, who are, therefore, directly interested in maintaining false notions of sin, and distracting the minds of the people with distinctions of sins venial and mortal; which they do in such an equivocal and quibbling manner, that they can make any sin belong to the one class, or to the other, according to the disposition of the sinner's mind, or according to the weight of his purse, and his willingness to part with its contents for the good of the church.

The above extracts confirm the truth of some of my remarks in the early part of my work, in which I convicted Popery of representing the Father of mercies as a cruel tyrant. It is only because Papists look upon him in this light, that they can entertain the question for a moment, as a subject of discussion, whether, and how often, they are bound to love him? If they did not regard him with aversion, they could never think of the benefit of being exempted from loving him; and they would never speak of the love of God as a painful obligation.

Their doctrine, however, is deeply rooted in human nature. "The carnal mind is enmity against God;" and it is one of the radical vices of Popery, that she professes to save men in their natural state of depravity, by means of her sacraments, which are declared to produce the miraculous effect of reconciling men to God, while yet there is no real change produced in the state of their minds towards God. This accounts for all the nonsense and blasphemy of the Popish writers on the subjects of sin, confession, and absolution, which I have given in this, and intend to give in my future Numbers.

No. LXXXVIII.

SATURDAY, March 18th, 1820.

To love God with all our heart, and soul, and mind, and strength, and our neighbour as ourselves, is the sum of true religion; but Popery teaches that it is not necessary to love God, except on some extraordinary occasions; and that if we were under obligation to love him at all times, Christians, who are the children of God, would be no better of than the Jews, who were his slaves. It will scarcely be credited, that a doctrine so horribly impious can be held by men even in the lowest state of depravity; but for the truth of what I assert, I refer the reader to the words of their own great divines and casuists which I gave in my last Number, upon the authority of Pascal, one of the greatest, and, I suppose, one of the best men that the church of Rome ever produced.

I proceed now to show, that, by the authority of the same casuists, Papists are also relieved from the obligation of loving their neighbour; and thus being made free from the painful obligation of obeying the two commandments on which hang all the law and the prophets, the reader will perceive that the confession of sin, which they have to make to their priests once a year, must be a very light and trivial matter. I am aware that the authority of Escobar, and Suarez, and Filiutius, and Bauny, and Emanuel Sa, and Bellarmine, and all the rest, jointly and severally, is not so great as that of a General Council; but I know at the same time, that the authority of any one of them is great enough to direct the conscience and the conduct of a Papist, if the opinion which he gives on any point of morals be a probable one; and any man may consider as probable whatever he pleases, or whatever may serve his present purpose.

The duty of love to our neighbour is detailed and enjoined in the second table of the law, which commences with the duty of love to parents and superiors. Let us see now how the Jesuits dispense with this troublesome duty. "For what concerns love, Dicastillus saith, that it is not altogether certain, that a child can lawfully desire the death of his father, or rejoice in it, because of the inheritance that may come to him thereby; but he believes that he sins not mortally in rejoicing, not in his death considered as an evil to his father, but as a lawful means appointed of God, for him to obtain the succession; not because some evil befel the father, but some good to the son." Tambourin, who wrote after Dicastillus, delivers the doctrine with more confidence. "If you desire the death of your father upon some condition, the answer is easy, that you may lawfully. For if one say in himself, if my father should die, I should enjoy his estate; in this case he should not rejoice in his father's death, but in his inheritance." Again, "I desire the death of my father, not because it is an evil to him, but because it is good for me, or because it is the cause of good unto me; and because by this his death, I enter into the possession of my paternal inheritance." I suppose it did not occur to this grave and reverend father, that, according to this holy doctrine, a younger brother might lawfully desire his death; and that what it is lawful to desire, it is also lawful to effect, if one be able, and have an opportunity.

Hear again this sad Tambourin, in reply to the following question:—"May an inferior desire the death of his superior, in the church or commonwealth, that he may succeed to his office, or that he may be delivered from him, because he favours him not?" Answer:—"If you desire only to receive with joy the effect of this death, to wit, the inheritance of a father, the charge of a prelate, the deliverance from some trouble he procured you, the answer is easy, that you may desire all these things lawfully, and that because you rejoice not in the evil of another, but in your own proper good." Here again, I take it for granted, that what it is lawful to desire, it is lawful to do; and by this casuistry of the Jesuits, it is lawful for any person to dispatch his superior in church or state, if he favours him not.

I have before me a folio volume of such morality, which was collected and arranged by a grave doctor of the church of Rome, not with approbation indeed, but with the most decided disapprobation. The work is entitled "The Jesuits' Morals, collected by a doctor of the College of Sorbonne in Paris; who hath faithfully extracted them out of the Jesuits' own books, which are printed by the permission and approbation of the superiors of their society." This doctor of the Sorbonne was evidently a Jansenist, a sect, in comparison with the Jesuits, of little account in the church of Rome; for with all her boasted unity, the church of Rome has been as fruitful in sects directly opposed to each other, as Protestants have been at any period. He gives the very words of his authors, in the original Latin, with the most particular references, so that there can be no doubt, with regard to his authorities. The passages above quoted will be found in pages 298, 299, of his work.

He shows, from a great number of passages, that the Fathers of the Jesuits hold it lawful to commit murder in a variety of cases. "It is lawful," says Lessius, "for an honourable person to kill an assailant, who would strike him with a cudgel, or give him a box on the ear to affront him, if he cannot otherwise avoid the disgrace. This may be proved; first, because if one attempt to damnify me in my honour and reputation, by smiting me with a cudgel, or giving me a box on the ear, I may betake me to my arms to keep him off; and by consequence, I have the very same right, if he endeavour to do me some wrong by reproaching me: for it is of small consideration, what means are made use of to do me an injury, if I be hurt as much the one way as the other. In the second place, recourse may be had to arms to hinder an affront; and so also to silence reproaches. In the third place, the danger of losing honour is equal to that of losing life. But it is lawful to kill, to avoid the peril of losing life; and by consequence also for avoiding the danger of losing honour." Again, "if one may kill for fear of losing his money, he may also for fear of taking an affront." Page 305. Our modern men of honour, the fighters of duels, must all have been trained in the school of the Jesuits.

Another grave author pleads for the privilege of the clergy, in the following words:— "That we cannot at least deny that clergymen and friars may, and even are obliged, to defend their honour and reputation, which proceeds from virtue and prudence; because this honour doth appertain to their profession, and that if they lose it, they lose a very great benefit and advantage." "It follows, that it will be lawful for a clergyman, or a monk, to kill a slanderer, who threatens to publish some great crimes against him, or his order, if he have no other means to defend himself therefrom." "You have read," says this author, "the doctrine of Amicus, and you demand whether a monk, that hath sinned through frailty of the flesh, with a woman of base condition, who takes it for an honour to be prostitute to so great a personage, boasts herself of it, and defames him, may kill this woman? I know not what to answer. It is true, I have heard an excellent Father, a doctor in divinity, of great wit and learning, say, that Amicus might well have forborne to propound this proposition; but it being once published in print, he was obliged to maintain it, and we to defend him. This doctrine indeed is probable, and a monk may kill a woman with whom he hath sinned, for fear she should defame him." Page 313. I could fill half-a-dozen of Numbers with extracts from Escobar, and other Fathers, all to the same purpose. I cannot, however, pollute my pages with what these Fathers have written upon the seventh, that is, what they call the sixth, commandment. By their casuistry, they allow persons to be as wicked as they please, provided they do not take pleasure in actions as wicked. By what they call directing the intention, a man may commit the greatest crimes, and be guilty of no more than venial sin, or not even so much.

According to the same authors, theft is a harmless thing. Thus Emanuel Sa teaches: "He who in taking what is another's, doth him no prejudice, because he made no use of it, and was not like to use it, is not obliged to restitution." Escobar asks, "If a man, after many small thefts, hath taken the last halfpenny which makes up a great theft, whereof he thereby becomes guilty, be obliged to restore all the sum, which was composed of these petty thefts?" to which he replies, "He is not obliged, under mortal sin, to make restitution of all the sum, but only part, which being taken off, the theft would be no more criminal." Page 341.

The Jesuits have applied all their skill to evade the force of the ninth commandment. Lying is as necessary for the support of Popery, as meat and drink are for the support of our bodies. It is therefore indispensable, that it be considered only a venial sin, or in most cases, no sin at all. Dicastillus demands,

"Whether he be obliged to retract, who hath affirmed some falsity which will cost the loss of life, or member, to another, when the witness by his retraction will incur the same penalty?" and answers; "That he believes that if the false witness have not sinned mortally by bearing this false testimony, he is not obliged, after understanding the truth, to retract what he had said, so exposing himself to great evils." Hurtado teaches, and Tambourin approves it, that "a scholar, having need to prove that he had gone through his course, and having need of two witnesses hereof, may employ therein two of his friends who have not seen him go to the lectures, but are sufficiently persuaded that he did attend them: but they may not swear for all that, that they have seen him go." Page 346. That is, they may not swear, but they may affirm what they do not know to be true; and we shall see presently that these doctors do not look upon a false oath as a mortal sin.

Filiutius instances, in the case of promises and oaths, speaking of one who promised something outwardly, without intention of performing, "For if one ask him if he have promised, he may say no, intending that he had not promised, by any promise that obliged him; and by consequence he may also swear, for otherwise he should be constrained to pay what he owes not." Sanchez, speaking of the same thing, says, "All the difficulty is reduced to this, to know if he that hath sworn had an intent to swear, but not be obliged in swearing, if he be truly obliged?" After reporting the opinions and the reasons of those who hold that the oath obliges, he adds; "The second opinion which I hold more probable, holds, that in this case the oath obliges not at all." Page. 47. By this rule a man may swear to any thing, and yet not be bound; for it was only his intention to take the oath, but not to be bound by it. "If you be assured," says Tambourin, "that you have made a vow, or an oath, and you doubt whether you had an intent to oblige yourself, or if the words which you used in your oath contained an invocation of God, at least a tacit one, I believe it is probable that you are not obliged to keep it."

Considering all these things, the reader must be convinced, that confession in the church of Rome must be a very easy matter; and that most persons will have very few sins to confess. There is not one of the divine commandments, by which a person can be convicted of mortal sin, though he had transgressed them all a thousand times in the course of the year, if he be but ingenious enough to apply the doctrine of intention to all his actions. He may have desired the death of his father or of his civil superior; he may have killed the man who had affronted, or designed to affront him, and the woman who had it in her power to divulge his wickedness; he may have embezzled the property of another; and he may have invented a thousand lies in order to ruin his neighbour, if he had but a suspicion that his neighbour had an ill will towards him: in short, he may have been a habitual blasphemer, and murderer, and adulterer, and thief, and liar, and yet be held not guilty of any mortal sin, because he did not these things, taking pleasure in them as sins, but for some desirable and necessary purpose. When he goes to confession, he may tell his priest why and wherefore he did such things; and if his confessor be a Jesuit, he will admit the force of every extenuating circumstance, and, according to the morality of his order, exact no more in the way of penance than what he may consider agreeable to the penitent himself.

Besides, persons in meaner circumstances, who do not stand so high in the esteem of the Jesuits as the rich and the great, may get over the painful duty of confession very easily, if they will go to the priest at the season of the year when he has most work on his hands, or if they will only be at the pains to concert matters with their poor neighbours, so as to go to the priest in forties or fifties at a time; for he must hear them all separately; and the Jesuits have a rule, that when they have many penitents to attend to, they need not be very particular in rummaging the conscience of any one of them. Thus Bauny teaches: "That if any one of ignorance or simplicity confess his faults only in gross, without determinately expressing any one of them in particular, there is no need to draw from his mouth the repetition of those faults, if it cannot conveniently be done; because the confessor is pressed with penitents that give him not leisure for it."

The priest, however, is empowered to grant absolution of the penitent's sins, though he should not have heard of what nature they are, and this absolûtion is as effectual as if he had heard a confession of them all, with every symptom of deep sorrow on the part of the penitent. It is not, however, necessary, in ordinary cases, that a penitent should be very sorrowful on account of his sins. Some of the above cited fathers teach that contrition is indeed a desirable thing, if one can come at it; but if not, they say that attrition is enough. Now this word attrition does not signify sorrow for sin as displeasing to God; but only such sorrow as arises from the fear of punishment. It is quite consistent with a state of mind at enmity against God; and yet with this hatred of God in their hearts, the priest grants them the pardon of all their sins, and sends them away with the belief that God has pardoned them too; and that if they were to die immediately, they would certainly go to heaven, either directly, or by way of purgatory. Every intelligent Christian must be convinced that this doctrine could proceed only from the father of lies, and the enemy of men's souls.

In order to absolution, it is indeed required in ordinary cases, that the penitent should resolve to forsake his sins and lead a new life; but it is not in all cases necessary that this resolution be sincere, or that there be a probability of his fulfilling it. Father Bauny confesses that "oftentimes it be supposed that such resolutions come but from the teeth outwards." Emanuel Sa says the same thing, and adds, "we may absolve him who resolves to abstain from sin, though he himself believe that he shall not hold his resolution." Again, says the same father, "that he may be absolved, who from just and reasonable cause will not quit the occasion of sin, provided he make a firm resolution that he will not sin any more; though he have already relapsed thereinto many times." Just and reasonable cause for not quitting occasion of sin, is elsewhere explained to be, going into bad company for the sake of doing them good, though the person doing so have reason from former experience to suspect that they will lead him to sin, rather than that he shall lead them to forsake it. Again, Father Bauny teaches, "If, notwithstanding all that they have said and promised to their confessor in times past, they cannot forbear to break out into excess and greater liberty in the very same faults as before, they ought to be admitted to the sacrament, and may be absolved."—"That the penitent purposing with true affection, and resorting to the feet of the priest to put an end to his sins, deserves to receive pardon though he amend not." Dicastillus speaks without hesitation on this subject:—"that after it is experimented that he amends not at all, and after it is known that the penitent hath no will to quit the occasions, absolution may be given him. And when there is some reasonable cause why the penitent should not separate himself from the occasion of sin, though the penitent have relapsed into it very frequently, he is not to be obliged to avoid it, nor to be deprived of absolution, though his relapses be very frequent; he ought on the contrary to be exhorted to come frequently to confession." See Jesuits' Morals, p. 211—213.

Thus it appears that sin is the staple commodity of traffic in the church of Rome. It is by this that she has her wealth; and if persons were not perpetually sinning, and professing to repent at least once a-year, the priests might shut shop. The greatest sinner is in fact the best customer; and, as in the case last cited, one who relapses very frequently, must not be obliged to avoid sin, or the occasion of it; he must rather be exhorted to come more frequently to confession; and as he must not come empty handed, the greater sinner he is, he is so much the better member of the holy church.

I expect to hear that our British Papists reject the authority of the great Fathers from whose writings I have made such liberal extracts. They will plead that the Jesuit casuists were not the "Catholic Church," and that therefore what they teach is not necessarily catholic doctrine. I might, perhaps, admit the plea, if it were urged by any other church than that of Rome; but as she firmly maintains, that all her priests are, in virtue of their ordination, successors of the apostles, and endowed with the authority of apostles to declare the word of God and the true meaning of the scriptures with infallible certainty, she has no right to object to any doctrine which her priests may inculcate. Every lay person is in fact bound, under pain of anathema, to receive and hold fast whatever his priest may tell him on matters of faith. This is not the case in Protestant churches. In them every member is exhorted to read the Bible, and judge for himself; and to receive nothing from the mouth of any man except what he finds supported by the word of God. It is quite otherwise in the church of Rome, in which it is declared unlawful to exercise private judgment; and that every man must, under pain of damnation, receive implicitly what is taught by his priest. Besides, the works from which the above extracts are made contain not the sentiments of mere individual priests; they have the sanction of the superiors of the order of Jesuits, which is virtually the sanction of the whole body, not of the Jesuits only, but of the whole church, of which they are the most active agents and defenders.

I will show farther, that whatever the more consistent Papists of Spain and Portugal may plead on this subject, those in Britain are fairly committed as identifying themselves with the Jesuits. The Orthodox Journal, which is declared by itself to be now the only "Catholic Journal" in Britain, in the Number which has just reached me, speaks of the Jesuits as the most meritorious order with which the church was ever blessed; and ascribes all the evils which have befallen Europe, during the last thirty years, to the suppression of the order; for such was their pure morality, and other good qualities, that had they not been suppressed, the French Revolution would probably not have taken place, and all its bitter consequences would have been prevented. This is the avowed opinion of the public organ of the English Papists, who is known to write under the patronage of a right reverend Vicar Apostolic, and who may be presumed to have the concurrence of the great body of his brethren. Let us hear, then, his account of the Society of Jesuits:—

"The admirable constitution by which this renowned order was governed, showed the knowledge which its sainted founder had of human nature. By its rules, ambition, jealousy, and vain glory, were unknown among the disciples of Loyola, because there was no chance whatever left them to gratify these inordinate passions of the heart." It seems to be a rule with all Popish writers, to disavow most peremptorily those vices of which they are most notoriously guilty; and thus, it seems, the Jesuits could not be accused of ambition, though their object was no less than to have the direction of all the governments in Christendom, and ultimately of the whole world.

I have not room for one half of what this writer says in praise of the Jesuits; but it may come in my way again.

I beg leave to recommend to the reader a small pamphlet just published, entitled, "God's revenge against Rebellion; an historical Poem: with copious notes, illustrative of the present state of Ireland: Occasioned by a late edict from Rome, and a circular letter of a titular bishop in the west of Ireland, against Bibles and Protestant Schoolmasters. By the Rev. John Graham, M. A." This Poem was addressed to THE PROTESTANT, but being too large for insertion in his work, he recommended its separate publication. It contains a great deal of information with regard to the present state of Ireland, and the mischiefs occasioned by Popery in that unhappy country. It may be had of all the Booksellers, price sixpence. I am indebted to the Author for many other valuable communications, particularly the Poem inserted in my 81st and 86th Numbers.

No. LXXXIX.

SATURDAY, MARCH 25TH, 1820.

THE following letter contains only one paragraph on auricular confession, which is my present subject of discussion; but that paragraph, which contains the testimony of a living credible witness, is worth fifty arguments in order to demonstrate the wickedness of Popery in this matter alone. Indeed, the whole letter is so very interesting, that I am sure the reader will thank me for interrupting the course of my argument in order to give place to it.

"TO THE PROTESTANT.

"Lillieslief, 12*th February*, 1820.

"MY DEAR SIR,—While the facts I am now going to state, will form my apology for troubling you with this long letter, they will show you that I must feel a more than ordinary interest in the admirable work which you are carrying on, under title of "THE PROTESTANT."

"I am a native of Ireland; and was brought up in the profession of Christianity, as taught by the ministers of the church of Rome, until about the beginning of the 18th year of my age. In my early years, I was favonred with a better education than Papists generally give their children in that ill-fated, but admirable country. Protestants forming a large portion of the community, the Bible was among us a common school-book: this is a circumstance for which I can never be sufficiently grateful; for although I did not then understand the will of God as revealed in the Bible, the repeated perusal of it rendered its language and sentiments familiar to my mind; and the knowledge which I thus acquired was afterwards of great use to me.

"In my 16th year, I was, by the advice of my parents and the priest, admitted to the communion of the church. I had then, and once afterwards, a specimen of 'auricular confession:' to these two events in my life, I look back with horror! If auricular confession be at all times conducted as it was when I engaged in it, I have no hesitation in saying, that I consider it one of the most abominable and corrupting institutions of Popery. If the person confessing hesitates for a moment, through defect of memory, or through the feelings of shame, the father confessor proposes a leading question on the various kinds and degrees of iniquity, and thus stimulates the reluctant devotee, and drags from him or her the inmost secrets of the heart. To say a single word in explanation of the questions which a father confessor will thus propose to a young man or a young woman, to a husband or a wife, would be to imitate his vile example. You will perceive, at a single glance, that they tend to increase the knowledge of the young and simple in the ways of transgression, and to render vices, of the most injurious and disgusting kind, familiar to all.

"About the time I have already mentioned, a Protestant friend lent me three sermons, which he had bought from some person selling tracts. These sermons are by three men whose praise is deservedly great in the churches of Christ—Thomas Boston, E. and R. Erskine. The sermon by Mr Boston is called 'The Everlasting Espousals,' on these words, (Hosea ii. 19.) 'I will betroth thee unto me for ever;' the one by Mr Ebenezer Erskine, is called 'The Plant of Renown,' on Ezekiel xxxiv. 29; and the one by Ralph Erskine, is on Isaiah xlv. 11. In the sermon by E. Erskine, the person and work of Jesus Christ as Mediator, are exhibited with great force and accuracy; in the sermon by Mr Boston, the way in which the people of God are brought into his family, and made partakers of its blessings, are delineated in the peculiar manner of that able and evangelical writer; and in the sermon by R. Erskine, there is a full account of the high privilege of believers, in being allowed at all times to approach into the presence of their God and Father, through Jesus the only Mediator, to supplicate those things which are promised to them, and of which they have need.

"The perusal of these sermons produced a deep and painful impression upon my mind. All my former views of religion were distracted and confounded; and new views of sin and duty were forcibly pressed upon my attention. In these sermons, the Scriptures seemed to me to speak a new language, and to present to my mind an entirely new scene of contemplation; they certainly set before me the ground of a sinner's hope of pardon and acceptance with God, in a light directly opposite to that in which I was formerly taught to view them. But although I was by the perusal of these sermons surprised and confounded, I was not convinced. I determined to read them again with my Bible in my hand; and I did so, comparing every opinion of the writer, and every passage which they quoted in support of their opinions, with the oracles of God. This second perusal increased the pain I felt in a very high degree. From the Scriptures I found I could not refute the doctrines taught in these sermons; and to admit these doctrines to be true, was, according to the lessons I had been taught from my infancy, to expose myself to all the horrors of eternal damnation. In this state of mind I knew not what to do, I dared not consult my parents; for to do so, I certainly knew was to bring upon me their high displeasure, and perhaps all the sarcasm and censures of my ghostly father; and to apply to any Protestant, I felt was in some measure to commit myself, without being fully persuaded in my own mind. Thus matters proceeded with me for some time. I read the Scriptures, and some Protestant books which I procured from the same friend, most attentively; offered up frequent and fervent prayers to Almighty God for light to perceive, and courage to persevere, in the way of duty; and often went to hear the sermons of some Presbyterian ministers in the neighbourhood. While proceeding in this tenor of conduct, I found light gradually shed on my mind, and I thought I began in some measure to perceive the way in which I ought to go.

"By the manner in which I had for some time conducted myself, I had attracted the attention of my mother. Observing my absence from mass, and hearing of my attendance at Protestant places of worship, she began to dread the very worst of me that a Popish parent can dread of a child—heresy. It was on a Sabbath morning that she first spoke to me on the subject. She began by asking me, 'if I was going that day with the rest of the family to prayers?' At that moment my whole frame shook; and, through fear and anxiety, I found myself wholly unable to speak. I had long wished for such an opportunity as this, to speak to my tender-hearted and affectionate mother, on a subject that engrossed my whole attention; and yet, when it presented itself to me unexpectedly, I found myself quite unable. She saw my confusion, and was grieved to the heart. The sorrow I saw in her face was the first thing that roused me from the stupor into which I had sunk; and I said to her, 'No—I am not going with the rest of the family to prayers to-day.' She said, 'Why?' I had been reading in the New Testament when this conversation commenced, and holding it out to her, I said—'Because I find no authority for mass in this book.' She quickly asked what book it was, I was reading? and I told her. She then felt all that a tender-hearted affectionate Roman Catholic mother could feel in such circumstances; and I find, Sir, nineteen years after this interview, that I have not nerves to proceed with the story of it.

"Of the part I had now acted, the priest was soon informed; and, with the mild and merciful spirit of his order, he passed sentence upon me, without ever condescending to converse with me, and without ever making a single effort to enlighten my mind, and reclaim me from my supposed heresy. The sentence which he passed, as I was informed, was, 'That I was a heretic, and must be banished from the family;' sagely adding, 'That the clean must be kept from the unclean.' This sentence, though communicated to me, my parents, influenced by strong affection, hesitated to carry into execution. But a Popish priest knows nothing about parental affection, and cares far less about it, in such a case as this. He therefore repeated the sentence, and accompanied the repetition with considerations fitted to command an immediate compliance. A Popish priest in Ireland is never at a loss for considerations to influence the conduct of his flock, in matters connected with their religion. In obedience, therefore, to the repeated commands of a man who called himself a minister of the gospel of peace, and who professed himself a disciple of the meek and lowly Jesus, I was banished from my father's house, for no crime—but the crime of desiring to worship the God that made me, according to the dictates of my conscience!

"I believe my parents thought that the very attempt to banish me from the family, would bring me to an immediate submission; and that they, on that account, yielded the more easily to the commands of the priest. In the affair my father took no direct hand: the painful task devolved upon my mother; and I believe was devolved upon her, in the hope that her tenderness and affection would so work upon my feelings, that I would not be able to part with her. On the day fixed for this banishment, she rolled up a small parcel of linens, and desired me, with an aching heart, to accompany her on a short journey. I did so;

and when about a mile from the village, she stopped suddenly, and made the last appeal to my feelings. She did every thing which reasoning, and prayers, and tears could do, to induce me to return to the bosom of that church out of which she believed, and declared, there is no salvation. I felt deeply and wept bitterly; but God enabled me to remain faithful. After some minutes of great suffering on both sides, we parted; and I was not permitted for about two years to enter my father's house, although I had often occasion to pass very near to it. At the time I have now mentioned, a man who had more sagacity, and more of the milk of human kindness in his constitution, than many of his brethren, and who had stood sponsor for me when I was baptized, interfered, as he had a right to do, according to the principles of his church, in my behalf. He called on my parents, and, I believe, on the priest, and reasoned with him very seriously about the manner in which they had dealt with me. He charged them with harshness and cruelty; and declared that the treatment I had received, was more fitted to harden, than reclaim any human being. Through this interference I was again permitted to visit my father's family. Of this permission I immediately availed myself; and though I have not since resided with my parents, we have still been on a very friendly footing, and carry on a friendly correspondence. After an absence of nine years, I paid them a visit last harvest, and met with a reception full of parental kindness and affection.

"After my banishment from my father's house the Lord provided for my temporal support in a manner wonderfully gracious. 'When my father and my mother forsook me, then the Lord took me up.' Indeed, Sir, when I look back, which I frequently do, upon the way by which God has led me, I must consider myself, in a peculiar manner, a child of Providence. He has often brought me, while blind, by a way which I knew not, and led me in paths that I had not known: he has often made darkness light before me, and crooked things straight. But how pleasing soever to my own mind, I must quit this part of my story, as in some measure foreign to the design of this letter.

"My chief difficulty at this time arose from an inquiry very natural in my circumstances. This inquiry was, 'With whom shall I now join in worshipping God?' A Papist I could no longer be. The harsh and cruel manner in which I had been treated, made an indelible impression upon my heart; and convinced me, that persons capable of acting as Papists had acted towards me, were destitute of the spirit and the faith of Christ. But the treatment I had received was not the thing which chiefly influenced me against Popery and Papists; the thing which chiefly influenced me against them was, their direct opposition, in almost all the great matters of faith and practice, to the Scriptures of truth. This direct opposition appeared to me most striking, on the atonement and intercession of Christ, on the doctrines of justification and sanctification, on faith and repentance, and on the respect due to the Virgin Mary, and other reputed saints. On these, and on many other things, I was then, and I am still, of opinion, that Papists are directly opposed to the unerring oracles of God.

"But although I had renounced Popery, there was much of Popery in my views and feelings. I was, to a certain extent, a Protestant; but having emerged from a region of thick darkness, I was not able to form an accurate notion of many things connected with Protestantism. I well remember that nothing perplexed me more, than to form a just notion of what is meant in the New Testament, by the word 'church.' From my infancy I had been taught to consider the 'church' a mysterious something—made up of I knew not, and never was told, what—possessing the attributes of holiness, unity, and infallibility. But when I viewed Protestantism as set before me in Ireland, broken down into so many opposing fragments, I could see no such 'church' as the one to which my mind had been familiar from my youth. This circumstance embarrassed me much; and to increase my embarrassment, those Papists with whom I had occasion to converse, dwelt with unrelenting severity on the subject. It did not then occur to me, that the 'church' of Christ is composed of believers in his person and work, of different ages and countries—and sometimes different from each other, in the peculiar features of their character, and in many of their opinions; but all agreeing about the great articles of our holy religion, all united to the same Saviour, partakers of the same grace, and expectants of the same glorious immortality. The thing for which I looked, and which I always expected, was a visible organized body, which was exclusively the church of Christ, and concerning which all that is said in Scripture might be fulfilled.—I have dwelt the more fully on this matter, because I know it is one of the great stumbling-blocks of Papists, and one of the means most successfully employed to keep them in the darkness of Popery; and because it tended, for many months, to embitter my own existence. Having a firm hold of my mind (as indeed all the dogmas of Popery have on the minds of those who believe them,) I was not able, for about two years, to get wholly rid of it, and so become a member of some Protestant community. During this period, I continued to worship sometimes with one class of Protestants, and sometimes with another, until my views of divine truth became clearer, and I found a body of Christians with whom I could join in religious fellowship. This I did with one, with which I am still connected.

"I have just now mentioned, that all the dogmas of Popery have a firm hold of the minds of those who believe them. As I deem facts of far more use to you than reasonings, I will here give you my own experience; and I presume what I am now going to state, will lead you to conclude, that there may be many Papists convinced of the falsehood and absurdity of many of the doctrines which they are taught, but who dare not give way to their convictions. Long after I had renounced Popery, and was perfectly convinced of the falsehood and absurdity of its peculiar tenets, I have, on a moment's reflection on what I had done, felt my whole frame shudder. At such a moment, I have involuntarily trembled from head to foot, as if I had leaped a tremendous precipice, into which I was in danger of falling backward. Such horror of mind, and such convulsion of my whole frame, were most frequently excited, by a very trifling and absurd doctrine of the Popish church. This doctrine is, 'that it is sinful to eat flesh on certain days of the week.' But trifling and absurd as is this doctrine, and although I was convinced from reason and from Scripture, 'that every creature of God is good, and ought to be received with thanksgiving of them who believe and know the truth; yet while eating flesh on a Friday, or Saturday, a sudden thought of the possible criminality of my conduct has darted on my mind, and convulsed my whole body, so that the knife and fork have fallen from my powerless hands on the table. This circumstance sometimes excited the laughter, but always awakened the pity, of the amiable Protestant family in which I resided.

"I have given you this, only as a specimen of the hold which their peculiar opinions have of the minds of Papists. Nor is it wonderful that these peculiar opinions should have such a hold of their minds. From the day on which they are first capable of forming a notion on any subject, they are impressed with the most awful ideas of their church, and all her doctrines and institutions. Their parents have been taught before them, and they are taught in their turn—that out of their church there is absolutely no salvation; and that to doubt or dispute any thing which she teaches, on any ground whatever, is most certainly to expose them to all the horrors of eternal perdition. In connection with these lessons, they are taught to hate and abhor all Protestants, of every class and description, and to hate and abhor every thing that is peculiar to them; but while they are taught these things, they are also taught to use every means in their power, without scruple (for the end sanctifies the means), to convert and bring them to the profession of their holy and infallible religion; and to induce them to engage in this work of conversion, they are assured that it is very acceptable to God, and very conducive to their own salvation.

"Such is the way in which I was taught from my infancy, and such is the way in which all the Papists with whom I was acquainted, taught their children. Of the influence which such a mode of teaching is fitted to have on the minds of youthful persons, you can be at no loss to judge. The impressions made on the mind in the nursery, are at no time, and in no circumstances, easily effaced; and I know that Popish parents make it their peculiar business, in every period of life, to strengthen and confirm the impressions which they have made on the minds of their children in religious matters.—It is to this mode of teaching that I ascribe several circumstances peculiarly characteristic of Papists. You are here, and indeed in the whole of this letter, to consider me as referring to Irish Papists, for it is with them that I am best acquainted; yet I presume the facts which I state are applicable to Papists in every country.

"It is, I think, owing to the peculiar mode in which he is taught from his infancy, that a good staunch Papist is one of the most credulous, and one of the most incredulous of human beings. Such a Papist firmly believes, that the apostle Peter is the very rock on which Christ hath built his church; he firmly believes that an ignorant and guilty creature, whom he calls a priest, can, by a few words, convert a piece of bread into the very God that made him—into the body and blood, the soul and divinity of Jesus Christ; that every human being on the face of the earth, might each of them eat this God whole and entire, at the same instant of time, and that this might be done every day; and he believes that the Virgin Mary, or any other saint in heaven, may hear a thousand millions of prayers, offered up at the same moment, from a thousand millions of different parts of the earth. A person capable of believing such things as these, one would think capable of believing any thing which human language could be employed to express. But no such thing: the very person who will firmly believe all these monstrously absurd positions, will not believe a single word that is said against them. You may set before him the most clear and convincing arguments on these subjects from Scripture, from the dictates of reason, and from the testimony of his own senses; but you will set them before him in vain. Nay, the more clear and convincing these arguments are, he will be the more averse to them, and the more unwilling to listen to you. Thus, while he is on the one side credulous to the last degree, he is on the other most incredulous. Is such a person one of those 'who receive not the love of the truth, that they might be saved, and to whom God sends strong delusion that they should believe a lie?'"

As there is not room for another paragraph, I shall break off the narrative here, and resume it in my next Number. The writer is an entire stranger to me; but he is well known to several gentlemen of this city, to whom he has given me a reference; and such of them as I have had an opportunity of seeing, bear the most ample testimony to his character as a Christian, and his talents and usefulness as a minister of the gospel. He has kindly allowed me to give his name, which will appear in its proper place.

No. XC.

SATURDAY, April 1st, 1820.

"The last word in the preceding paragraph recalls my attention to another circumstance peculiarly characteristic of Papists, and which, in my view of the matter, springs from the manner in which they are taught. This circumstance is their proneness to dissimulation and falsehood, when they think they will promote the cause of their holy and infallible church. To do justice to this subject would require more time than I can at present spare; and the light which you have already thrown on it, renders any thing like a full discussion of it by me, quite unnecessary. There are, however, two ways in which Papists manifest a proneness to dissimulation and falsehood, in favour of their church, on which, as far as I remember, you have not yet touched.—One of these ways is, by denying or maintaining certain doctrines, when they think that either the one or the other will best serve their cause. There are two subjects on which they are, in this respect, dreadfully guilty. These are, 'the power of the priest to forgive sins,' and 'the kind of worship which they pay, and ought to pay, to saints and images.' On these subjects, I have met Papists, who maintained directly opposite opinions; and who maintained them at different times, with equal vigour and virulence. But take which side they please, they are at all times ready to quote scripture, and abuse Protestants for misrepresenting them. The other way in which Papists are guilty of dissimulation and falsehood, in favour of their holy and infallible church, is, by denying that they are Papists, and publicly professing themselves Protestants. This is a thing very often done. But I do not rest my charge, so much on the numbers who actually do this, as on those who approve of it where it is done. There is nothing among Papists more common, than to represent a large portion of the great, even the greatest, in our land, as like king Charles the Second, Catholics in heart, though Protestants by public profession; and, instead of considering this a disgrace, they consider it one of the great glories of their church. Nothing they think can confer higher honour on their cause, than for persons who have lived Protestants to die in their communion; and rather than lose such honours as these, they will invent and publish a thousand falsehoods. From what I have read of your work, Sir, I presume you are too good a 'Protestant' to envy Papists the honour of such persons dying in their communion. Persons whose last act on earth, is to proclaim their infamy, by publishing their hypocrisy, are surely such as 'shall awake to shame and everlasting contempt;' such as 'shall come forth to the resurrection of damnation.' 'How can these hypocrites—how can this generation of vipers, escape the damnation of hell?'

"Persons educated, and capable of acting in the manner now described, could not be uninterested spectators of the change I had made. Their conduct in reference to this change, is worthy of notice, as it strikingly indicates the spirit of Popery. As soon as the fact got abroad, the hue and cry was raised against me; and every effort was made to hunt me down. Motives, at once the most abominable and the most inconsistent with each other, were ascribed to me, and were employed to account for the atrocious and damnable part I had acted. Truth and decency, and every thing else, fitted to do honour to a religious profession, were readily sacrificed to render me odious, and to excite suspicion against me among Protestants. Nor did they in some cases labour in vain. There were among my acquaintances some Protestants, not unlike one to whom you have given some portion of celebrity, not very enviable. They were indeed Protestants; but this was owing to a mere circumstance; and that circumstance is, that their parents happened to be Protestants before them. This was all the reason they could give for their religious profession; and they did not hesitate to say 'that no man ought to be trusted, who could change his religion.' The number of such ignorant and inconsistent Protestants was but small; and instead of injuring, their conduct ultimately did me much good. It excited the sympathy and the kindness of many who might otherwise have taken little interest in my affairs. The friends whom God then raised up for me, have not since for a single moment forsaken me. I found them in August last, the same kind, warm-hearted, generous friends, I had found them nineteen years before.

"But the efforts of Papists were not in my case, more than in the case of others, who had gone in the same way before me, to be confined to words. A John Huss and a Jerome of Prague could be reasoned with and abused; but if reasoning and abuse would not reclaim them from heresy, Papists could wield other weapons, and they did wield them. In suffering some personal violence for daring to think for myself, on the things that belong to my peace, "no new thing happened to me." When arguments and calumny failed to bring me back to the mother church, some of her worthy sons endeavoured on two occasions, by blood and battery to convince me of the errors into which I had fallen. On both these occasions I had recourse to the law of the land for protection and punishment; and had no little reason to rejoice, that the laws were administered by Protestants. On one of these occasions, a severe fine was exacted, and considerable bail demanded and given, for the future good behaviour of the culprit, or I should rather say, "of the zealous, pious, and peaceable missionary of the holy and infallible church of Rome."

"Soon after this event, I came to Scotland; and must say that I found in it Papists as bigotted and as intolerant as I met with in Ireland. Of their bigotry and intolerance I could mention some facts; but they are unnecessary. They would at any rate be but as drops added to the ocean.

"When I reflect, Sir, on 'the great things which God hath done for me, I should indeed be glad. My mouth should be filled with laughter, and my tongue with singing.' I have been delivered from great darkness, and, I must add, from great danger. I will not say, That none within the pale of the church of Rome are saved, I would fondly hope that there are many within the pale of that church, who do not believe all, and trust in all, that is taught them, by their priests; but who chiefly take the oracles of God for their guide, and firmly trust in that atonement which is revealed in them, as the foundation of pardon and acceptance with God. Being Papists, however, much of the abominations of Popery must adhere to their opinions and practices; and before they can become partakers of eternal salvation, they must be purified from all these—and themselves 'saved yet so as by fire.' But, while charity leads me to hope this, I must declare that I could not hope it of one whose views of religion are similar to those I was taught, and which I entertained, when a Papist. Such views are most certainly subversive of the mediation of Christ; and render it of none effect to them who are under their influence. In such a state of things, then, I must have been lost! and lost for ever! How grateful ought I to be for the mighty and merciful deliverance I have experienced from such darkness and danger! O that I were enabled to walk worthy of it! 'Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless his holy name. Bless the Lord, O my soul; and forget not all his benefits: who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases; who redeemeth thy life from destruction; who crowneth thee with loving kindness and tender mercies.'

"With what is contained in the preceding pages, Sir, you are at liberty to do as you think proper; and if you think proper to publish any part of them, you are at liberty to give or withhold my name as you please.—Of the truth of the facts contained in these pages, you need have no doubt. Many of them must, from their nature, depend upon my own authority; but for all those of a public kind, I can, if necessary, produce hundreds of witnesses, Popish and Protestant. 'These things were not done in a corner.' Of my own character I forbear to say any thing, but, as I presume I am entirely unknown to you, I refer you to the following gentlemen in Glasgow; gentlemen with whom I have had the honour of being more or less intimate, for many years.—[Then follow the names of five clergymen, and several other gentlemen, of this city.]

"I am, Sir, yours truly,

"PATRICK BRADLEY."

I return now to the subject of auricular confession, which will yet occupy severa Numbers of my work.

According to the casuistry of the Jesuits, as given in their own words, in my 87th and 88th Numbers, it appears that the disciples of Loyola, and of course our English Papists, who approve the principles of that order, may break at pleasure any or all the divine commandments, and yet not be guilty of mortal sin. I inferred from this that confession of sin once a year to a priest must be a very trifling matter; and no more than a mere form, at least so far as regards transgressions of the law of God; for I admit that sins against any commandment of the church are not so easily passed over, or explained away, but must be atoned for by the most rigorous penance. He who shall commit the great sin of eating flesh on a Friday, or of going into a Protestant place of worship, or who shall fall short of paying any of his church dues, and who shall confess any of these faults to his priest, will be dealt with more severely, than the man who has only blasphemed his Maker, or murdered his neighbour.

But though confession is thus made easy to the Jesuits, and all the truly initiated, it is a very dreadful thing to the simple faithful, who retain any traces of reverence for the law of God, and who are not instructed in the quibbling casuistry which makes it void. To come before a priest in order to make confession, is such a solemn and important step, that in order to do it properly, the penitent is recommended to spend several days in humiliation before God. Thus the priest is the principal object of reverence, for the sinner must not approach him without preparation and humiliation, whereas he may come to his Maker at once.

In order to prove this, I shall insert here a whole chapter of instructions from Challoner's

"Garden of the Soul," one of their most popular books of devotion; a book that contains a great deal of matter which has the appearance of piety, but all directed to a wrong object. It is very much like what I should imagine to have been the devotions of the Babylonians to Bell and Nebo, expressed in the language of Sion:—

"INSTRUCTIONS AND DEVOTIONS FOR CONFESSION.—In order to prepare yourself to make a good confession, endeavour, in the first place, to recommend the matter earnestly to God; and for some days before, and frequently and fervently, beg his divine grace and assistance: and this more especially, if you have for a long time lived in the habit of sin: in which case it is most proper to prepare yourself by a spiritual retreat of some days, during which time you may seriously enter into yourself, and perform the ten meditations (which we have transcribed above from St Francis de Sales) or such like devotions, by which you may be sufficiently disposed for so great a work; which otherwise 'tis to be feared might be ill done by being done too hastily.

"Examine your conscience with care and diligence, yet without too much anxiety and scrupulosity. Consult the table of sins to help your memory; and reflect in particular on the evil inclinations you are most subject to, on the places and companies you have been in, on your usual employments, on the duties of your calling, and how you have discharged them, &c. And in every sin, whether of commission or omission, strive to call to your remembrance the number of times you have been guilty.

"When you have duly examined your conscience, don't think this is all you have to do in order to be rightly prepared for confession; the greatest part of the work remains still to be done; and that is, to take proper time and care to procure a hearty sorrow and detestation of all your sins, by which you have offended so good a God, with a full determination, with the grace of God, to avoid the like sins for the future, and to fly the occasions which usually bring you to sin; and to take proper measures to begin a new life.

"In order to obtain this hearty sorrow for your sins, and this firm purpose of amendment, you must earnestly beg it of God, whose gift it is; and you must make use of such prayers, considerations and meditations as be most proper to move you to it. Particularly reflect on the four last things, on the enormity of sin, on the goodness of God, and his benefits to you, on the death and passion of Christ, &c. And when you have obtained this hearty sorrow and resolution, then you may hope that you are sufficiently prepared for confession, and not till then.

"If you have any thing upon your conscience, which you have a particular difficulty of confessing, cease not with prayers and tears to importune your heavenly Father to assist you in that regard till he gives you grace to overcome that difficulty: and be sure never to go to confession with a design of telling a lie to the Holy Ghost. Ah! what a comfort it will be to you to ease your conscience of its load! and what a rack and torture sacrilegiously to conceal it!

"Let your confession be humble, without seeking excuses for your sins, or flinging the fault on others; let it be entire as to the kind and number of your sins, and such circumstances as quite change the nature of the sin, or notoriously aggravate it. Be modest in your expressions, and take care not to name any third person."

Then follows "a prayer to implore the divine assistance, in order to make a good confession." The prayer is a pretty long one, and the language is very like that of devotion. The following are extracts from it:—"I desire now to comply with thy holy institution of the sacrament of penance; I desire to confess my sins with all sincerity to thee and to thy minister: and therefore I desire to know myself, and to call myself to an account, by a diligent examination of my conscience. But, O my God, how miserably shall I deceive myself, if thou assist me not in this great work by thy heavenly light." That is the great work of telling to a fellow creature the sins which he has committed against God; and although God alone be the party offended by his sins, he is taught to speak as if he were certain that God would take his part, and help him to make a proper appearance before his priest. This prayer concludes as follows:—"O blessed Virgin, mother of my Redeemer, mirror of innocence and sanctity, and refuge of penitent sinners, intercede for me through the passion of thy Son, that I may have the grace to make a good confession. All you blessed angels and saints of God, pray for me, a poor miserable sinner, that I may now, for good and all, turn from my evil ways, that so henceforth my heart may be for ever united with yours in eternal love, and never go astray from the sovereign good. Amen." The following note is appended:—"This, or the like prayer, may be frequently repeated for some days before confession, in order to obtain of God the grace of making a good confession."

What is meant by a good confession is not so explicitly stated as I think it should be; but the phrase is a scriptural one; and perhaps it was chosen by the priests, and is by them so often repeated to make the thing go down more easily. They can tell us that Christ Jesus, before Pontius Pilate, witnessed a good confession (1 Tim. vi. 13.), and therefore every Christian ought to make a good confession to his priest. There is no connection or correspondence between the things.

Christ confessed what was both good and true; and thus he made a good confession; but the church of Rome has been pleased, in her infallible wisdom, to apply the expression to the confession of her penitents, though it should contain nothing but that which is evil; and the greater the evil confessed, so much the better is the confession.

I shall now give a specimen of the manner in which a penitent is taught to catechise himself, with a view to his being catechised by the priest, when he goes to confess. The "Garden of the Soul" furnishes "An examination of conscience upon the ten commandments." I shall give only a few extracts as a sample. Some of the questions are not fit to meet the eye of a modest man or woman, and yet they have a conspicuous place in this favourite book of Popish devotion.

On the first commandment:—"Have you been guilty of heresy, or disbelief of any article of faith, or of voluntary doubting of any article of faith? How often? And for how long a time? Or have you rashly exposed yourself to the danger of infidelity, by reading bad books, or keeping wicked company? How often? Have you by word or deed denied your religion, or gone to the churches or meetings of heretics, so as to join with them any way in their worship? Or to give scandal? How often?" On the third commandment, (or what they call the second, for they omit in their catechisms what is properly the second,) such questions as these are asked:—"Have you sworn falsely, or what you did not certainly know, whether it was true or false? Or have you sworn to do any thing that was wicked or unlawful? Or broken your lawful oaths? How often? Have you had a custom of swearing rashly and inconsiderately by the name of God, by your soul, or by the way of imprecation upon yourself? How long have you had this custom? How many times a day have you sworn after this manner? Have you sworn by the blood or wounds of God, or any other blasphemous oath? How often? Have you cursed yourself or others, and if so, was it from your heart? How often?" &c. &c.

"Have you neglected to hear mass upon Sundays and holydays of obligation? Or have you heard it with wilful distraction? Or not taken care that your children or servants should hear it? How often? Have you spent those days in idleness, or sin? Or been the occasion of others spending them so? How often? Have you done any servile work without necessity on those days? Or set others on doing so? How often? Have you broke the days of abstinence commanded by the church? or eaten more than one meal on fasting days? or been accessary to others so doing? How often? Have you neglected to confess your sins once a year? or to receive the blessed sacrament at Easter? Have you made a sacrilegious confession or communion, by concealing some mortal sin in confession, or what you doubted might be mortal? Or for want of a hearty sorrow for your sins and a firm purpose of amendment? Or by being grossly negligent in the examination of your conscience? How often? Have you received any other sacrament, for example, confirmation or matrimony in mortal sin? Have you neglected to perform the penance enjoined in confession? Or said it with wilful distractions? How often? Have you presumed to receive the blessed sacrament after having broken your fast? Have you, after falling into mortal sin, neglected for a long time to return to God by repentance? And for how long a time?" I have here given the whole of what is to be inquired into relating to the divine command, "Thou shalt remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy;" and the reader will see, that there is scarcely a word that relates to the spirit and meaning of the divine precept. The holy day of spiritual rest is quite forgotten; the fasts and feasts of the church are put in its place; and the sinner professing penitence, is taught to purge his conscience only with regard to the latter.

I shall not disgust my readers by taking them over the catechetical exercise upon the other commandments. The above is sufficient to show what sort of a thing auricular confession is, so far as regards the things confessed upon the commandments of the first table. And here there is one thing which must, I think, deeply affect the reader's mind. The interrogatories are all formed upon the supposition that the penitent may be a great and habitual transgressor. He may be one who has had a custom of swearing rashly and inconsiderately by the name of God, by his soul, and by way of imprecation upon himself; and who has been in the habit of doing so many times in a day. Now in order to make "a good confession," it is not necessary that he have actually forsaken this wicked habit. It is enough that he confess his fault, and promise or resolve to forsake it; or make a firm resolution of forsaking it; and the priest, upon this confession and resolution, and promise, grants him absolution.

Now in this, as in every thing else, Popery appears directly opposed to the religion of the Bible. True Christianity knows nothing of good resolutions distinct from good practice There is not in the whole Bible a promise of pardon to him who only resolves to forsake his sins. This, however, in ordinary cases, is as much as the priest expects from his kneeling suppliant.

No. XCI.

SATURDAY, April 8th, 1820.

My last Number broke off in the middle of what I had written on the subject of good resolutions, with which, therefore, I commence the present.

In answer to the question, "What is required to a good confession?" the Douay catechism answers:—"1. That we seriously examine our consciences; 2. Be heartily sorry for our sins, with a firm purpose to amend, taking time and care to make an act of contrition," &c. And, "What is a firm purpose of amendment? Ans. It is a resolution, by the grace of God, not only to avoid sin, but also the occasion of it." And the "Papist truly Represented" teaches, that whosoever comes to the priests, "making a sincere and humble confession of his sins, with a true repentance, and a firm purpose of amendment, and a hearty resolution of turning from his evil ways, may from them receive absolution," &c. This is the current language of all their catechisms and books of devotion which I have seen. All their promises of pardon are given to hearty repentance and good resolutions. If it were the repentance which springs from faith in Jesus Christ, I would not object to connecting with it a promise of pardon; but such repentance is inseparably connected with actually forsaking sin, not with a mere resolution to forsake it. The hearty repentance of the Papist is that into which he works himself by fasting and flagellation; and while suffering or expecting to suffer such things, it is very natural to resolve to forsake sin, and even to make a firm purpose to forsake it some time or other. Now, when a man comes to a priest, and makes such professions, the priest must grant him absolution, and declare him reconciled to God, having all his sins forgiven, though both priest and penitent be unpersuaded of any change in the character of the latter, and though both expect he will immediately return to the practice of all manner of wickedness, trusting to the efficacy of a new confession, and a new absolution.

The "Garden of the Soul" furnishes a preparatory exercise for confession, in which actual amendment is not required as necessary to a good confession. The penitent is instructed, not to forsake his sins, or amend his life, but only to think of the measures which he must take for an entire amendment; and to be fully determined, for the time to come, to amend his life. These instructions relate to confession every time that a man makes it; and though he should have confessed annually fifty times, his exercise in his fiftieth year of confession embraces only a purpose of amendment,—a purpose that will never be carried into effect, unless the sinner shall renounce Popery, and embrace the gospel of Christ. Without this, he will but "resolve, and re-resolve, and die the same."

When a penitent has spent several days in deep humiliation before God, he may then venture, but very cautiously, to approach, and confess his sins to a priest. The following is part of the preparatory exercise recommended in the above-mentioned work, in order that a penitent may, in a proper spirit, prostrate himself in the awful presence of his ghostly father.

"N. B. Here it is proper that the penitent should think upon the measures he must take for an entire amendment of life for the time to come; considering well what have been the occasions of his sins; what circumstances are apt to be dangerous to him; what precautions he must take against those dangers for the future; what pious exhortations he must daily make use of; such as prayer, meditation, spiritual reading, &c. When, and how often, frequent the sacrament, &c. When the penitent finds himself heartily sorry for having offended God, and fully determined for the time to come to amend his life, and avoid all mortal sins, and the immediate occasions of them: he may then go to confession, in which he may follow this method.

"The method of confession. The penitent, kneeling down at the side of his ghostly father, makes the sign of the cross, and asks his blessing; Pray father, give me your blessing, for I have sinned. Then he says the Confiteor in Latin, or in English, as far as mea culpa, &c. through my fault, &c.—2. After this he accuses himself of his sins, either according to the order of God's commandments, or such other order as he finds most helpful to his memory; adding, after each sin, the number of times he has been guilty of it, and such circumstances as may very considerably aggravate the guilt; but carefully abstaining from such as are impertinent or unnecessary, and from excuses and long narrations. —3. After he has confessed all that he can remember, he may conclude with this or the like form: 'For these, and all my other sins, which I cannot at present call to my remembrance, I am heartily sorry; purpose amendment for the future; most humbly ask pardon of God, and penance and absolution from you my ghostly father:' and so he may finish the Confiteor (or confession), and then give attentive ear to the instructions and advices of his confessor, and humbly accept of the penance enjoined by him. 4. Whilst the priest gives him absolution, let him bow down his head, and with great humility call upon God for mercy; and beg of him that he would be pleased to pronounce the sentence of absolution in heaven, whilst his minister absolves him on earth. —5. After confession, let the penitent return to his prayers; and after having heartily given God thanks for having admitted him, by the means of this sacrament, to the grace of reconciliation, and received him like the prodigal child, returning home, let him make an offering of his confession to Jesus Christ, begging pardon for whatever defects he may have been guilty of in it, offering up his resolutions to his Saviour, and begging grace that he may put them in execution.—6. Let him be careful to perform his penance in due time, and in a penitential spirit."

Then follows a prayer to be said after confession, in which the penitent gives thanks for being admitted to this "sacrament of reconciliation." He speaks as if he were perfectly certain that all his sins are forgiven. He resolves henceforward to flee occasions of sin. He resolves to perform such good devotions as are necessary for obtaining this grace; and he resolves to fly idleness, and to set himself a regular order and method of life, for the time he has yet to come. Thus the poor devotee of a false religion is taught to deceive himself, and to say to his soul peace, peace, when there is no peace. He is taught to believe that, in virtue of his confession and the priest's absolution, he is perfectly reconciled to God, while all the affections of his heart are as much estranged from God as ever. He is, therefore, in a worse, and more dangerous condition, than the transgressor who never professed to repent of his sins; for while the latter may be open to conviction, and accessible to the remedy which the gospel reveals, the former has his heart shut against every application. He who is whole, or who thinks himself whole, will not apply to the physician.

There is no truth more certain, and none more important to the human race than this—there is forgiveness with God. This is a matter of pure revelation; for unless God himself had made it known, no sinner would ever have found it out; and without the knowledge of this truth, no sinner would ever have repented or returned to God. We see what is the natural tendency of sin in the conduct of our first parents, who, when they became sinners, instead of seeking, or returning to God, made a silly attempt to flee from him. Adam confessed plainly that he was afraid to meet his Creator; that was because he considered him as now his enemy. He had indeed become an enemy of God; he very naturally concluded that God was his enemy; and from all that he knew at the time, he could not possibly think otherwise. He had incurred the dreadful sentence of condemnation; and as yet there was no revelation of mercy.

But looking with infinite compassion upon a ruined world, God did that very day make himself known in that gracious character in which he has been acknowledged and worshipped by his church in all ages. This character is expressed by himself in one short sentence —"A just God and a Saviour;"—just, in inflicting the punishment of transgression upon a willing substitute; and a Saviour, as, by this medium, he extends pardon and salvation to the guilty. This was revealed to our first parents, as recorded in the third chapter of Genesis, in language which would appear extremely obscure to us, if we had never been told any more about it; but it is made perfectly plain by subsequent revelations contained in the Bible; and there can be no doubt that it was also made plain to Adam and Eve by the institution of sacrifice, which directed them to the promised seed of the woman, who should, at the appointed time, reconcile sinners to God by the sacrifice of himself. Those who believed the promise, came directly to God, confessing their sins over the head of the slain sacrifice, and they received pardon in virtue of the atonement of Christ, which such sacrifice represented.

We have nothing distinctly recorded of the faith of the two first transgressors; but we have a very explicit statement with regard to that of their second son, Gen. iv. 4; and Heb. xi. 4. He understood and embraced the promise for his own salvation; and offered to God an acceptable sacrifice. In slaying the victim, he acknowledged that he deserved to die for his sins. He came to God as a sinner deserving to perish; but imploring mercy in the name, and for the sake of the promised Saviour, he was pardoned, and saved. There never was a sin pardoned, or a sinner saved, in any other way; and never did a sinner perish who came to God as Abel did.

Thus to the first sinners of mankind God made himself known in his holy and gracious character, as the God of mercy, forgiving the greatest transgressors, upon the footing of a propitiatory sacrifice. Now it was God in this very character that men did not like to retain in their knowledge; Rom. i. 28. The object of their aversion was, "that which may be known of God," which was "manifest to them; for God had showed (or revealed) it unto them," verse 19. It was therefore not so much God as Creator of all things, as God in his revealed character, whom, when men knew, "they glorified not as God, neither were thankful." It is true that from the very creation of the world, God made known his eternal power and Godhead, not only by direct revelation, but also by visible exhibitions of that power in the things which were made, so as to leave men "without excuse," when they disbelieved his promise of a Saviour to come. When sinners questioned his power or his wisdom to effect their salvation, by the means which he had been pleased to reveal, he referred them to the earth and the heavens which his hands had made, as a standing evidence of what he was able to do, so that men had no "excuse" for their unbelief. This at least was the manner in which he expostulated with the desponding Jews, Isa. l. 2, 3, "Is my hand shortened at all that it cannot redeem? Or have I no power to deliver? Behold, at my rebuke I dry up the sea, and make the rivers a wilderness. I clothe the heavens with blackness, and make sackcloth their covering."

Far be it from God to make a display of his power for the mere sake of display; when, therefore, he did, by the things which are made, make men understand his eternal power and Godhead, it was to encourage them to confide in his promise of an Almighty Saviour who should put away sin. Why are such magnificent descriptions of the power of God given in the fortieth chapter of Isaiah? Why, for instance, these bold interrogations, implying a declaration that all the things mentioned belong to God, and to him alone? "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance?"—"Have ye not known? have ye not heard? hath it not been told you from the beginning? have ye not understood from the foundations of the earth? It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers; that stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in." All this seems to be for the gracious purpose of confirming the faith of his people in the Saviour, whose coming is announced in the beginning of the chapter, and to encourage sinners to confide in him, seeing he whose power is thus described cannot fail in the accomplishment of his promise. Why faint or be discouraged? Why be afraid that the promise will fail? "The Creator of the ends of the earth fainteth not, neither is weary."

From the words of the apostle, taken in connection with those of the prophet, it appears, I think, pretty plainly, that from the beginning or from the creation of the world, or from the foundations of the earth, which are all expressions of the same import, God revealed to men the things that might be known of him; that is, "the invisible things of him," things that could not be seen with the bodily eye; namely, his grace reigning through righteousness unto the eternal salvation of sinners through Jesus Christ; and at the very beginning of the world, when the fulfilment of his promise was very remote, he gave such a discovery or understanding of his power and Godhead, as exhibited in his works, as to render inexcusable every man who would not believe his promise, and accept the salvation thus provided.

But this manifestation of the divine character was what men did not like; they did not like to retain it in their knowledge, and therefore they soon lost sight of it. So far as external revelation could go, the thing was as manifest to Cain as to Abel; but Cain did not like it. His quarrel was not with the divine perfection of power, or of wisdom, or any thing that could be known of God by his works. It was with his revealed character—it was with his spotless holiness and inflexible justice, that would not admit him into his presence, or accept an offering at his hands without a sacrifice of atonement. God had provided a Saviour for the guilty; but in order to be saved, men must come to him as guilty, confessing their sins, and crying for mercy. This is what Cain and his wicked descendants and imitators did not like. Therefore God gave them over to a reprobate mind, and to vile affections: they became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish hearts were darkened. This was the origin of all the idolatry and superstition that have been in the world.

There is, however, something in the hearts and consciences of men that will not let them rest without a religion. There is a consciousness of guilt, and an apprehension of punishment. The conscience must be pacified. God's way of doing so was very plainly revealed; but they did not like it, because it humbled their pride, and required them to forsake their sins. It then became the business of the more cunning of the descendants of Adam to invent something that should be in some respects like God's way of giving peace to the conscience; but yet so different from it as to allow men to continue in their sins. This was effected by idolatrous priests in various ways; but the system was never so completely organized, nor the plan of deceiving sinners so deplorably successful, as it has been in the church of Rome, under the name of Christianity.

The divinely appointed way of obtaining peace to the conscience, and the pardon of sin, is that of believing in the Lord Jesus Christ. On this subject, the testimony of Christ and of his apostles is as plain as language can make it. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life;" John iii. 16. "What shall I do to be saved?" said the alarmed, and almost despairing jailor of Philippi.—"Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved," was the apostle's reply, Acts xvi. 31. The truth concerning Christ, when believed, establishes its residence in the heart; and by the power of the Holy Spirit, it effectually turns sinners from their evil ways. It is by the incorruptible seed of the word; that is, the Gospel,—the word of truth, which liveth and abideth for ever, that men are born again. The believer is born of water and of the Spirit; he is made a new creature. He now sees sin in such a light as he never did before. He is taught to hate it with a perfect hatred. He perceives its impurity and horrible malignity in the evangelical testimony of what Christ suffered on account of it; and for his own sins he humbles himself before God, in deep and unfeigned repentance. His repentance is not the effect of abstinence, or bodily mortification of any kind; but the effect of the operation of the Holy Spirit, by means of the word of truth; and where it exists there is not a mere purpose of amendment, or resolution to lead a new life. The heart is actually turned from sin unto holiness. The new life has begun; and the love of Christ effectually produces in the repenting sinner a life of holy obedience.

But such a one will never forget that he is a sinner. Therefore he is in the daily practice of confessing his sins to God, and of begging forgiveness in the name of Jesus Christ. He knows that the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin. He knows that he has continual access to this; and having recourse to it every day by faith and prayer, he lives in the comfortable persuasion that his sins are forgiven. He has peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. It is a peace, however, which is inseparably connected with continuing in the faith, and persevering in holy practice. It is absolutely inconsistent with indulgence in the least known sin; and it knows nothing of the distinction of sins mortal and sins only venial.

One who is thus taught of God, confesses his sins to God alone, because he knows that he only is able to forgive. To think of another who could pardon or absolve him from his sins, would be the same thing as to think of another God. This was the feeling of the prophet Micah on this subject, chap. vii. 28. "Who is a God like unto thee, that pardoneth iniquity,"—and who "delighteth in mercy?" The interrogative form of the expression is well understood to be a strong asseveration that there is no other God that can do this.

Attend now to the manner in which Popery affects to impart the same benefits of pardon of sin and peace with God.

This she professes to effect by means of certain things which she calls sacraments, some of which are confessedly founded on divine institution, and others are of mere human invention. Of the former sort is baptism. This, though a divine ordinance, is divested of every thing that is divine in the hands of a Popish priest. It was meant as a sign of regeneration, as a representation of the work of the Holy Spirit, in renewing and sanctifying the soul; but the church of Rome ascribes to baptism itself the power of regenerating. This is putting it out of its place, and putting it in the place of the Holy Ghost; just as the sacrifice of the mass is put in the place of the atonement of Christ. The church of Rome admits the doctrine of original sin; but then she asserts that baptism takes it all away, and he who has just been baptized is as free from sin as an angel of God. In this way she gives peace to the consciences of her children; but it is a peace that is founded on a falsehood, and which must issue in the ruin of all that believe it. Independently of its opposition to the divinely-appointed way of giving peace to the conscience, the Popish method contains in itself that which must ever render it insecure. The whole virtue of the sacrament depends upon the good intention of the priest. No man can be sure that the priest had such intention when he baptized him; and, therefore, upon their own principles, Papists can never be sure that they are regenerated. Mr Gavin relates a story of a priest whom he knew, who, when dying, made this good confession that a great many people in his parish were not baptized, because he had performed the rite to them, when children, without the intention; and moreover, he told his confessor, that all those stood in this predicament whose names were marked with a cross in the parish register. After his death the circumstance was mentioned to the bishop, who ordered the book into his presence, and he found a number of names crossed. Such as were alive he sent for, and baptized privately; but many were dead. These of course had perished for want of a good intention in their priest: and every Papist now alive may be in danger of the same thing, for any thing that he knows: for how can he be sure of the intention of the priest who baptized him?

It cannot be shown that the external rite of baptism ever made a man more holy than he was before. If the thing signified accompany the sign, a holy character is undoubtedly imparted; but the experience of many centuries has proved that this is not always the case; for we find that persons who have been baptized are, on growing up, just as unholy as those who have not. This, however, is a matter which does not give the church of Rome any concern, for she has in reserve the sacrament of confession and penance, by which she can take away all the sins which a man has committed after baptism. In the preceding pages, I think, I have clearly proved that this is the doctrine of the church of Rome. Persons may live in the practice of every vice; yet by confessing to a priest as often as they please, they can get all their sins forgiven; and it is required that they do this at least once a-year; and once a-year they receive absolution, which absolution by a priest is understood to be as effectual, and it satisfies the sinner as completely, as if he were favoured by a voice from heaven assuring him that he was absolved in the court above.

No. XCII.

SATURDAY, April 15th, 1820.

WHILE auricular confession is, to say the least of it, useless to him that makes it, it must be extremely pernicious to him who hears it. The mind of a Popish priest must be the common receptacle of all the filth in his parish. There is, as the word of God assures us, a desperate wickedness in the heart of man. The Almighty challenges for himself, exclusively, the knowledge of its deep depravity; and to him alone is it lawful for a sinner to lay open, in the way of confession, or contrite acknowledgment, all the wickedness which he feels within him. This can be done with safety only to him who, being infinitely holy, is incapable of pollution. To tell all the evil that is in one's heart to a fellow-creature would corrupt the most innocent, and increase the wickedness of the most wicked. This, however, is what every Popish priest exacts of all his flock, without exception; and thus, by becoming familiar with the depravity of others, his own depravity must be fearfully augmented. Nay, he becomes so hardened in wickedness as to be the corrupter of the young and comparatively innocent. He insinuates the poison of his own filthy imagination into the hearts of the inexperienced, and effects their seduction under the pretext of promoting their salvation.

That this is not an exaggerated statement, I could easily prove, with disgusting minuteness, from a variety of authorities, which all confirm the testimony of Mr Bradley, in my 89th Number, Page 377. In particular, I have before me the narrative of John Gordon, a native of Aberdeenshire, who, against his will, was sent to a Popish seminary in the Highlands, and afterwards to the Scotch College in Paris, in order to be educated for the priesthood. Having no means of escape, for a long time, he was obliged to conform to all the rules of the College. At last, however, he happily effected his escape, and returning to Scotland, he renounced Popery, and embraced the Protestant religion, before the Presbytery of Edinburgh, on the 7th of June, 1731. A certificate to that effect is prefixed to his work, signed by Jo. Guthrie, Moderator. Soon after his arrival in Paris, he was obliged to go to confession, and to go through all the preparatory exercises, which he relates very minutely.

Then, speaking of the confession itself, which he was instructed to make, he says,—"But all this was to be understood of mortal sins, or those that kill the soul, at one blow; but as for venial sins, we could obtain remission of them without confession, by saying a Paternoster, an Ave Maria, or the like. However, as for young people, such as we, who had but just come out of the contagious sea of the world, it was our safest way, he told us, to declare or confess all, because we could not, so well as our confessors, discern between mortal and venial sins.

"After this we were sent to our chambers, to begin an examination of our consciences. Paper, pen, and ink, were given us, that we might write down all the sins we could think of. When they had given us sufficient time for examination, then they gave us some prayers to say, for obtaining contrition, or sorrow, for our sins; after which Mr Smith was placed in the confessional, to hear our several accounts. I must confess these proceedings did not well digest with me; but I was too well secured either to make off, or disobey; so to the confessional I went, where, I must own, there was not a corner of my conscience but what was pretty well sifted by the impertinent interrogations he made, by which I learned more sins than ever I had heard of, when conversant in the world. However, I came pretty well off; for the only penance I had imposed on me was to repeat, every day, for the space of two weeks, the seven psalms which are called penitential psalms; and because I had apostatized from them, as he said, he ordered me for that to sleep in my clothes, for the above-mentioned time. That was the peccatum contra Spiritum Sanctum (sin against the Holy Ghost), against which he spake for a considerable time. However, out of compassion, he lifted up his hands, and gave me absolution."

After a variety of interesting matter, Mr Gordon proceeds:—"But to return to the rest of my adventures in France—Having finished my course of divinity, I was obliged to take the order of a sub-deacon, and a year after, I was made a deacon. I was then most of all shocked; for now I was obliged to do what I detested to see others perform. There was a breviary put in my hands, which every day I must say under pain of mortal sin, in which there was such an account of saints, and offices to their honour, that it was nauseous to rehearse them. Every Saturday we were obliged to say the office of the Virgin Mary, and litanies to her honour, where there were such bombast titles as Stella Maris, Star of the Sea; Rosea Mystica, Mystical Rose; Turris Davidica, Tower of David; Turris Eburnea, Tower of Ivory, and the like; and Ora pro nobis (Pray for us), at the end of each of these titles. It was also incumbent on me to exercise the functions of the orders I received, viz. to carry crosses at their processions, and the holy water, and to offer incense to their sacrament, altars, and pictures; to carry their sacrament about the churches, and from their tabernacles to their altar; during which time every person prostrated himself on the ground, and adored it. These, and such like practices, made me very uneasy; but I did not know how to avoid them.

"Being now thus advanced, I was obliged to be more conversant in the world than formerly, and very soon became acquainted with several confessors, in particular with one Mr Holdar, alias Jonathan Holdforth, in the English seminary of Paris, who was confessor to most of the English nuns, in the monastery of Sion, by St Victor's. All our conversation ran upon the different stories he heard in confesion, and of the nuns' scruples of conscience," &c. &c. "that I am ashamed to rehearse them. So that I would advise these ladies either to forbear frequenting confession, or at least to make choice of a discrect person. But he is not the only person who is free in revealing what he has heard; for it is the ordinary discourse of the priests, when they meet, to inform one another of what they have heard in confession, and how dexterously they behaved on these occasions. This I can assert, because I was often present at such conferences, where the conversation was so indecent that even an honest Pagan would have blushed." Pages 61, 62. This work is dedicated to the celebrated Duncan Forbes, of Culloden, with whom the author seems to have been acquainted; and I see no reason to question the truth of any of his statements. Indeed, independently of such facts as are narrated, it must be evident to every person acquainted with human nature, that confession, as practised in the church of Rome, must have a direct tendency to deprave the morals of the priests themselves, as well as of their miserable dupes.

Mr Gavin, in his "Master Key," gives a most minute illustration of this subject, with several examples of the mischievous effect of auricular confession, in debauching the minds of young persons. "To the discovery of mortal sins," says he, "the father confessor doth very much help the penitent; for he sometimes out of pure zeal, but most commonly out of curiosity, asks them many questions to know whether they do remember all their sins, or not? By these, and the like questions, the confessors do more harm than good, especially to the ignorant people and young women." "And when they come to that tribunal, with a sincere, ignorant heart, to receive advice and instruction, they go home with light knowledge, and an idea of sins unknown to them before." Vol. I. p. 5.

After a variety of preparatory ceremonies, which are particularly described, the penitent "riseth and goes to the confessionary; that is, the confessing place, where the confessor sits in a chair like our hackney chairs, which is most commonly placed in some of the chapels, and in the darkest place of the church. The chairs, generally speaking, have an iron grate at each side, but none at all before; and some days of devotion, or on a great festival, there is such a crowd of people, that you may see three penitents at once about the chair, one at each grate, and the other at the door, though only one confessing at a time, whispering in the confessor's ear, that the others should not hear what he says; and when he has done, another begins, and so on. But most commonly they confess at the door of the chair one after another; for thus the confessor has opportunity of knowing the penitent: and though many gentlewomen, either out of bashfulness, or shame, or modesty, do endeavour to hide their faces with a fan or veil, notwithstanding all this, they are known by the confessor, who, if curious, by crafty questions, brings them to tell their names and houses, and this in the very act of confession; or else he examines their faces when the confession is over, whilst the penitents are kissing his hand or sleeve; and if he cannot know them this way, he goes himself to give the sacrament, and then every one being obliged to show his face, is known by the curious confessor, who doth this not without a private view and design, as will appear at the end of some private confessions."

Then comes the Confiteor, which is, in English, as follows:—"I do confess to God Almighty, to the blessed Mary, always a virgin, to the blessed Archangel Michael, to the blessed John Baptist, to the holy apostles Peter and Paul, to all the saints, and to thee O father, that I have too much sinned by thought, word, and deed, by my fault, by my fault, by my greatest fault: Therefore I beseech the blessed Mary, always a virgin, the blessed Archangel, Michael, the blessed John Baptist, the holy apostles Peter and Paul, and all the saints, and thee, O father—to pray God our Lord for me, Amen." "This done, the penitent raises himself from his prostration to his knees, and touching with his lips either the ear or the cheek of the spiritual father, begins to discover his sins by the ten commandments."

Surely it is not necessary to make any comment on this compound of idolatry and absurdity. The whole process is so horribly revolting to every feeling of decency and common sense, that it is with difficulty I have brought myself to write it. One can scarcely think of the labial application to the ear or the cheek of the priest as above enjoined, without remembering the injunction of the idolatrous priests to the children of Israel, "Let the men that sacrifice kiss the calves," Hosea xiii. 2.

Mr Gavin gives about half a dozen examples of confession made by nuns and others, which I must be excused from inserting in my work; and then he proceeds to show how the priests accommodate themselves to persons and circumstances, so as to be very lenient to some, and rigorous to others, just as they think lenity or rigour will best serve their purpose.

"If a poor countryman," says he, "goes to confess, the father confessor takes little pains with him; for, as he expects little or nothing from him, he heareth him, and, with bitter words, corrects the poor man, and, most commonly without any correction, imposing upon him a hard penance, sends him away with the same ignorance he went with to confess.

"If a soldier happens to go to make his peace with God (so they express themselves, when they go to confession,) then the confessor showeth the power of a spiritual guide. He questions him about three sins only; to wit, thefts, drunkenness, and uncleanness. Perhaps the poor soldier is free from the two first; but if he is guilty of the last, the confessor draws the consequence that he is guilty of all the three, and terrifying him with hell, and all the devils, and the fire of it, he chargeth him with restitution, and that he is obliged to pay so much money for the relief of the souls in purgatory, or else he cannot get absolution. So the poor man, out of better conscience than his confessor, offers a month's pay, which must be given upon the spot (for, in the shop of confessors there is neither trust nor credit) to appease the rough, bitter confessor, and to get absolution; and I believe this hard way of using the poor soldiers, is the reason that they do not care at all for that act of devotion; and as they are so bad customers to the confessors' shop, the confessors use their endeavours, when they come to buy absolution, to sell it as dear as they can; so, at one time, they pay for two, three, or more years.

"I have heard a soldier, cursing the confessors, say—'If I continue in the king's service twenty years, I will not go to confess; for it is easier and cheaper to lift up my finger and be absolved by our chaplain, than to go to a friar who doth nothing but rail and grumble at me, and yet I must give him money for masses, or else he will not absolve me.'"

Lifting up the finger is thus explained in a note:—"The custom of the Spanish army, in the field, and the day before the battle or before the engagement, is, that the chaplain goes through all the companies, to ask the officers whether they have a mind to confess, and if one has any thing to say, he whispers in the chaplain's ear, and so through all the officers. As for the private men;—crying out, he says, 'he that has a sin, let him lift up one finger,' and then he gives a general absolution to all at once."

"If a collegian goes to confess, he finds a mild and sweet confessor; and, without being questioned, and with a small penance, he generally gets absolution. The reason the confessors have to use the collegians with great civility and mildness is, first, because, if a collegian is ill used by his confessor, he goes to a deaf friar, who absolves ad dextram et ad sinistram all sorts of penitents, for a rial of plate; and after he (the collegian) inquireth and examineth into all the other confessor's actions, visits, and intrigues; and when he has got matter enough, he will write a lampoon on him, which has happened very often in my time. So the confessor dares not meddle with the collegians, for fear that his tricks should be brought to light; and another reason is, because the collegians, for the generality, are like the filles de joye, in Lent; that is, without money, and so the confessor cannot expect any profit by them.

"I say, if absolution be denied to a collegian, he goes to a deaf confessor; for some confessors are called deaf, not because they are really deaf, but because they give small penance, without correction; and never deny absolution, though the sins be referred to the Pope. I knew two Dominican friars, who were known by the name of deaf confessors, because they never used to question the penitent.

"One of such confessors has more business in Lent, than twenty of the others."—"All the great and habitual sinners go to the deaf confessor, who gives upon the bargain a certificate, in which he says, that such a one has fulfilled the commandment of the church; for every body is obliged to produce a certificate of confession to the minister of the parish, before Easter, or else he must be exposed in the church. So, as it is a hard thing for an old sinner to get absolution, and a certificate from other covetous confessors, without a great deal of money, they generally go to the deaf confessors. I had a friend in the same convent, who told me that such confessors were obliged to give two-thirds of their profit to the community; and there being only two deaf confessors in that convent, he assured me that, in one Lent, they gave to the Father Prior six hundred pistoles apiece."

"If a modest, serious, religious lady comes to confession, he uses her in another way; for he knows that such ladies never come to confess, without giving a good charity for masses; so all the confessor's care is, to get himself into the lady's favour, which he doth by hypocritical professions of goodness and devotion, of humility and strictness of life. He speaks gravely and conscientiously, and, if the lady has a family, he gives her excellent advices, as, to keep her children within the limits of sobriety and virtue, for the world is so deceitful, that we ought always to be upon our guard; and to watch continually over our souls, &c. And by that means, and the like (the good lady believing him to be a sincere and devout man), he becomes the guide of her soul, of her house and family; and most commonly the ruin of her children, and sometimes her own ruin too. I will give the following instance, to confirm this truth; and as the thing was public, I heed not scruple to mention it, with the real names:—In the year 1706, F. Antonia Gallardo, Augustin friar, murdered Donna Isabella Mendez, and a child three weeks old, sucking at her breast. The lady was but twenty-four years of age, and had been married eight years to Don Francisco Mendez. The friar had been her spiritual guide for all that while, and all the family had so great a respect and esteem for him, that he was the absolute master of the house. The lady was brought to bed, and Don Francisco being obliged to go into the country, for four days, desired the father to come and be in his house, and take care of it, in his absence. The father's room was always ready; so he went there the same day Don Francisco went into the country. At eight, at night, both the father and the lady went to supper, and after he had sent away all the maids and servants into the hall to sup, the lady took the child to give him suck; and the friar told her, in plain and short reasons, his love, and that without any delay or reply, she must comply with his request. The lady said to him,—'Father, if you propose such a thing to try my faithfulness and virtue, you know my conscience these eight years past: and if you have any ill design, I will call my family, to prevent your further assurance.' The friar then, in fury, taking a knife, killed the child, and wounded so deeply the mother, that she died two hours after. The friar made his escape; but whether he went to his convent or not, we did not hear. I myself saw the lady dead, and went to her burial, in the church of the old St John."

I come now to show that notwithstanding the solemnity and importance of auricular confession in the Church of Rome, it is sometimes reduced to a mere farce, for the amusement of a parish. "The preacher of the parish pitcheth upon one day of the week, most commonly in the middle of Lent, to hear the children's confessions; and gives notice to the congregation, the Sunday before, that every father of a family may send his children, both boys and girls, to church, on the day appointed, in the afternoon. The mothers dress their children the best way they can, that day, and give them the offering money, for the expiation of their sins. That afternoon is a holiday in the parish, not by precept but by custom; for no parishioner, either old or young, man or woman, misseth to go and hear the children's confessions. For it is reckoned among them a greater diversion than a comedy, as you may judge by the following account:—

"The day appointed, the children repair to church, at three of the clock, where the preacher is waiting for them, with a long reed in his hand; and when all are together, the reverend father placeth them in a circle round himself, and then kneeling down, the children also doing the same, makes the sign of the cross, and says a short prayer. This done, he exhorteth the children to hide no sin from him, but to tell him all they have committed. Then he strikes with the reed the child whom he designs to confess the first, and asks him the following questions. Confessor. How long is it since you last confessed? Boy. Father, a whole year, or the last Lent. Conf. And how many sins have you committed, from that time till now? Boy. Two dozen. Now the Confessor asks round:—And you? Boy. A thousand and ten. Another will say, a bagful of small lies, and ten big sins; and so one after another answers, and tells many childish things. Conf. But pray, you say you have committed ten big sins, tell me, how big? Boy. As big as a tree. Conf. But tell me the sins. Boy. There is one sin I committed, which I dare not tell your reverence before all the people; for somebody here present will kill me, if he heareth it. Conf. Well, come out of the circle and tell it me. Then both go out, and with a loud voice, he tells him, that such a day he stole a nest of sparrows from a tree, of another boy's, and that if he knew it, he would kill him. Then both come again into the circle, and the father asks other boys and girls so many ridiculous questions, and the children answer him so many pleasant, innocent things, that the congregation laughs all the while. One will say that his sins are red; another, that one of his sins is white, one black, and one green; and in these trifling questions they spend two hours. When the congregation is weary of laughing, the confessor gives the children a correction, and bids them not to sin any more, for a black boy takes along with him the wicked children. Then he asks the offering, and after he has got all from them, he gives them the penance for their sins. To one he says, I give you for penance to eat a sweet cake; to another, to go to school the day following; to another, to desire his mother to buy him a new hat; and such things as these: and pronouncing the words of absolution, he dismisseth the congregation with Amen, So be it, every year.

"From seven to fifteen, there is no extraordinary thing to say to young people, only that from seven years of age they begin to confess in private, and receive the sacrament in public. The confessors have very little trouble with such young people, and likewise little profit, except with a puella, who sometimes begins, at twelve years, the course of a lewd life, and then the confessor finds business and profit enough, when she comes to confess."—Master Key to Popery, vol. 1st, part 1st

No. XCIII.

SATURDAY, April 22nd, 1820.

THE sacrament of confession, as it is called, as administered by a parcel of idle and luxurious ecclesiastics, must be productive of the most enormous wickedness. This might be inferred from the nature of the sacrament, and the well-known character of those who administer it; but there are abundance of facts adduced by various authors, which completely prove that the lewdness of heathen idolatry is outdone by that of Popery, under this single rite. It is difficult to write with decency on such a subject; but it is necessary to tell at least part of the truth, in justice to the cause in which I am engaged, that is, to expose the church of Rome as the very Antichrist that is opposed to all that is holy, and just, and good.

Da Costa, a Portuguese gentleman, a member of the church of Rome, in his relation of what he suffered in the Inquisition, in consequence of being accused of free masonry, after describing, at considerable length, the vices of the priests, proceeds as follows:—

"Another admirable instance of their continence in this respect, presents itself in Gonsalvius, during his relation of what happened in Spain, when the Bull of Pope Paul IV. enjoining to the holy office the cognizance of the crime of solicitant, was published. (A solicitant is a priest, who, in the act of confession, solicits the penitent confessing to indecent acts.) Before I advert to the fact, I shall state those words of the Bull that are applicable to the subject: 'Whereas certain ecclesiastics, in the kingdom of Spain, and in the cities and dioceses thereof, having the cure of souls, or exercising such cure for others, or otherwise deputed to hear the confessions of penitents, have broken out into such heinous acts of iniquity, as to abuse the sacrament of penance in the very act of hearing the confessions, not fearing to injure the same sacrament, and him who instituted it, our Lord God and Saviour Jesus Christ, by enticing and provoking, or trying to entice and provoke, females to lewd actions, at the very time when they were making their confessions.'

"When this Bull was first introduced into Spain, the Inquisitors published a solemn edict in all the churches belonging to the archbishopric of Seville, that any person knowing, or having heard of any friar or clergyman's having committed the crime of abusing the sacrament of confession, or in any manner having improperly conducted himself during the confession of a female penitent, should make a discovery of what he knew, within thirty days to the holy tribunal; and very heavy censures were attached to those who should neglect or despise this injunction. When this edict was first published, such a considerable number of females went to the palace of the Inquisitor, only in the city of Seville, to reveal the conduct of their infamous confessors, that twenty notaries, and as many Inquisitors, were appointed to minute down their several informations against them: but these being found insufficient to receive the depositions of so many witnesses; and the inquisitors being thus overwhelmed, as it were, with the pressure of such affairs, thirty days more were allowed for taking the accusations, and this lapse of time also proving inadequate to the intended purpose, a similar period was granted not only for a third but a fourth time. The ladies of rank, character, and noble families, had a difficult part to act on this occasion, as their discoveries could not be made of any particular time and place. On one side, a religious fear of incurring the threatened censures, goaded their consciences so much as to compel them to make the required accusation; on the other side, a regard to their husbands, to whom they justly feared to give offence, by affording them any motives for suspecting their private conduct, induced them to keep at home. To obviate these difficulties they had recourse to the measure of covering their faces with a veil, according to the fashion of Spain, and thus went to the inquisitors in the most secret manner they could adopt. Very few, however, escaped the vigilance of their husbands, who, on being informed of the discoveries and accusations made by their wives, were filled with suspicions; and yet, notwithstanding this accumulation of proofs against the confessors, produced to the inquisitors, this holy tribunal, contrary to the expectations of every one, put an end to the business, by ordering, that all crimes of this nature, proved by lawful evidence, should from thenceforth be consigned to perpetual silence and oblivion." —Narrative, &c. by Hippolyto Joseph Da Costa Pereira Furtado de Mendonca, vol. I. Pages 117—119.

This was not like an instance of an individual priest or two, in a nation, in the course of a century, being detected in the practice of wickedness. It shows that the disease was universal, the whole mass was corrupted; and the fact that both husbands and wives continued in the same communion, and submitted their consciences, and trusted their salvation, in the hands of the same ghostly guides, shows the influence of a judicial infatuation and hardness of heart to which they must have been abandoned, because they received not the love of the truth that they might be saved.

Mr Gavin gives an account of a priest who made his dying confession to himself, in which he acknowledged that for twelve years he belonged to a club of priests, six in number, residing in contiguous parishes. Every one, he said, had a list of the handsomest women in his parish, and when any one had a fancy to see any one of them, the priest of the parish sent for her to his own house, under some religious pretext, and had her introduced to his brother priest. In this way, said he, we have served one another for twelve years past. "Our manner was to persuade their husbands and fathers, not to hinder them any spiritual comfort; and to the ladies, to persuade them to be subject to our advice and will; and that in doing so they should have liberty at any time to go out on pretence of communicating some spiritual business to the priest: And if they refused to do it, then we would speak to their husbands and fathers not to let them go out at all; or, which would be worse for them, we should inform against them to the holy tribunal of the Inquisition."—Master Key, vol. I. Page 29. Thus, under the cloak of letting them go to confession, Papists become accessary to the prostitution of their wives and daughters.

It is now time that I should think of drawing the subject of auricular confession to a close; but it would not be fair to do so without examining what the church of Rome adduces as scripture authority for the practice. Know then, gentle reader, that the front argument from scripture is contained in these words of our Saviour to his apostles, John xx. 21, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven, and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained." From this the "Papist truly represented," argues, that Christ gave the apostles "and their successors, the bishops and priests of the catholic church, authority to absolve any truly penitent sinner from his sins."

This I say is the front argument of the church of Rome for auricular confession; and I request the reader to look at it again, and to take his Bible, and read the passage in its connection, and he will find that there is not a word of confession in it. The remitting, or retaining of sins here, is connected with the gift of the Holy Ghost, under whose divine influence the apostles, as ambassadors of Christ, were authorized to proclaim the forgiveness or remission of sins, to all who should receive the testimony concerning Christ; and in the same authoritative manner, to declare the everlasting perdition of those who received not their testimony. The sins of the former were remitted, and the sins of the latter retained, according to their inspired declaration; and thus what they bound on earth was bound in heaven, and what they loosed on earth was loosed in heaven. But the question recurs, what have we here to do with auricular confession? And the answer must be, nothing at all.

But we shall see how the late bishop Hay of Edinburgh extracts the duty of confession out of these words:—"What is sacramental confession? Ans. It is the laying open the state of our souls to a priest, by humbly accusing ourselves to him of all our sins, in order to obtain the grace of absolution. Q. Is this confession of our sins necessary for obtaining absolution? A. It is ordained by Jesus Christ as a condition absolutely necessary for this purpose; insomuch, that without it, the grace of the sacrament of penance, by which our sins are pardoned, and we restored to the friendship of God, will not be bestowed upon us. Q. How does this necessity appear from Scripture? A. It is included in the very power which Jesus Christ gave to the pastors of the church, of binding and loosing, of remitting and retaining sins. For by giving them this power, he constituted them judges of our souls in his own stead, the ministers of reconciliation between God and the sinner; consequently, it is his will that they should exercise this power with justice and discretion, according to the merits of the case, and the dispositions of the penitent; for we cannot suppose he intended that they should exercise it at random; it would be impiety to suppose that. Besides, as this tribunal is not a tribunal of strict vindictive justice, for punishing the offender to the extent of what he deserves, seeing nothing less than hell fire is the proper punishment of mortal sin, but it is a tribunal of mercy, where, by the sentence of absolution, the sinner is delivered both from the guilt of his sins, and from the eternal punishment due to them; and this eternal punishment is exchanged for a temporal punishment, which, through the merits of Christ applied to our souls in this sacrament, both contributes to satisfy the divine justice, and is most wholesome and salutary to the penitent; it is doubtless the will of Jesus Christ that the priest, when he exercises the power of binding, and lays this penance on the penitent, should do it with a just proportion to his guilt and dispositions. Now, it is self-evident that the priest can neither act with justice and prudence, in forgiving and retaining sins, nor observe the just proportion in imposing the proper punishment suitable to the guilt and dispositions of the sinner, unless he knows the real state of his soul, both as to his guilt and dispositions; and, as none can possibly discover this to him but the sinner himself, hence it manifestly follows, that the very power of binding and loosing, of forgiving and retaining sins, given by Jesus Christ to the priests of his church, necessarily includes a strict obligation on sinners to lay open the state of their souls, by a humble confession of all their sins, to a priest, in order to receive the effect of that power, and to be absolved from their sins by him." —Sincere Christian Instructed, vol. II. Pages 77, 78.

Perhaps the reader will expect an apology from me for giving such an enormous quantity of nonsense, in one quotation. I have done it for the double purpose of showing the manner in which the greatest Popish writers overwhelm with words a subject that cannot bear to be openly exposed; and the circuitous process by which they derive the duty of auricular confession of sin to a priest. When drawn from under its overwhelming verbiage, the argument is simply this:—The priest cannot remit sins till he know them; he cannot possibly know them but by the confession of the sinner, ergo, it is the duty of every man to confess his sins to a priest. Thus the very imperfection and ignorance of the priest is given as a reason for trusting in him. It is declared that he has the power of remitting sin and granting absolution; and at same time, it is admitted that he cannot possibly know what sins a man has committed, or whether he be a sinner at all, until he shall learn the fact from the person himself who applies to him for absolution. I wish all who go to confess their sins to a priest had but the sense which a heathen king displayed in addressing the wise men of his court, which by a little accommodation may be applied to the case in hand, Dan. ii. 9. Tell me my sins, and then I shall know that you can grant me absolution.

There is a sense, indeed, in which the pastors of the church may be said to grant absolution; that is, when persons having been separated from communion in consequence of some public sin, or some sin publicly known, are, upon evidence of repentance, restored to fellowship. This is not forgiving sin, but receiving back a sinner, believing that God has forgiven him; and we believe this only when we have evidence of genuine repentance. A free and open confession is one evidence of repentance; but it is not a confession of secret sin that is required. It is enough that confession of this be made to God, who knows it already. In the case of the church, the confession must also relate to some sin that is known already, and that has been an occasion of scandal. Confession is not required for the purpose of discovering secret sins against God; but for ascertaining the state of mind of the sinner, with regard to what has given public offence; and if there be reason to believe that he really repents, he is absolved; that is, restored to his place in the church which he had forfeited. But this, in every point, is very different from confession and absolution in the church of Rome.

Bishop Hay finds another authority for auricular confession in these words, 1 John i. 8. "If we say we have no sin we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all iniquity." Plain common sense could find nothing of auricular confession to a priest in these words: for there is no mention, and not the most distant allusion to a priest in the whole chapter, unless we shall suppose the inspired writer speaking of himself and the other apostles under that character, when he says, the things which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, &c. Yet this wordy prelate speaks of his proof from this passage in the following confident style: "This testimony is so strong and clear, for the necessity of confessing our sins, that our adversaries have no other way to escape the force of it, but by vainly pretending that the apostle means only the confessing our sins privately to God alone." We do not only pretend, but firmly maintain, that the apostle in this passage, speaks of confessing sins to God, and to no other; though the grave bishop should reckon this so small a matter that he calls it only confessing to God, whereas confessing to a priest, is, in his opinion, the great and indispensable thing. The structure of the language will bear no other meaning than that the confession must be made to him who is faithful and just to forgive; that is, God, as in the version from which the bishop quotes. It is the pronoun he in our version; but it evidently relates to the substantive, God, in the 5th verse. But let us see how bishop Hay extorts the doctrine of confession to a priest out of this passage:—

"But that this (i. e. confession to God alone) cannot be the apostle's meaning, is evident from two strong reasons; first, because the confessing our sins is here put in opposition to the saying we have no sin; these two are opposite to one another, and therefore must certainly relate to the same object. Now who is there in his senses that would seriously dare to say to God in private that he has no sin? In this part of the sentence, then, the apostle certainly means saying, we have no sin before men; and, consequently, in the opposite part of it, when he says, "if we confess our sins," he necessarily means the doing so before men also." This is doubtless a most precious piece of Popish logic. The whole weight of the argument, if argument it can be called, rests upon the words, if we say we have no sin; and even these conclude nothing in the bishop's favour, unless they necessarily mean, saying aloud before men. Now so far from necessarily meaning this, they do not mean this at all. They refer to what a man thinks or says in his heart. If we say we have no sin we deceive ourselves. It is by what a man thinks, or says to himself, that he deceives himself; but by what he says aloud before men, he deceives not himself, but others. Besides, bishop Hay ought to have known that some men are guilty of doing every day what he says no man in his senses will do; that is, saying to God that they have no sin. Christ described a class of men under the character of the Pharisee, who not only said to God he had no sin, at least such as other men had, but boasted of a great deal of merit. And this must be the case with every Papist when he has received the absolution of his priest, and performed his penance.

"Again," proceeds bishop Hay, "St James says, 'confess your sins one to another, and pray for one another, that you may be saved.' Here we see, in express terms, the confessing our sins to man laid down as a condition of our salvation. His reverence admits that there is a difficulty in the words one another, which he attempts to remove, but he only smothers it with a great heap of words. So far as the words of the apostle go, they make it as much the duty of the priests to confess to their people, as of the people to confess to the priests.

In the following, the reader will see how the meaning of the plainest passages of scripture is perverted by such writers as bishop Hay, and indeed by all Popish writers.—"St Paul," says he, "speaking of the reconciliation of sinners to God, says, 'God hath reconciled us to himself by Christ; and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation. For God, indeed, was in Christ reconciling the world to himself—and he hath placed in us the word of reconciliation; we are therefore ambassadors for Christ,' 2 Cor. v. 18. In these words, the apostle declares, that whereas God, through the merits of Jesus Christ, reconciled the world to himself, he was pleased to appoint the apostles, and their successors in office, to be the ministers of this reconciliation; that is, to be his substitutes on earth for applying to the souls of the people the means obtained by him for communicating the grace of reconciliation; and for this purpose, says the apostle, he placed in us the word of reconciliation, by which means we are made the ambassadors of Christ. Hence, then, it manifestly follows, that if the pastors of the church be the ministers of our reconciliation with God, if the word of reconciliation, the power of pronouncing sentence of absolution upon us, be placed in them, it is, of course, by their ministry alone, that we can obtain this reconciliation. Christ instituted no other way; therefore, it is our strict obligation to have recourse to them for this benefit, by laying open before them the state of our souls in the sacrament of confession, that they may apply to us the means of our reconciliation, in the way that Christ requires of them to do."—Sincere Christian Instructed, &c. vol. II. Page 82.

The apostle's doctrine in the above-cited passage, is, that when Christ died upon the cross, "God was in him reconciling the world to himself;" that is, taking away the grounds of difference which stood between him and sinners of the human race, "not imputing to them their trespasses;" but imputing them to Christ, who voluntarily took them upon himself, that he might make atonement for them; thus it is said, "he bore our sins in his own body on the tree." "For God made him who knew no sin, to be sin for us, that we might be the righteousness of God in him." It was thus that God reconciled us to himself; and we are said to be reconciled to God by the death of his Son. Now, says the apostle, "he hath given to us the word of reconciliation." This was not to effect the reconciliation; for Christ himself effected it. It was not even to apply the means of reconciliation, as bishop Hay calls it, for it is the Holy Ghost alone that can apply the benefits of Christ's death to the souls of men. It was, as the apostle himself plainly declares, the gospel with which he was put in trust, and which he calls the word of reconciliation, because it shows the way by which we become reconciled to God. The apostles received a commission from Christ himself to preach this gospel to all the world. Thus they became his ambassadors; and as such they beseeched men, in Christ's stead, to be reconciled to God: that is, to believe in Christ, and acquiesce in the divine plan of salvation, which is called submitting to the righteousness of God.

The apostles never professed, like this arrogant priest, to put themselves forward as Christ's substitutes. They did not even call themselves ministers of reconciliation, as the Popish priests do. They were only ministers of the word of reconciliation, which is an expression of precisely the same import as the modern phrase, preachers of the gospel. They were indeed ambassadors of Christ. They received their commission directly from himself. They were endowed with extraordinary and miraculous powers for the exercise of their functions; and so guided by the Holy Spirit in all their ministrations, as to declare the mind of their master with infallible certainty. In these respects they had no successors; and there is no need of any; for they are to us in their writings as much the ambassadors of Christ as they were to those who were subjects of their personal preaching. By their word they are still beseeching men in the name of Christ to be reconciled to God.

Let no one imagine that by these remarks I mean to undervalue a standing ministry in the churches of Christ; I know this to be as really of divine appointment as the apostolic office itself. I know that he who gave apostles and prophets, for laying the foundation of the church, gave also pastors and teachers for its edifying, or building up. But the latter have no right to put themselves in the place of the former, much less to exalt themselves above them, as the silliest Popish priest does, when he requires persons to confess their secret sins to him, and when he gives himself out as a minister of reconciliation, as one who is able to grant pardon of sin by means of his sacraments, and to restore sinners to the favour and friendship of their offended Creator.

No. XCIV.

SATURDAY, April 29th, 1820.

The subject of satisfaction for sin is intimately connected with that of confession. The one, indeed, is incomplete without the other; for let a sinner make ever so good a confession, and let him even have received full absolution, it is necessary that he perform his penance; that is, make satisfaction to divine justice for his sins, in his own person. That I may do the church of Rome all manner of justice, I shall, as usual, lay down the doctrine in the very words of their own standard authors. The following is Gother's statement of what the church of Rome disavows, and of what she avows; which was published and approved "by the late venerable and reverend Dr Richard Challoner, Bishop of Debra, and Vicar Apostolic of the London district. The twentieth edition."

"Of Satisfaction. The Papist misrepresented, believes very injuriously of Christ's passion, being persuaded that his sufferings and death were not sufficiently satisfactory for our sins, but that it is necessary for every one to make satisfaction for themselves. And for this end, after he has been at confession, the priest enjoins him a penance; by the performance of which, he is to satisfy for his offences: and thus confidently relying on his own penitential works, he utterly evacuates Christ's passion; and though he professes himself a Christian, and that Christ is his Saviour, yet by his little trusting to him, he seems to think him to be no better than what his crucifix informs him, that is, a mere wooden one.

"The Papist truly represented, believes it damnable to think injuriously of Christ's passion. Nevertheless he believes, that though condign satisfaction for the guilt of sin, and the pain eternally due to it, be proper only to Christ our Saviour; yet penitent sinners being redeemed by Christ, and made his members, may in some measure satisfy by prayers, fasting, alms, &c. for the temporal pain, which, by order of God's justice, sometimes remains due after the guilt and the eternal pains are remitted. So that trusting in Christ as his Redeemer, he yet does not think that by Christ's sufferings every Christian is discharged of his particular sufferings, but that every one is to suffer something for himself, as St Paul did, who, by many tribulations, and by suffering in his own flesh, filled up that which was behind of the passions of Christ; and this not only for himself, but for the whole church, Coloss. i. 24; and this he finds everywhere in Scripture, viz. people admonished of the greatness of their sins, doing penance in fasting, sackcloth, and ashes, and by voluntary austerities, endeavouring to satisfy divine justice. And these personal satisfactions God has sufficiently also reminded him of in the punishments inflicted on Moses, Aaron, David, and infinite others; and even in the afflictions sent by God upon our own age, in plagues, wars, fires, persecutions, rebellions, and such like: which few are so atheistical but they confess to be sent from heaven, for the just chastisement of our sins; and which we are to undergo, notwithstanding the infinite satisfaction made by Christ, and without any undervaluing it. Now, being thus convinced of some temporal punishment being due to his sins, he accepts of all tribulations, whether in body, name, or estate, from whencesoever they come, and with others of his own choosing, offers them up to God, for the discharging his debt; still confessing that his offence deserves yet more. But these penitential works he is taught to be no otherwise satisfactory, than as joined and applied to the satisfaction Jesus made upon the cross; in virtue of which alone, all our good works find a grateful acceptance in God's sight."

The above is the entire chapter on satisfaction. I request the reader to study it closely, and then to say if he does not find that what is called the misrepresentation, is substantially the same as the representation: and this is the case with most of the articles in the work. The author gives what Protestants allege against the church of Rome, in such language as he chooses to put in their mouths: he usually begins his answer with a sentence of damnation; and then, with a "nevertheless," he comes round to admit and defend the very same doctrines, though in different words, and generally in words which are less explicit, and therefore more susceptible of a double meaning.

Take for instance the first sentence of what is called the misrepresentation in the above extract:—The Papist "believes very injuriously of Christ's passion, being persuaded that his sufferings and death were not sufficiently satisfactory for our sins; but that it is necessary for every one to make satisfaction for themselves," or "for himself," as it should be; for Papists do not write very grammatically. Compare this with the following words of the Papist truly represented, and say where is the difference? "Penitent sinners being redeemed by Christ, and made his members, may in some measure satisfy by prayers, fasting, alms, &c. for the temporal pain, which, by order of God's justice, sometimes remains due after the guilt and eternal pains are remitted." And "by voluntary austerities endeavouring to satisfy divine justice." Here it is plainly admitted, that persons may in some measure satisfy divine justice for themselves, which is the very thing alleged against them, in what they call a misrepresentation of them; and that this is a disparagement of the passion of Christ, and a declaration that his sufferings and death were not sufficiently satisfactory, must be evident to all who understand the terms.

The following sentence alone contains the substance of what Protestants allege against the church of Rome; and there cannot be a plainer avowal that Papists consider the sufferings of Christ as not sufficient. "So that trusting in Christ as his Redeemer, he yet does not think that by Christ's sufferings every Christian is discharged of his particular sufferings, but that every one is to suffer something for himself, as St Paul did," &c. We shall see by and by, that St Paul did no such thing; but maintained the very opposite doctrine, namely, that he would trust, or glory in nothing but the cross of Christ, that is, in Christ's suffering to the death as an atoning sacrifice—a sacrifice by which divine justice was fully satisfied.

If a man were to speak ever so truly of the light of the sun at noon, and to say that he trusted in it as very useful to enable him to follow his lawful calling; but if "nevertheless" he would insist on setting up a farthing candle as a necessary or profitable addition, and above all, if he paid much more attention to the trimming and admiring his farthing candle, than to using the light of the sun for its proper purposes, all the world would say that he considered the sun's light as insufficient; nay, that he despised it, and thought very injuriously of it, seeing he found himself so deficient in point of light, as to be under the necessity of making an addition of his own.

My simile falls short of what I mean to represent by it; for there is light in a burning farthing candle; and when it is held up in the face of the sun there is more light than there was before. There is an actual addition of light, however imperceptible; but with regard to the point in hand, it is absolutely impossible for all the creatures in the universe to make an addition to the satisfaction which Christ made to divine justice by his sufferings; and, therefore, the man who attempts to make such an addition, believes more "injuriously of Christ's passion," than the man does of the light of the sun who attempts to help it by means of a farthing candle.

This is not a subject to be treated with levity. It requires to be considered with the utmost seriousness; though when Papists speak of their satisfying divine justice in some measure, we cannot think that they are serious, but upon the supposition that they consider God as such a one as themselves, as one who thinks lightly of sin, and whose justice is easily satisfied.

God, as our creator and lawgiver, is entitled to the constant and entire obedience of our hearts, and of our whole lives. But we have failed in this duty of obedience; and by our disobedience have become enemies to God in our minds, and by wicked works. As enemies we deserve to suffer the wrath of God to the uttermost. There can be nothing meritorious in the sufferings of persons who deserve to suffer. The sufferings of sinners, therefore, can never satisfy divine justice, or effect their reconciliation with God. The law by which transgressors are condemned, makes no provision for their reconciliation, but hands them over to the executioner of divine vengeance. To satisfy divine justice, it is necessary to suffer to the full extent of what one's sins deserve; and no man in the world can do this, for the wages of sin is death;—the penalty of transgression is everlasting destruction.

To satisfy divine justice for the sins of men, nothing less would be accepted than the sufferings of one who had no sin. Thus the perfect holiness of Jesus Christ is declared to have been essentially necessary, in order to his making satisfaction for the sins of his people. Had he had any sin of his own, all that he suffered would have been due to divine justice on his own account, and he could not have effected the reconciliation of himself, much less that of others. "Such an High Priest became us (was necessary for us), who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens; who needeth not daily, as those high priests (under the law), to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's," Heb. vii. 26, 27. He offered sacrifice for the sins of the people when he offered up himself; but in order to his doing this acceptably and availably, it was necessary that he should have no sin of his own. His sacrifice satisfied divine justice, because it was a sacrifice "without spot;" and because it was presented by him, who, "though he was a Son, yet learned obedience by the things which he suffered; and who, being made perfect, became the author of eternal salvation to all them who obey him;" Heb. v. 8, 9.

Now, the effect of Christ's suffering is, eternal life to all them that obey him; that is, to all who believe in him; for to believe in Christ is the obedience of the gospel. This is the work of God, that we believe on him whom he hath sent. Faith in Christ is the first thing that God requires of every sinner to whom the gospel is sent; it is the first thing that he will acknowledge and accept, as of the nature of obedience to his command; and it is the root and animating principle of all other obedience.

Now the satisfaction to divine justice which Christ made by his sufferings and death, is declared to be so absolutely perfect and complete, as to effect the full and everlasting reconciliation of all who believe in him. "By him all that believe are justified from all things, from which they could not be justified by the law of Moses," Acts xiii. 39. According to the tenor of the new covenant, the Almighty declares concerning all who are interested in it, "their sins and iniquities I will remember no more," Heb. viii. 12. Those who by nature were far from God, both in state and character, "are made nigh by the blood of Christ," Eph. ii. 13. "And you," says the apostle Paul to the believers in Colosse, chap. i. 21, 22; "you that were sometime alienated, and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled in the body of his flesh through death, to present you holy, and unblameable, and unreproveable, in his sight." Now, such is the high privilege of those who are so reconciled to God by Jesus Christ, that nothing at all stands marked against them. "There is no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus," Rom. viii. 1. Their sins are blotted out absolutely and for ever, so far as regards punishment in any sense of the word; and it would not be consistent with justice to exact the smallest degree of punishment, seeing Jesus Christ made full satisfaction, when he gave his life a ransom for them.

No man, who understands the nature and design of Christ's sufferings, could imagine for a moment, that God still required something in the way of suffering, by sinners themselves, in order to satisfy his justice. The idea is absolutely heathenish. It has its origin in false notions of the character of God, such as prevail among all heathens, and among all who have corrupted the true religion, and who change the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man. This notion, however, is interwoven with the very essence of Popery. Without her confession, and her satisfaction to divine justice, by stripes or by money, the church of Rome would be as destitute as the poor idolater, Micah, who exclaimed, "You have taken away my gods, and what have I more?"

It may be worth while to spend a few minutes in considering the sort of satisfaction which Papists profess to make to divine justice, in order to escape the temporal pain which is due to their sins;—these are "prayers, fasting, alms, &c." and "voluntary austerities." And so, it seems, in the esteem of the holy and infallible church of Rome, prayer is considered a suffering and a punishment, by which, among other things, they expect to make atonement for their sins. Among Christians, it is considered a precious privilege to have access to God, in the name of Christ, by prayer and supplication, for those things which we have need of: but among Papists, the case is very different; their prayers are things in which most of them can take no interest, being chiefly in an unknown tongue; and consisting in the incessant repetition of the same words, without having any distinct ideas attached to them. It is quite natural to look upon such an exercise as a punishment: the error consists in supposing that it is an atonement for sin. Under the notion of its being a punishment, there was policy in ordaining prayer to be in an unknown tongue; but it is surprising that they do not use a language less musical than the Latin. What exquisite torture would the low Dutch, or Anglo-Northumbrian, inflict upon an Italian ear!

I grant that a person may suffer a great deal by fasting, if carried to excess; but so far as it is prescribed as a Christian duty, I have no doubt it is salutary both to body and mind. Almsgiving can be considered as a punishment only by persons who worship their money, and who believe not the words of Christ, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

There may be suffering enough under the head of voluntary austerities; but to think that God is pleased with such things, nay, that he is so well pleased with them, as to accept them "gratefully" as a satisfaction for sin, shows that the most false and degrading notions of the character of God are entertained by the church of Rome. When one thinks of the bloody character of Popery as it appears in this article alone, he cannot help comparing Romish worship with the cruel rites of heathen idolatry; and though he must allow that the worshippers of Juggernaut exceed in their austerities and self-tortures any thing that he sees among Papists, he considers both as acting upon the same principle; both serving an idol that delights in human misery—that requires one to torture his own flesh; another to offer the fruit of his body, as a satisfaction for the sin of his soul.

I shall not torture the minds of my readers by describing the bloody austerities, either enjoined or voluntary, which Papists practise in the way of penance, in order to satisfy divine justice. I shall confine myself to such as are more harmless, and such as are ludicrous, of which I could present an abundant catalogue.

St Dominick began to afflict his body at a very early period of life; for we learn from the Golden Legend, printed in London, 1527, that while yet an infant he would often rise out of his cradle, and lay himself naked upon the cold ground. The author does not inform us what were the particular sins for which the infant imposed this penance on himself. St Francis, as Bonaventure testifies, used to call his body, Brother Ass, because of the rigorous severities, continual whippings, and coarse diet, with which he treated it. Indeed, if he treated his ass in the same manner as his own body, he was guilty of great injustice to the innocent beast, that had never confessed any sin that required penance. The saint took care to sprinkle all his food with ashes. If he had done the same with an ass's food, it is likely the good sense of the beast would have induced him to leave the whole mess to his master. St Ignatius, the father of the Jesuits, immediately after his conversion, put himself incognito into an hospital, where he fasted whole weeks with bread and water, except on Sundays, when he eat a few boiled herbs, but sprinkled with a good seasoning of ashes. He girded himself with an iron chain, wore a hair shirt, gave himself a comfortable whipping three times a day, slept little, and lay upon the cold ground. He resolved to continue these austerities all his life, to go barefoot to the holy land, and then choose a wild desert for his permanent residence. When he had first begun to gather disciples in Paris, and had gained Peter Faber to him, he used with him to lie abroad in winter evenings upon the snow and ice, gazing upon the heavens; and then stripping themselves to their shirts, lay the remaining part of the night upon the cold heap. St Macarius did penance by going naked six months in a desert, suffering himself to be stung with flies. This penance the saint had imposed upon himself for the sin of having killed a flea. See a work entitled, The Enthusiasm of the Church of Rome, which contains great abundance of such matter.

It would be to burlesque all religion to say that such things as these are acceptable to God, or that they are sufferings which satisfy divine justice; yet the church of Rome holds them forth in this light; and at this very day, in Ireland, the poor people are so deluded by their priests, as to believe that by such means they can make satisfaction for their sins. A gentleman of that kingdom, at present in Scotland, tells me that it is a common thing with the priests there, to enjoin upon their penitents a long journey, as a suitable satisfaction to divine justice for the sins which they have confessed. A sinner in a remote district is thus compelled to travel to the county town, which is, perhaps, forty miles distant, and the priest takes special care that the work shall be done; for the penitent must bring a ticket from the clergyman of the place, to certify that he was there; if such clergyman be an ordinary priest the ticket costs so much; if a bishop so much more; and the penitent must be very careful that he attend to no other business in that journey, but that of making satisfaction to divine justice, or doing penance for his sins. If he do any other business whatever, he loses the whole benefit of his journey, and must do it over again. My friend relates an instance of a poor man who had performed his penance to the extent enjoined upon him. He appeared before the clergyman of the place to receive his ticket; but the holy father observing a piece of new leather in his pocket, asked what it meant. "Why, please your reverence," said the poor man, "I have bought a bit of leather in this town to mend my shoes when I go home." The priest kindly told him that this vitiated his whole work of satisfaction; so he was sent home without his ticket, to make his journey over again.

The Papist truly represented says, that "he does not think that by the sufferings of Christ, every Christian is discharged of his particular sufferings; but that every one is to suffer something for himself, as St Paul did, who, by many tribulations, and by suffering in his own flesh, filled up that which was behind of the passions of Christ, and this not only for himself, but for the whole church." Let it be observed that the representer is speaking of such sufferings as satisfy, in some measure, divine justice; and let the reader look at the apostle's own words, Coloss. i. 24, and he will see that they imply no such thing as Papists would extort from them. The apostle is speaking of the afflictions which awaited him in the discharge of his duty as an ambassador of Christ, and which he willingly endured for the sake of the church; but none but a Papist would ever attempt to fix upon him the absurdity and impiety of adding, by his sufferings, to those of Christ, by which he satisfied divine justice for the sins of his people.

There are many errors contained in this one article of Popery, which I have barely room to mention, as I do not wish to occupy another Number with the subject:—First, it is maintained that after the eternal punishment of sin is remitted, in consequence of Christ's satisfaction, divine justice still requires some temporal punishment, which is contrary to all that the Bible teaches with regard to the perfection of Christ's sacrifice, and the full acquittal of all who believe in him. Secondly, the afflictions of Christians in this world are considered as punishments inflicted by divine justice; whereas they are really the effects of divine goodness, and are beneficial to those who are tried by them. A third error, besides those which I have exposed at length, is that which represents the punishment of nations by plagues, wars, &c. as inflictions of divine justice, "notwithstanding the infinite satisfaction made by Christ," as if this were something that God required to satisfy his justice over and above what Christ suffered. Now the sufferings of Christ have no relation at all to nations as such, but only to the individuals of all nations who believe in him. The wicked suffer the punishment of their own sins; but never to the extent of satisfying divine justice; therefore their suffering continues for ever.

No. XCV.

SATURDAY, May 6th, 1820.

My Galloway correspondent, who subscribes himself "A Friend to Fair Dealing," has favoured me with a long and pretty well written letter. The greater part of it consists of remarks on my reply to his queries in my 85th Number, with which he is not satisfied. The things on which he animadverts, however, regard rather myself and my writings, than the public cause in which I am engaged. For instance, he affects to find me wrong in asserting that it never was a matter of consideration with me or my Protestant readers, what we would, and would not permit government to do. He accuses the good citizens of Glasgow of not permitting government to do something, when they opposed the church bill. He is not pleased with my allusion to the man in the moon. He is still of opinion that I ought to attack the Radical Reformers, as being more dangerous than the Papists; but I hope he is convinced by this time that the Radicals are under the control of much more powerful weapons than my pen. He thinks that my writings have too long turned aside the eyes of my readers from the real cause of alarm, and directed them to a quarter which bears no very threatening aspect in comparison of the other. And he labours at great length to justify the practice of the priest's taking money for church dues from poor widows, even though they are supported by public charity. If I were to insert all that he has written on these subjects, and make particular replies, it would take me over a great deal of ground that I have already trodden, and it would fill two or three Numbers, which would be too great an encroachment on the reader's patience. He has, however, brought forward some new matter, which I shall give in his own words, and add such remarks as I may think necessary.

"In perusing," says he, "some of your later Numbers, I have had occasion to notice some very good specimens of your impartiality and consistency of argument. You mention with much approbation the establishment of the Hibernian Schools, for the purpose of teaching the people of Ireland to read the Bible. All this is very good; but from some passages which have escaped you, it would appear that your approbation of them proceeds from a desire to diminish the authority of the Catholic religion, and to make proselytes to Protestantism, as much as from any desire to communicate instruction. 'Had the same efforts,' you say, 'been made fifty years ago,' that are made now, and which you blame British Christians for not doing sooner, 'the Pope would not at this day have had such hold of the consciences of the Irish people: and it is to be hoped that fifty years hence he will have no hold of them at all.' In order to preserve the semblance of liberality, to be sure, you say that you would not deprive them of the privilege of endeavouring to gain converts; of doing what they can by fair argument, to make proselytes. From what follows, however, it appears that you would wish to make the privilege turn to as little account as possible, because you express a doubt if there be such a thing as fair argument among them, and assure us that you never saw or heard of it. You give every encouragement in your power to Protestants to tell Papists that they are in error, and that they are training up their people in error and idolatry. You establish it as the undoubted right of the British Legislature to establish schools for the education of the subjects; and I suppose you would consider it to be a very arbitrary government which would deprive any society or individual of the privilege of educating their children in their own religious principles. I suppose if Mr Scott or Dr Kelly were to employ any of their communion to come into your house, or that of any of your Protestant friends, and teach your or their children, to furnish them with Popish catechisms, and to bring them up in the Catholic faith;—if further, when you were employing your paternal authority and influence to prevent such teachers from obtaining a residence with you, and your children from listening to their instructions, (as I take it for granted you would,) they should ask you, as you do them, 'What right have you to such influence?' and should accuse you of rebellion and sedition for employing it: would not you have reason, think you, to complain of 'efforts made to diminish your influence, and mar your interference, in the religious and moral education of your children?' Yet at the same time you will take every liberty short of absolute force, to instruct, that is to convert, Papist children (because you are sure they cannot be saved unless they are converted); but you will neither allow Papists the exclusive right of the religious and moral education of the youth of their communion, nor to enforce the rules of their order upon those who depart from them.

"In proposing further queries to you, I would mention the following as one. In the beginning of your answer alluded to, you set out by saying, that 'an obscure son of the church has done you the honour of addressing you a letter,' alluding to the one I formerly sent you; and that 'it is the only one you have received from holy church since you published that of W. D. By 'the church,' and the 'holy church,' I take it for granted you mean the Catholic church; and by my being a 'son of that church,' it is equally clear you are satisfied that I am a Catholic. Now I ask you, by what superior illumination, gift of the Spirit, or mechanical impulse, were you assured that I was a Catholic? or to speak more rationally, from what premises in my letter could you draw such a conclusion?

"It seems indeed to be a maxim with you to form conclusions from very lame premises, to ascribe actions to motives very foreign to them, and to force consequences out of them, which they were never intended or never calculated to produce; insomuch that were you appointed a judge upon men and their conduct, I suspect that your decisions would be at least equally summary and unwarrantable with those of the Pope, or the court of Inquisition. You who can confidently arraign the Archbishop of Tuam with the guilt of denying original sin, because, in a common mode of speaking, which perhaps no man but yourself would have taken offence at, and which is surely not more objectionable than your "immense files of letters," he mentioned the 'innocent and unsuspecting youth of his charge;' —you who insinuate a charge of rebellion against the Papists on account of their claiming, what every one of us claims, and what government establishes, viz. a right to educate the youth of their communion in their own principles, and to use their endeavours to prevent others from interfering with that right: you who can confidently pronounce W. D. to be no Christian, if he do not at your requisition immediately leave the communion of the church of Rome, and who can infallibly judge that he does not wish to serve God from his heart with all his strength, for this very reason because he is a Papist;—you who can make a Papist guilty of renouncing his Saviour, and forfeiting his eternal salvation, because he believes in transubstantiation, &c. &c.—will find no difficulty in pronouncing one to be a Papist, which with you, I suppose, is a term synonymous with a reprobate, merely because he does what every one is bound to do, namely, to expose error and misrepresentation wherever he sees it, and against what party soever it is employed.

"From your unchristianizing of W. D. if he continue in the church of Rome, and declaring all Papists void of sincerity in the service of God, because they are such;—from your pronouncing the church of Rome to be the antitype of Babylon; the place where Satan has his seat; the reverse of what the name she retains, (that is, Christian) implies; and that the gates of hell have prevailed against her; —as well as from many other inferences you draw from the Popish faith and worship,—I think it may be understood, that you hold for certain that the church of Rome is not the church of Christ; and that therefore, it is the duty of all Christians to withdraw themselves from her communion, and to renounce her jurisdiction. Believing that these are your sentiments till you contradict them, I now ask you, as my concluding question at present, Upon what warrantable grounds do you hold the foresaid opinions?

"When you have answered these, you may expect some more queries and remarks on your work, from—"A FRIEND TO FAIR DEALING."

I have quoted only about a third part of the letter, and yet I have introduced a good deal of matter that is merely personal, and that has little relation to the questions at issue between the church of Rome and THE PROTESTANT; and which, therefore, I shall despatch in as few words as possible. For instance, of what importance is it to the public to be informed how I knew that the writer was a Papist? He does not deny the fact: and if I inferred it from "very lame premises," he ought to give me the more credit for my sagacity. Short as his first letter was, I guessed, from the style and manner of it, that the writer was a Papist. I have now become so familiar with the Popish mode of writing, that I find it as easy to distinguish it as to distinguish the features of a Jew in the streets of London. I would not pretend to decide with infallible certainty in either case; because it is possible to be mistaken; and I might have been mistaken with regard to the religion of my correspondent. Had it been so, I would readily have acknowledged it; but I shall not easily be induced to make an apology for being right.

My correspondent might have satisfied himself, without so many words, that I hold for certain that the church of Rome is not the church of Christ: and that it is the duty of all Christians in her communion, if there be any, to withdraw themselves from her immediately. This I hold as a fundamental principle in my controversy with the church of Rome. I declare that she is not the church of Christ, but the greatest enemy that Christ and his church ever had in the world; and when my correspondent asks upon what warrantable ground I hold such an opinion, I must refer him to what I have already written. It has been my object under every head of discussion to draw this inference, that the religion of Rome is the very opposite of the religion of Christ. The church of Christ is built upon the "foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone;" but the church of Rome is built upon human tradition; and she does not even profess to have a more solid foundation than a fallible creature, whom she calls St Peter. The church of Christ acknowledges only one object of worship; namely, "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ;" but Rome, falsely called Christian, has as many objects of worship as Rome pagan had. Every member of the church of Christ is taught to deny his own righteousness, however great it may appear to be in the sight of fellow-creatures, and to trust in that of Christ alone for the salvation of his soul; but the members of the church of Rome are taught to trust in their own righteousness, and in that of mere creatures like themselves; to trust in their own works, or in the works of some whom they call saints. The church of Christ is composed of persons who are born again; "created anew after Christ Jesus unto good works;" that is, who are subjects of the Holy Spirit's gracious and powerful influence, and who are made holy in life and conversation; but the church of Rome does not even pretend to any greater regeneration than a priest can effect by means of his holy water; and she does not exhibit in the conduct of her members, not even in that of her priests, more real holiness of life than is to be found among mere men of the world, who make no pretensions to Christianity. The church of Rome, therefore, is not the church of Christ, but the counterfeit and the enemy of it. My correspondent might have seen this, if he had read all my papers with attention; and if he has not read them all, I request that he will do so without delay; and this may perhaps save him the trouble of writing some of the other queries which he has in reserve to send me, as it is likely he will find that I have answered them already. I shall be glad, however, to receive as many as he pleases; and I shall answer them too, if they shall be such as relate to the subjects of the controversy.

If I had not guessed the fact before, I would have discovered that this "Friend to Fair Dealing" was a Papist, from the unfair manner in which he perverts my words and misrepresents my meaning. I did not bring a charge of rebellion against Papists for claiming a right to educate the youth of their communion in their own principles; but I do charge them with opposing the benevolent design of their Protestant neighbours and rulers, when they do all that lies in their power to prevent them from teaching poor children to read the Bible. I did charge the Pope with an impertinent interference with the civil and domestic affairs of Ireland; and I do not hesitate to say that those bishops and priests who encourage, and endeavour to give effect to such interference, are guilty of a misdemeanour, which in some countries would be held equal to rebellion. I did not say that W. D. was no Christian if he did not at my requisition immediately leave the communion of the Church of Rome; but because if he did not so, he was not a man of his word; and I would say of any Protestant as well as of any Papist, if he is not a man of his word he is not a Christian. Speaking of my correspondent himself, I did not call him "an obscure son of the church," as he pretends to quote my words; but "a more obscure," &c., that is, more obscure than the Pope and the Popish Archbishop of Tuam, whom I had just mentioned. I spoke of him as obscure only comparatively, but not absolutely; for he may be a priest for any thing that I know.

It is true, indeed, that I did in effect charge the Popish Archbishop with denying original sin, when he spoke of the innocent youth of his communion; and I would say the same of any other man who should use such language in a public address intended for the direction of persons who are called teachers of religion. I know that in light conversation, where words are often used in a loose sense, it is usual to call those innocent who are comparatively so; and, if speaking of actual sin, I would have no hesitation in calling infants innocent: but the Archbishop was not speaking of infants, but of youth, whose original depravity must have manifested itself in many of the bitter fruits of actual transgression: and we cannot suppose him to use words in a loose sense in a well-studied address to all the learned clergy of his diocese. As, however, the church of Rome holds the doctrine of original sin, and as it would not be the design of the Archbishop to deny it, he ought not to be offended, but rather to thank me for admonishing him to be more careful of his language.

I readily confess, that if Mr Scott and Dr Kelly were to come into my house, and to attempt to inculcate nonsense and blasphemy even upon my servants, I would send them about their business; and I hope all my Protestant friends would do the same; but this is not the true state of the question: my correspondent, in the most Jesuitical manner, shifts it off the proper ground. I was speaking of the Popish influence which was exercised, not in the way of teaching Popery, but in the way of opposing the teaching of the Bible. I even went so far as to concede to Papists the right of doing all that they could do, by means of fair argument, to gain proselytes, and to prevent their people from becoming Protestants; but I am far from conceding to them the right of preventing Protestants from doing what they can by mere persuasion to gain Papists, young or old, from error and idolatry, to the knowledge of the truth and the service of Jesus Christ. Popish priests have no right to speak of their children, because they cannot lawfully have any; but supposing Dr Kelly and Mr Scott to have numerous families, I would not think it lawful to force myself into the midst of them, and to endeavour to convert them, without their consent. I have no wish to diminish the lawful influence of parents of any religious persuasion, or to prevent their interference in what they may consider for the good of their families; but what I complain of is the influence, and the interference, that will not permit those who wish for education to themselves and families to receive it. I claim no right to thrust myself into Popish families against their will, though my object should be the important one of teaching the word of God; but when both parents and children are willing to be taught, and eagerly desiring to learn to read the Bible, as many of them are, I should consider myself entitled, nay, urgently called upon, to gratify their desire, and that in spite of all the priests in the world: and I do complain of the influence of the priests exercised to prevent those who desire instruction from receiving it. This is an influence and interference which ought to be marred and effectually put down, for it is inconsistent with British freedom, as well as with the benign spirit of Christianity.

My correspondent is right when he says, "I am sure that Papist children cannot be saved unless they be converted." I am perfectly sure of this; and I am equally sure that neither can Protestant children be saved unless they be converted. The word of God concludes all under sin; and there is no name by which any can be saved but that of Jesus Christ; and my object in recommending the Hibernian and other societies, that are teaching the poor Irish to read the Bible, is not with the view of making them Protestants merely, but of making them Christians, through the knowledge of that Saviour whom the Bible reveals. I would "not allow the Papists the exclusive right of the religious and moral education of the youth of their communion;" for they have no title to it. Every youth among them has a right to seek for the best education he can get, and every British subject has a right to communicate instruction to all who are willing to receive it.

The cavils of my correspondent admit of a much larger exposure; but I satisfy myself with the above, which I hope will also satisfy my readers in general, though it will not satisfy him. I conclude the present Number with the declaration of another Irish Bishop against the use of the Bible in Schools; which is taken from an Irish newspaper.

TO THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CLERGY OF THE DIOCESE OF CLOYNE AND ROSS.

"REVEREND BRETHREN,

"During a series of years, from the time that schools were opened in Ireland, under the patronage of humane and respectable Protestants, for the professed purpose of educating poor Catholic children gratuitously, without infringing in any respect upon their religious principles, we have had repeated cause to complain that these liberal professions were uniformly deviated from; and so widely as to force us into effectual opposition. It was, we imagined, to be presumed, that when the education of the Irish poor became a national concern; when a great number of distinguished personages noted for rank, learning, and affluence, formed an association avowedly for this benevolent purpose; when the Imperial Parliament not only patronised the measure, but supported it by an abundant annual grant,—it was, we hoped, to be presumed, that the narrow views of certain bigoted individuals would be liberalized by the above expanded association, and would merge in its wide liberality. We were the more warranted in this hope by the third article of the laws, which were to regulate the proceedings of the association; for it is there expressly declared, that the leading principle of the Society is to afford equal facilities fer education, to all professing Christians, without any attempt to interfere with the peculiar religious opinions of any.—Yet, in too many instances it became difficult to reconcile the practice of the association with its previous professions. But at the last general meeting in Kildare-street, on the 24th day of February, the rejection of Mr O'Connell's motion by so great a majority as 80 against 19, has evinced beyond the powers of tergiversation, that the professions of the society were not intended to regulate its practice; but that under the name of education, proselytism was the determined object. To Mr O'Connell, for his spirited exertions on this occasion, the thanks of Catholic Ireland are eminently due; and surely, if confiding apathy had hitherto benumbed any individual among us, the present electrifying fact must restore his energies, and rouse him to a due sense of the danger. With you, my Rev. Brethren, I am long and intimately acquainted.—Your sentiments on the Bible without note or comment, as an initiatory book for schools, are well known to me. It is important, however, at this juncture, and after what was flippantly asserted at the above meeting, that these sentiments be emphatically declared to the entire kingdom. The Roman Catholic clergy of every other diocese, may now probably feel bound to proclaim their sentiments also. For my own part, I have long since recorded mine upon this subject. The brightest luminaries of the Protestant church have led the way for us, with arguments, to this very moment, unanswered. I shall not here advert to them; neither is it necessary that you should. Your opinion, I am confident, will be unanimous, and in perfect accord with what has been lately published by the most Rev. Dr Kelly, of Tuam, the Rt. Rev. Dr Boyle of Kildare and Leighlin, and the Rt. Rev. Dr Archdeacon of Kilmacdugh and Kilfenora. The plan suggested by the last named prelate, and more forcibly recommended by Mr O'Connell, for educating children of the different religions, in the same school, without any reference to religious subjects, which may more properly be treated by their own clergy in their respective places of worship, has my entire assent, and shall have my most cordial co-operation. Mutual confidence, good understanding, and brotherly regard, may be thus happily promoted throughout this hitherto distracted country; a blessing so invaluable, that every effort should be made by us for the attainment of it. No real friend of Ireland will, I trust, be backward to affix his name, and contribute his support, to Mr O'Connell's project of a national association for educating the Irish poor. That such project may be speedily adopted, and that it may promote all the good intended by the benevolent patrons of it, is the ardent prayer of your faithfully devoted friend and humble servant,

"WILLIAM COPINGER."
R. C. Bishop.

Cove, March 6th, 1820.

No. XCVI.

SATURDAY, MAY 13TH, 1820.

I THOUGHT I had done with Dr Kelly of Tuam, when I finished my remarks on his own archiepiscopal manifesto against the Bible and the schools in which it is taught; but I find that this manifesto, together with that of the Pope which occasioned it, has laid the foundation of certain proceedings which require to be noticed in such a work as "THE PROTESTANT." It is evident that the Popish clergy in Ireland are in such a state of anxiety and alarm as was never witnessed before. They are in the condition of persons who know that there is an enemy at their door, and this enemy is the Bible. This is precisely the state in which I wish to see them, while they look upon the Bible as an enemy; but whenever they shall become reconciled to it, and accept of it as a precious gift of God to sinful men, I wish that their alarm may cease, and that they may enjoy all the peace and comfort which it imparts to every one who truly receives it as the word of God.

I concluded my last Number with an address by Bishop Coppinger to the clergy of his diocese, in which he also discovers his dread of that alarming book, which has been in fact the occasion of all the calamities which have befallen the church of Rome, during the last three hundred years. Our Irish Papists have found out that the Bible is not only formidable in the hands of men and women; but that even in the hands of children it is a most dangerous weapon. Children, therefore, must not be trusted with it, lest they should become champions of Protestantism, and eventually overthrow the infallible church.

Following up the address of the said Bishop, a number of Popish clergymen met, and adopted the following resolutions, which I take from the Cork Mercantile Chronicle of March 27, 1820:—

"We, the Roman Catholic Clergy of the diocese of Cloyne and Ross, being called upon by our Bishop, the Right Rev. Doctor Coppinger, to declare our sentiments concerning the introduction of the Bible, without note or comment, as an initiatory book into Catholic schools, have resolved unanimously, at our several Conferences holden in the course of this present month:

"First—That in the profession of faith adopted universally throughout the whole Catholic Church, it is stated: 'I also admit the holy Scriptures, according to that sense which our holy mother, the church, has held and doth hold, to which it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of the Scriptures: neither will I ever take and interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers.'—This article of our belief, precluding, as it does, all private and arbitrary interpretation of the Scriptures, wisely guards the unlearned and unstable of our communion against wresting the sacred volume to their own destruction: it further goes to prevent their being carried about by every wind of doctrine, while it tends to effect what the Redeemer so strongly inculcates, viz. that 'we be all one, as He and his heavenly Father are one:' or, as the apostle has it, 'that we be all of one mind, and that there be no schism among us'—while, moreover, it assuredly does not sanction the Bible, without note or comment, as a fit school-book for thoughtless and inconsiderate children.

"Resolved, Secondly—That however we respect those distinguished personages who patronize and support an opposite system, we never can acknowledge in them, or in any society of laymen, a right to regulate the religious concerns of the poor children committed to our care, much less to force upon them a plan of education obviously incompatible with the principles of their religion.

"Thirdly—That duly appreciating the advantages of a well-regulated education for the poor, we shall be ever ready to co-operate with the liberal and beneficent Protestants of our respective parishes in establishing schools on any practicable plan, not clashing with our tenets.

"Fourthly—That the foregoing resolutions be signed by the several Masters of Conference, in the name and on the behalf of ninety-nine Clergymen, respectively attending these meetings.

"Fifthly—That the avowals elicited by Counsellor O'Connell, at the last general meeting of the education society, in Kildare-street, are to us a subject of regret, equally, and of alarm: we shall not be unmindful of them. The splendid advocacy of that gentleman, in the cause of religious freedom, on the present occasion, demands our warmest acknowledgments, and we beg leave hereby most respectfully to present them.

"The Rev. Wm. O'BRIEN, Vicar-General presiding in the Conference of Buttevant.

"The Rev. J. BURKE, D. D. presiding in the Conference of Fermoy.
"The Rev. JAMES WALSH, Secretary of the Conference of Midleton.
"The Rev. JAMES MOLONY, presiding in the Conference of Donoughmore.
"The Rev. DAVID WALSH, presiding in the Conference of Rosscarbery."

The above resolutions refer to a Society which has been in active operation for about nine years, and by which many of the poor in Ireland have been taught to read, without distinction of religious profession. It was a fundamental rule and leading principle of the Society, "to afford equal facilities for education to all classes of professing Christians, without any attempt to interfere with the peculiar religious opinions of any;" and that "the Scriptures, without note or comment, shall be read" in the schools; "but all catechisms and books of religious controversy excluded." The Society was composed of both Protestants and Papists; and they proceeded for some time without any apparent schism, doing a great deal of good; but some of the more keen-sighted Papists began to perceive what they thought a snake in the grass. They found out that the permission of the Bible, without note or comment, was likely to produce consequences not very favourable to their religion; and that, moreover, it was inconsistent with the rules of holy church. An attempt was made to expunge that rule of the Society which regarded the reading of the Bible; which, however, was effectually resisted. A similar attempt was made, in another form, at a meeting of the Society, on the 24th of February last. The champion of Bible exclusion, on this occasion, was Daniel O'Connell, Esq., whose speech is given at length, in a Report of the proceedings of the meeting, for which I have to thank my indefatigable correspondent in Lifford. If I were to give the speech entire, it would fill the remainder of this Number; but I conceive it enough to give only those parts which relate more directly to the propriety of excluding the Bible from the schools:—

"I know," says Counsellor O'Connell, "I know that by introducing the mention of the Scriptures, I am treading on delicate and dangerous ground, and shall meet with censure, abuse, and calumny; but conscious of but one motive, I invite such censure, and court such calumny. My motive is pure, though my opinion may be mistaken. By means of this part of your resolution, you have already commenced to impede, and, as your plan goes along and attracts attention, you will still more and more impede, the progress of your Society among a numerous class. I shall now clearly demonstrate that you do so, from actual facts. You do not grant the means of education to that class to which I belong. Let me not be mistaken: I shall always be ready to speak my own conviction, that my profession is the best; if I did not feel it to be so, I would not adhere to it for one hour. Every one here, I will allow, may feel the same. When I do therefore speak on the subject, I must protest against being supposed to infer disparagement to another's belief. I respect human freedom in opinion, and think every created being has a right to worship God according to his conscience: no human dignities would induce me to alter my opinion, whether I uttered it among the senators of England or the inquisitors of Spain.

"Allow me now to revert to the question, Whether making it a preliminary to give the Bible, without note or comment, does not affect the principle? I say it does:—as long as you insist on its being a school-book, you do not afford equal facilities to Catholics. I prove it thus. I begin with the lowest and humblest of my proofs; I begin with myself. I have, in a remote county, some property; not worth speaking of in any other way, than as it imposes on me the duty of assisting in the education of the poor who have claims upon me. I gave a school-house at a low rent and tax-free, and contributed also; still, however, we wanted assistance, and looked for it to your Society; but you would not afford it. I could not let the Bible be a school-book, and you insisted that I should. You, therefore, do not give equal facilities.

"The next proof is from the schools in Tralee, under the Rev. Mr Egan, supported by the voluntary contributions of tradesmen, containing 440 children. There are in it about seventeen or eighteen Protestants—no interference is used—the Catholics are not even taught in the presence of the Protestants.

"There is another school, under the care of the Rev. Mr Denny, a very amiable and liberal man. The number in his school is 20. The Catholic clergyman made this proposal: 'Let us unite five days out of six—let us teach them indifferently without introducing religious instruction; let them separate then, and each teach his own; let us go to the Society and apply for a grant.' Mr Denny would have done so, but that from your resolution he found he could not succeed in such application.

"I state these facts,—for what purpose? Not that you should decide upon them now, but to call on every honest man to pause and say, whether education is not the assertion of truth? Whether the man who asserts one thing and means another, be an honest man? or whether he does not himself most want education, who refuses a committee to inquire whether he may not have been mistaken?

"Since last meeting, matters have occurred with respect to the Catholic persuasion, which may be matters of ridicule to others, but are not so to us. The spiritual head of our church has issued what may not perhaps be ligatory on our consciences, even in spiritual matters, and it is well known that we often oppose him in temporals; but it is at least his advice, ex cathedra.—This excludes from Catholic schools the Testament, even with note and comment, even though these might be acceptable to the Catholics. It is, in fact, a bull of the Pope. This, therefore, has caused an additional difficulty; see, then, how you proceed: you say that you will afford equal facilities to each persuasion, and on the other hand comes the bull of the Pope, refusing such aid. Can you now find any one with such powers of face, as to tell me that you give equal facilities? Nothing but religious delusion can account for this.

"To be sure, when I last had the honour of addressing you, my friend Mr Burrowes answered me, and went near to persuade me that I knew nothing of the Catholic persuasion, and made a speech to prove it so; and a liberal and wealthy merchant, whom I see before me, did the same. I know that I shall have the same to encounter to-day I did not wish to enter further into such controversies, and therefore applied to some of the heads of the Catholic persuasion in Ireland. On the Most Reverend Dr Murray I shall make no eulogium. I applied also to the Most Reverend Dr Troy, and in consequence a meeting was held of the principal parish priests in Dublin, in order that I might have an authentic document to read to this meeting, to express their sentiments; and they have resolved that 'The Scriptures, with or without note or comment, are not fit to be used as a school-book.'—To be thumbed by every child in the school.

"I end with a proof that is irrefragable: this document has been sent to me for the very purpose of being read to this meeting. The meeting was held, and this resolution framed, for this very purpose.

"Now, my Lord Duke, see how this document calls on you to accede to my humble motion, to afford a committee to see if really equal facilities are granted. This document says, 'either with or without comment, it is not to be a school-book;' your resolution says it shall; put these together, and see how you can say 'equal facilities.' On the one hand, the determination of the prelates, that it shall not be a school-book; on the other yours, that you will not give assistance unless it is; yet you still say, that you cannot see any thing in this document to require at least the decency of a committee,—the decorum of an investigation. As the only thing that is objected to is the circulation of the holy Scriptures, I will tell you the course you ought to pursue, as honest men:—You ought to come forward to new-model your resolution, and also to give aid to such as refuse to use the Scriptures without note or comment. I well know that I shall hear to-day, as I did last year, something like prose run mad, something like half sermons about the value and the origin of this book, the Bible. (Applause, mixed with louder hisses.) If I have trod on the tail of the serpent of bigotry, let it hiss. Oh it was a good hiss! a noble hiss! an excellent hiss! and I thank you for the hiss. Those who hissed may suppose they are acting for the service of God; but they serve God by a falsehood. But there is more honesty in the hiss, than in those gentlemen who assert one thing and then say and do another. I have stated to you my own opinion, and shall restate it, notwithstanding the peril of the hiss. The Bible never can be received without note or comment by the Catholic persuasion. Gentleman hissers, we believe that the entire word of God has not been preserved in writing: we believe that a portion has been preserved in the church which preserved that writing: and this being our tenet, you cannot expect to have the Catholic clergy submit, when their attention is roused, to have the Bible used without note or comment, because they must have tradition, which we also call the word of God. Every Catholic is bound in life and in death to assert this;—you assert the opposite in your resolution."

The reader will see that the pleadings of counsellor O'Connell proceed upon the ground that the rules of the society are not consistent with themselves. The leading principle of the society, "to afford the same facilities for education to all classes of professing Christians, without any attempt to interfere with the peculiar religious opinions of any," is not consistent with the other rule, which requires that the Scriptures, without note or comment, should be read in the schools. At first, Protestants and Papists met on this, which both, in their simplicity, considered common ground. The Protestant knew that the Bible alone was the foundation of his religion; and the Papist, without considering consequences, agreed to admit the Bible alone (that is, without note or comment) into the schools which were supported by the contributions of both parties. But O'Connell has found out that the Bible alone is not the foundation of his religion; and that therefore, the requiring of it to be read in the schools, is inconsistent with the professed object of the society, which is, to afford equal facilities for education to both Protestants and Papists. This is a declaration as plain as words can make it, that, in the opinion of Papists themselves, the Bible is against them. They will rather that their children shall go without education, than that they should have access to the Bible. This, however is by no means the general feeling among the Irish Papists. Thousands of the peasantry are eagerly craving to have their children taught: but since the Pope issued his bull, which O'Connell admits to be, "in fact, a bull of the Pope," the clergy have taken the alarm, and he appears as their agent in the school society, in order, if possible, to get the Bible expelled from the schools.

This eloquent counsellor uses a somewhat curious argument. "The Bible," says he, "never can be received without note or comment by the Catholic persuasion. Gentlemen hissers, we believe that the entire word of God has not been preserved in writing: we believe that a portion has been preserved in the church which preserved that writing: and this being our tenet, you cannot expect to have the Catholic clergy submit, when their attention is roused, to have the Bible used without note or comment, because they must have tradition, which we also call the word of God." Now, suppose we grant that what they call tradition is also the word of God, it must be consistent with the written word: if it contain any thing of an opposite character, it cannot possibly have proceeded from the same source; but if it be the word of God, there can be no harm in giving other portions of the same word without it, or it without the other portions. Protestants admit that the Old Testament without the New, and that the New without the Old, is not the whole word of God; but we never suspect danger in giving the one without the other, though we prefer giving both together, when we can. Nay, I venture to affirm that there is not one book in either of the Testaments, which may not be safely given, and profitably read, though the reader should never see another page of the Bible. It is, in fact, to libel the inspired penmen to say that the writing of any of them would be productive of mischief without the guardianship of the rest. How much greater the libel, when all of them taken together are declared to be dangerous, unless they be subjected to the control of an imaginary being, to whom they give the name of tradition, whose authority, in the church of Christ, is of no more value than that of the traditions of the elders among the Jews, which we are assured, by an infallible witness, made void the law.

Besides; if it be dangerous to give the Bible without tradition, it must be also dangerous to give it with tradition, unless you give the whole mass of it. If the written word must not be given without the unwritten, much less must a part of the latter be given without the whole. I defy the church of Rome to say how big a book this would make; but I apprehend the stoutest dray-horse in the kingdom would not be able to move it. And would the grave counsellor O'Connell really propose to give such a primer to the poor Popish children at school? I apprehend he has no such intention. His object, and that of his reverend Fathers, is merely to get quit of the Bible altogether; and for his exertions in this behalf, the clergy are puffing him up to the skies.

The counsellor insinuates that the Protestant part of the society are guilty of duplicity, in professing to give equal facilities for education to all parties, without interfering with the religious opinions of any; and, at the same time, persisting in giving the Bible to the children. This is plainly admitting, that to give the Bible to a Papist, is interfering with his religious opinions. It is not pretended that any Protestant gentleman of the society, or any of their Protestant teachers, attempted to expound the Scriptures to the scholars, or to show their conformity with one system more than another. There has, therefore, been no interference with the religious opinions of any, in the sense in which they understood the word; and it is extremely unjust in the orator to bring such a charge against gentlemen who had done no more than what he and his Popish brethren had agreed should be done; namely, giving the Bible without note or comment. If the Papist believed the Bible to contain his religion, the giving of it was as much an interference with the religion of Protestant children, as the Protestant giving it, was with that of Popish children: and if there was any duplicity in the matter, it must attach to one party as well as the other.

O'Connell's speech received an able reply from Richard B. Warren, Esq. in which, among other things, he proved, that to withhold the word of God from children would be disobedience to the command of God. In answer to the objection founded on the alleged profanation of the Bible, "to be thumbed by every child in the school," Mr Warren stated that it was not used as a spelling-book; or used at all, but by those children who had made such proficiency in reading, as to be able to derive instruction from it; and this, I suppose, is the case in every well-regulated school in which the Bible is read.

It appears farther, from Mr Warren's speech, that many individuals and public bodies had contributed large sums; that a legacy had been bequeathed; and that even Parliament had granted pecuniary aid to the society, on the express understanding that the rules were to be adhered to; that is, that the Bible, without note or comment, was to be used in the schools. It is presumable that many of the donors would not have given a shilling to support schools from which the Bible was excluded. The measure, therefore, which Mr O'Connell desired to carry, would have been a breach of faith with both the living and the dead. But as these were only heretics, the thing might, perhaps, in the opinion of Papists, be lawfully done.

No. XCVII.

SATURDAY, MAY 20TH, 1820.

THE reader is requested to connect what follows with the conclusion of my last Number.

The following striking fact, stated by Mr Warren, shows how Papists do when they get schools, even supported partly by Protestants, under their own management. "The learned gentleman has triumphantly referred to the Friars' School in Cork, as a proof of the anxiety, on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy, to promote the education of the poor: —I thank the learned gentleman for making mention of that school in particular, as I happen to be acquainted with the circumstances which led to its formation. About the time at which this Society was formed, the presence of Joseph Lancaster, in this country, excited a very general anxiety on the subject of the education of the poor. A meeting was held in the city of Cork, at which a very large sum was subscribed by all religious persuasions, for the purpose of establishing a school, on such a liberal plan as should be unobjectionable to every denomination of Christians; and after much discussion, it was resolved that the Scriptures should be excluded, lest the children of Roman Catholics might be otherwise prevented from attending. A noble school-house was erected, capable of accommodating (as the learned gentleman has told us), seven hundred children; and a committee was immediately formed; but although many Protestants became subscribers to its funds, few (if any) could be found, who would devote their time to the superintendence of such a school: the management of its affairs consequently fell into the hands of persons of a different persuasion. No statement (as I believe) has ever been published of the system of instruction adopted in this school; but I know, from the testimony of gentlemen who visited it during the last summer, that this institution, which commenced its career by excluding the Scriptures without note or comment, lest it should be offensive to Roman Catholics, has now become a Roman Catholic seminary, in which the Douay version of the Scriptures, with all its notes and comments, is read, to the effectual exclusion of all children who are of a different persuasion; for it cannot be imagined that any Protestant would send his child to a school where he should continually hear those notes read, in which Protestants are so pointedly and repeatedly charged with corruping the sacred text."

Mr O'Connell's motion was lost by the carrying of an amendment, by a majority of 80 votes against 19. Mr O'Connell then declared that he and his friends would be no longer members of the Society.

Bishop Coppinger lauds and praises him, in a high degree, for his exertions in the holy cause, as the reader may see in his letter to his clergy, which I gave at the end of my 95th Number. "To Mr O'Connell," says he, "for his spirited exertions on this occasion, the thanks of Catholic Ireland are eminently due; and surely, if confiding apathy had hitherto benumbed any individual among us, the present electrifying fact must restore his energies, and rouse him to a due sense of his danger." The "electrifying fact" is, that the Society did, by a majority of 80 against 19, reject the motion of Mr O'Connell, which was meant to prepare the way for the expulsion of the Bible from the schools. And Bishop Coppinger considers this as having "evinced, beyond the powers of tergiversation, that the professions of the Society were not intended to regulate its practice; but that, under the name of education, proselytism was the determined object."

I do not profess to be acquainted with the powers of tergiversation. I am not sure if ever I wrote the word before; but no doubt the Right Reverend Bishop comprehends it in all its extent and power. He, very probably, knows from experience what it can do, and what it cannot do. In the present instance, it seems, it cannot exculpate the Society from the accusation, that its professions were not intended to regulate its practice. That is, in plain English, tergiversation cannot save the Society from the charge of duplicity; but I hope the Society will never ask the aid of such an agent to save them from any thing. Let them leave tergiversation, (that is, shift, subterfuge, evasion) to the Papists; and they will find no difficulty in vindicating themselves by means of plain truth and common sense.

The accusation is, that proselytism, under the name of education, is the determined object. But the Bishop has not adduced, or referred, to a single instance, in which the Society, or its Protestant members, directly or indirectly attempted to make proselytes of Popish children to their own faith. They do, indeed, give them the Bible. They furnish them with means of learning to read it. This is all that can justly be laid to their charge; and it is not even insinuated that they do more. If proselytes are thus made, it is not they that make them, but the Bible. If children are won to the faith, by this means, it is not to their faith, but to the faith of the Bible. Protestants do indeed believe that their faith is contained in the Bible; but when they give the book itself, without a word of their own, either oral or written, they leave it to speak for itself; and they are perfectly willing that the reader should embrace that which he finds in it, though it should be different from their own opinions. This is not proselytism to the tenets of a party. It is not a Society seeking to gain persons to itself, for the purpose of increasing its own strength; and, therefore, it partakes nothing of the character which Bishop Coppinger ascribes to the Society in Dublin. Let it be remembered, that the Papists themselves, at first, agreed to have the Bible, without note or comment, read in the schools. Now, had they found, by experience, that Protestant children were by this means induced to embrace the faith of Rome, we should not have heard a word from them of proselytism being intended, under the mask of education. They would gladly have received all the proselytes which the schools produced; and they would have raised a hue and cry against the Protestants, if they had attempted to prevent such proselytism, or to remove the Bible, which was the cause of it. But they will not allow to others what they claim for themselves. They know and feel by woful experience that the Bible is against them; that no man, woman, or child, will ever find the faith of Rome within its pages. Nay, they know, at least the learned among them know, that the Protestant faith, or something very like it, is to be found in the Bible; and this is virtually acknowledged by Bishop Coppinger, and all those of his brethren, who publicly maintain, that simply to give the word of God, without note or comment, is the same as to attempt to make proselytes to the Protestant faith.

The "electrifying fact," that the Society intend to proceed as they began; that is, to teach poor children to read the Bible, is calculated, says the Bishop, to restore the energies of such of his brethren as have been benumbed by apathy, and to rouse them to a due sense of their danger. This danger proceeds from the Bible, and from the Bible alone. Will any man, after this explicit avowal, have the effrontery to maintain that the religion of Rome is Christianity? The word of Christ cannot possibly be dangerous to the religion of Christ. But we have the declaration of a Romish Bishop that it is dangerous to the religion of Rome; from which the inference is unavoidable, that the religion of Rome is not the religion of Christ. I might very properly close my argument here. With those who respect the word of God, it is enough to know that a thing is against that word; and knowing this, they are sure that it cannot be of God. This is the state in which the church of Rome stands convicted, and virtually admitted by Bishop Coppinger, and all those clergy who, at his call, have been roused to a sense of the danger that arises from the reading of the Bible. And, as it is thus proved, that the religion of Rome is not of God, there is only one other author to whom it can be ascribed,—it is the working of Satan, with all deceivableness of unrighteousness.

Yet, after all, the Papists are extremely desirous of having it believed that the Bible is on their side. They are like certain litigants, who wish to retain the most respectable counsel; not that he may advocate their cause, which they suspect no honest man will do, but merely that he may not appear against them. Thus Papists express great reverence for the Bible. They will not even allow it to be thumbed by children, lest it should be profaned by the contact of their fingers with the paper on which it is printed, or the skin that covers it; though, I suppose, it will be found that he who thumbs his Bible most, pays the greatest respect to it, and makes the best use of it. If you will believe the Romish priests, it is from great veneration of the Bible that they cannot consent that children should read it; and because they fear they would misinterpret it to their own destruction. They profess to hold the key, that is, the power of rightly interpreting it, in their own hands. Let us see, then, how they interpret some passages. And I venture to affirm, that there is not a child in any of the schools in Ireland, who would expound it so foolishly as Popes and Cardinals have done.

"Moses saith, 'God made man in his own image;' Pope Adrian interpreteth, 'therefore images must be set up in churches.' St Peter saith, 'Behold, here are two swords;' Pope Boniface concludes, 'therefore the Pope hath power over the spiritual and the temporal.' St Matthew saith, Give not that which is holy unto dogs;' Mr Harding expounds it, 'therefore it is not lawful for the vulgar to read the Scriptures.' St John saith, 'There shall be one fold and one shepherd;' Johannes de Parisius tells us, 'this place cannot be expounded of Christ, but must be taken for some minister ruling in his stead.' The prophet David saith, 'Thou hast put all things under his feet;' Antoninus expounds it, 'thou hast made all things subject to the Pope: the cattle of the field, that is to say, men living in the earth; the fishes of the sea, that is to say, the souls in purgatory; the fowls in the air, that is to say, the souls of the blessed in heaven.' And whereas our Saviour witnesseth of himself, 'All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth: Stephen, Archbishop of Patræa, applied it to Pope Leo the Tenth, in the council of Lateran, in the audience of the Pope himself, who thankfully accepted it, and suffered it to be published and printed; and, as it is rightly observed by the learned Du Moulin, Pope Innocent the Third, in his book of the Mysteries of the Mass; the book of Sacred Ceremonies; Durant's Rationales; Tolet, and Titleman, and others, do most ridiculously wrest the Scriptures, altogether different from their right meaning, and the expositions of the fathers: as for instance, the Scripture saith, 'The rock was Christ;' therefore, say they, 'the altar must be of stone.' It is written, 'I am the light of the world;' therefore, 'tapers must be set upon the altar.' It is written, 'Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth;' therefore, 'the priest must kiss the altar.' It is written, 'Thou shalt see my back parts,' (Exod. xxxiii. 23.); therefore, 'the priest must turn his back to the people.' It is written, 'Wash me again,' Lava me amplius, (Ps. li.); therefore, 'the priest must wash his hands twice.' It is written, 'Put off thy shoes, for this place is holy,' (Exod. iii. 5.); therefore, 'the bishop at mass changeth his hose and shoes.' The Pope himself, at the time of his coronation, casteth certain copper money among the people, using the words of Peter, 'Silver and gold have I none, but that which I have I give thee.'" See page 259, of Sir Humphrey Lynde's Via Tuta et Via Devia; a work which contains a great deal of information, in a small compass. The fourth edition, revised by the author, was published in 1630. The edition before me was published last year, by order of "The Society for the distribution of Tracts in defence of the United Church of England and Ireland, as by law established."

I question if there be a child in any school, in the three kingdoms, who would give such foolish comments upon passages of Scripture as the grave doctors of Rheims have done. Every page of their New Testament is full of downright nonsense, as any one may see who will open the book. The following is the first of their annotations; it is on the name Thamar, as it occurs in the genealogy of our Saviour, Matth. i. 3. "Christ abhorred not to take flesh of some that were ill, as he chose Judas among the apostles. Let not us disdain to receive our spiritual birth and sustenance of such as be not always good." This is an exhortation to submit to the priests, be they ever so wicked; than which a more pernicious and dangerous doctrine was never taught by any perverter of the word of God.

Mr O'Connell goes no farther than to make tradition equal to the Scriptures, as being also the word of God; but some great doctors of the church of Rome go much farther, and declare tradition to be superior to the written word. Thus Cardinal Baronius teaches: "Tradition is the foundation of Scriptures, and excels them in this, that the Scriptures cannot subsist unless they be strengthened by traditions; but tradition hath strength enough without Scriptures." (Baron. An. lviii. n. 2.) "Traditions," says Linden, "are the most certain foundations of faith, the most sure ground of the sacred Scriptures, the impenetrable buckler of Ajax, the suppressor of all heresies. On the other side, the Scripture is a nose of wax, a dead and killing letter without life, a mere shell without a kernel, a leaden rule, a wood of thieves, a shop of heretics." (Linden Panopl. l. i. c. 22, &c.) Costerus, the Jesuit, assures us, "It never was the mind of Christ either to commit his mysteries to parchment, or that his church should depend upon paper writings." Again, "The excellence of the unwritten word doth far surpass the Scriptures, which the apostles left us in parchment; the one is written by the finger of God, the other by the pen of the apostles. The Scripture is a dead letter, written in paper or parchment, which may be razed or wrested at pleasure: but tradition is written in men's hearts, which cannot be altered. The Scripture is like a scabbard that will receive any sword, either leaden, or wooden, or brazen; and suffereth itself to be drawn by any interpretation. Tradition retains the true sense in the scabbard; that is, the true sense of the Scripture, in the sheath of the letter." (Coster. Eucharist. cap. i. p. 44.) From Andradius we learn, that "many points of (Roman) doctrine would reel and totter if they were not supported by the help of tradition." (Andrad. de Orth. expli. lib. 2.) "Many things," says Petrus de Sutor, "being taught by the Roman church, and not contained in the Scriptures, would more easily draw the people from the traditions and observances of their church." And he shows that this is one special cause why the Scriptures were denied to the lay people. (Sutor. de Translat. Bibl. c. 22.) Another reason why traditions are preferred before the Bible, is given by Bishop Canus. "Because tradition is not only of greater force against heretics than the Scripture, but almost all disputation with heretics is to be referred to tradition." (Canus, Loc. Theol. lib. iii. cap. 3.) See a great deal more to the same purpose, in Via Tuta et Via Devia, edit. 1819, page 300—309.

Thus it is plainly admitted that the church of Rome cannot stand upon the ground of Scripture. She cannot contend with heretics on any other ground than that of tradition, which is, by these authors, exalted above the Bible. It is easy to see then what sad work Mr O'Connell and his brethren would make in the schools, if they had the command of them. The Bible would be expelled, and they would probably substitute St Wenefride, and the "Life of St Ann, the mother of the Mother of God, and the grandmother of God himself." See an account of this blasphemous work, page 183.

Bishop Coppinger himself deserves to be more particularly noticed. His address to his clergy is written in a very artful style. He endeavours to prepossess the reader in favour of what he has to say, by complimenting the Protestant society in Ireland, who have opened schools for the education of the youth of the Roman communion, as humane and respectable. But the compliment seems intended to hold up the society to the greater detestation, whose professions, the Bishop says, are not intended to regulate its practice; but that, under the name of education, proselytism is the determined object. This great evil, proselytism, is that which seems to have taken possession of the mind of this Bishop, and which he would deprecate as more dangerous than the typhus fever, or the plague itself. Now, the more the Popish clergy cry out against this evil, the more ought Protestants to labour to promote it. I have already said that I wish not to gain proselytes to Protestantism, considered merely as a sect or party; but I wish to gain men from error to truth; from the kingdom of Satan to the kingdom of Christ. If the Bishop were a subject of the latter kingdom, he would be as glad to win them to it as any Protestant can be. That the church of Rome is not this kingdom, but the enemy of it, is what I have been endeavouring to prove; and no man has yet answered so much as one of the arguments by which I have attempted to establish the fact. The church of Rome is a confused mass of superstition, will-worship, idolatry, and all sorts of wickedness. Every benevolent man ought to endeavour to undeceive the miserable dupes of this mother of abominations. Call it proselytism, or what you will, he is engaged in a good work who is labouring to detach men from the religion of the Pope, and to gain them to that of Christ; and I do not think the School Society in Dublin, or the Hibernian Society, or any other, has yet done what they ought to do for the attainment of such an object. Proselytism is not the professed object of these societies; and they have never, so far as I know, made it appear to be their object, in any shape whatever, further than giving the Bible, and teaching the people to read it; and if that be the thing that makes them vile, in the esteem of Bishop Coppinger, I hope he will live to see them become yet more vile.

Popery being proved, and even admitted, by great authors of the Romish faith, to be not founded in Scripture, or even defensible by Scripture, but only by tradition, and that tradition as vague and intangible as the winds; it must appear to every serious reflecting person that the sooner it is overset the better. It is, in fact, a system of falsehood and delusion invented by the devil, and propagated by cunning and designing priests, to enslave the understanding, pick the pockets, and ruin the souls of men. The work of proselytism has never yet been seriously taken up by Protestants; but I am not ashamed to tell Bishop Coppinger, that it is the duty of every Christian to gain as many proselytes as he can to the religion of the Bible; and as I understand my work is republishing in Cork, as well as in Dublin, I hope this will soon meet the eye of his Reverence; and I will be glad if he shall attempt to show cause why the Bible should not be allowed to be read in the schools.

He does not expressly tell us what his sentiments are upon this subject; but he says he has long since recorded them; and he says, "the brightest luminaries of the Protestant church have led the way for us, with arguments, to this very moment unanswered." Who these luminaries are, the Bishop does not tell us; and perhaps he gives it as a great stretch of liberality to admit that there ever were luminaries among heretics. But I can tell him that there are none, whom Protestants themselves acknowledge to have been luminaries among them, who were not steady friends of the Bible, and desirous that every man, woman, and child, in the world, should have one, and be able to read it. Dr Coppinger will perhaps refer me to a Marsh and a Wix; but these divines, so far as relates to this subject, are in no more estimation with serious Protestants than the Bishop himself, or than the Pope of Rome.

I am indebted to a learned correspondent for the following correction of an expression, in my 95th Number, which is liable to misconception:—"In reading p. 402, 2d col. 14th line from bottom, 'The church of Christ acknowledges only one object of worship, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ:' Should not this have been a little explicited? The church worships only one God; but it considers Jesus Christ, the Son of God, as an object of worship, as well as the Father; because it considers the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, as only one God. St Stephen prayed to Christ; St Paul prayed to Christ; and St John says, 'This is the confidence we have in him, that if we ask any thing according to his will, he heareth us;' (1 John v. 14.) You do not want these proofs of Christ being an object of divine worship; but our Unitarians overlooking them, deny him to be so. The Godhead being one in essence, or ουσιᾳ, as the Greeks call it, but three in ὑποστασει, or person, and each person being inseparable from the Godhead, each person is, in truth, the only God, because there is only one God. Our Unitarians, making their own understanding, and not the Scripture, the measure of their faith, deny Jesus Christ to be an object of divine worship."

No. XCVIII.

SATURDAY, MAY 27TH, 1820.

I FIND by several letters, which I have received within these few days, that great interest has been excited by the extract of Mr O'Connell's speech, which I gave in my 96th Number. It is, I understand, pretty generally considered as one of the most valuable documents which I have given since the commencement of my work; because it establishes, beyond all doubt, the important fact, that the Papists of the present day are as hostile to the word of God, as they were even in the dark ages; and having this fact ascertained, who would hesitate for a moment to pronounce the Church of Rome the very antichrist?

O'Connell, standing alone upon his own responsibility, could not have given much importance to the sentiments which he uttered; but he appears in an official character, representing what Bishop Coppinger calls "Catholic Ireland;" and to him, for his exertions in attempting to expel the Bible from the schools, the Bishop assures us "the thanks of Catholic Ireland are eminently due." Here, then, is a right reverend pillar of the Roman Church giving the sanction of his high authority to the sentiments avowed by the lay orator. And "the Roman Catholic clergy of the diocese of Cloyne and Ross," adopt the sentiments of their diocesan, and express their "warmest acknowledgments" to counsellor O'Connell, for his "splendid advocacy in the cause of religious freedom." The whole body of the Roman clergy, then, within that district at least, have declared O'Connell's sentiments to be their own. They cannot allow the reading of the Bible by the children at school, lest the children should become Protestants; a plain admission that the Bible is the religion of Protestants.

Above all men in the world, Papists possess the art of giving bad things a good name; that is, of pressing into their service such expressions as are popular, and convey a good meaning, in order to cover some error and absurdity, which they do not like to hear called by its own name. Religious liberty is one of those phrases which Papists know to be popular in this country, in the present age. They do, therefore, most impudently appropriate it to themselves. They would have the world believe that they only are the friends of religious liberty, though all the world knows that they are the most intolerant and persecuting sect upon the face of the earth. The exertions of Mr O'Connell, to get the Bible banished from the schools, are called, by the clergy of the diocese of Cloyne and Ross, "his splendid advocacy" "in the cause of religious freedom." In the common acceptation of the words, religious freedom signifies the privilege of every individual's reading the Bible, of forming his own judgment of its contents, of freely expressing what he thinks he finds in it, and of worshipping God according as he understands his will, with regard to the manner in which he ought to be worshipped. This freedom exists in our country, in its fullest extent;—nay, it exists much beyond what I have here stated; for it is not even required that a man shall read the Bible, and form his judgment and practice according to what he finds in it. A man may spend his whole life without ever reading a page of it; and, so far from being compelled to worship his Maker alone, as the Bible teaches, he may worship the Virgin Mary and all the saints, in direct opposition to the dictates of the divine word; and yet his religion is tolerated. He enjoys the utmost freedom in the exercise of it; without being subjected to pains and penalties of any kind.

But Papists, in Ireland, profess to be in bondage; and they call their orator, O'Connell, the advocate of "religious freedom." The freedom they want, is to be freed from the Bible; and certainly, if any person were insisting upon them, or attempting to compel them, to read and study a book which they hate with a perfect hatred, they might with justice complain that they were not left to the freedom of their own will. But this is not the point in question. There is nobody, so far as I know, so zealous as to propose to compel the Papists to read the Bible; but there are many benevolent persons desirous of giving it to those who are willing to receive it; they are giving it to the children in the schools, and through them to their parents; many of whom desire most earnestly to have it. This is what grieves the priests and their lay orator;—this is what they wish to prevent, by all possible means; and the endeavours of the eloquent counsellor to prevent this, are called, by the clergy, "his splendid advocacy" "in the cause of religious freedom." That is, the freedom of keeping in the bondage of ignorance the great mass of the Irish population;—it is the freedom of compelling the benevolent part of the community to abstain from every attempt to impart freedom from ignorance, and vice, and misery, to degraded millions of our fellow creatures. Yes; our Papists are great advocates of religious freedom; but it is the freedom of making their will, or that of their ghostly father in Rome, the law by which alone we are to be regulated, in all our thoughts, and words, and actions.

As for the orator himself, it does not appear that he has any distinct knowledge of either religion or religious freedom, or any sentiments of his own upon the subject. He had been actually accused of ignorance of even the "Catholic persuasion," at a former meeting; and now, therefore, he does not choose to risk his reputation, by speaking from his own knowledge. He "applied," he says, "to some of the heads of the Catholic persuasion in Ireland." He came to the meeting in the leading-strings of Drs Troy and Murray, and the other clergy who held a meeting for the purpose of furnishing him with "an authentic document to read to this meeting, to express their sentiments;" and then he gives their sentiments, with as much pomp and solemnity, as if they had been expressed by a voice from heaven. "They have resolved," says he, "that the Scriptures, with or without note or comment, are not fit to be used as a school-book." I believe I said long ago, that a council of bats and owls would probably resolve and declare that the sun was a great nuisance; and there would be as much wisdom in the declaration as in that of the Roman clergy in Dublin, that the Bible is not fit to be read in schools, or any where else.

In the first article, in the resolutions of the clergy of Cloyne and Ross, (see No. 96, page 405), we learn, "that in the profession of faith adopted universally throughout the whole Catholic Church," Papists receive the Bible, in the sense which their holy mother the church held, and doth hold; that to her it belongs to judge of the true sense of the Scriptures; and the Papist engages that he will never "interpret them otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers." He who comes under this obligation, binds himself that he will never interpret the Scriptures at all: for there never was a unanimous consent of the fathers on any leading doctrine of the Bible, much less with regard to all that is contained in it. It is impossible to interpret the Scriptures, without doing it otherwise than some Fathers have done; and therefore the only safe course is to let them alone. This is most effectually to set aside the Bible; for it is needless to read it, if we are not to consider the meaning of what we read. If we attempt to understand any part of it, we are entering upon the work of self-interpretation which the church of Rome so strongly deprecates. It is well that the Roman clergy of the present day have made such an explicit avowal of their principles; because they will thus convince every reflecting person that they have abandoned the ground of Christianity, and have taken their stand upon that of downright infidelity.

And if, in the regions of infidelity, there be degrees of wickedness, as I doubt not there are, that system must be the most wicked which professes to be founded on the word of truth,—this is Popery. The Church of Rome has not the honesty of the hardy infidel, who at once rejects the word of God; but she has the low cunning of professing to respect it, while she most effectually sets aside its authority. There cannot be greater insolence practised in civilised society, than to misconstrue an honest man's words, and turn them against himself; but this is the insolence with which Papists are continually treating the word of God. Thus the clergy of Cloyne and Ross have the effrontery to profess to quote the words of the Bible against the use of the Bible. Like all other writers of their communion, they make use of the words of Peter, relating to the unwise and unstable wresting the Scriptures to their own destruction; and they use this as an argument for withholding the Bible from the lay people altogether. But this was not the tendency of the apostle's argument: his words clearly imply, that the unlearned and unstable had liberty to read the Bible, else they could not wrest it. Peter asserted the fact, that there were some things in Paul's epistles which the unlearned and unwise did wrest to their own destruction; but he did not, on that account, prohibit the reading of the epistles of his beloved brother Paul;—nay, he proceeds upon the acknowledged fact that they were accessible to all men, and especially to those whom he addressed, that is, to the "strangers scattered abroad," &c. Paul had expressly written to them, as Peter tells us, (2 Ep. iii. 15.) and it was in his address to them that there were some things hard to be understood. Now, we cannot suppose that the faithful apostle, writing under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, would address an epistle to the Hebrew Christians in general, the tendency of which was so dangerous, that he did not wish the people in general to read it, lest it should do mischief to them; yet this impious absurdity is maintained by these Popish priests, who will not allow the word of God to speak for itself to the lay people, lest they should pervert it to their own destruction.

Besides, if the language of Peter shall be considered as authority for keeping the Bible from any person, it will apply much more properly to the priest than to the lay people. There is, comparatively, little danger of a plain man, whose mind is unsophisticated by the jargon of the schools, mistaking or wresting any part of the plain testimony of the apostles, concerning Jesus of Nazareth, the Saviour of sinners; but the priests, who have been bred in the schools of Scotus, and St Thomas Aquinas, and Pope Pius IV., are in the greatest possible danger of wresting the Scriptures to their own destruction; because they come to them, if they do come at all, with minds preoccupied by doctrines quite opposite to those contained in the Bible; yet with an assurance that they are in the Bible. This is the worst possible state of mind in which persons can come to the study of the word of God; for then they come to it, not to receive implicitly what the Holy Ghost teacheth, but for the express purpose of making the Holy Ghost speak their own sentiments: that is, of extorting from the Bible what they have already been taught by fallible men in the schools; and thus they will, almost to a certainty, wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction.

When the wise man spoke of "a jewel of gold in a swine's snout," he referred to something that was quite out of place: and, I think, nothing can be more so than the passages of Scripture which the clergy of Cloyne and Ross quote from the Bible, about the unity of the church. They tell us, that the receiving of the true sense of the Scriptures simply, as holy church is pleased to give it, "further goes to prevent their being carried about by every wind of doctrine, while it tends to effect what the Redeemer strongly inculcates, viz. that we be 'all one, as he and his heavenly Father are one;' or, as the apostle has it, that we be 'all of one mind, and that there be no schism among us.'" Christ speaks of the oneness or unity of his people, as a unity in the truth; and his word is the truth. The unity of his church is founded in the knowledge, belief, and profession of the truth of God's word; and this truth does unite all, who believe it, to God and to one another. But these Popish clergy take up the words of Christ and his apostle, which relate to this heavenly union, and apply them to a union that is founded on the exclusion of the word of God, and on human authority substituted for it. This is, in effect, turning the word of God against itself. There is not a more impious way of wresting it; and as this is the work of the clergy, and not of the poor laity, we ought to exculpate the latter from the accusation which the former are daily bringing forward, that they are not to be trusted with the Scriptures, lest they should wrest them to their own destruction.

Bishop Coppinger declares his assent to a plan recommended by Mr O'Connell, for educating children of the different religions in the same school, without any reference to religious subjects; and the clergy of the diocese of Cloyne and Ross declare their readiness to co-operate with Protestants, "in establishing schools on any practicable plan, not clashing with our tenets:" that is, upon any plan that shall not incur the risk of the scholars of the Roman communion becoming Protestants. This will be considered by the Papists, I dare say, as a fair concession; but, in fact, it is no concession at all; for it is not possible to teach children to read, without giving them an ability to detect the impositions of Rome, even if they should not read the Bible; and this must be, in some measure, clashing with their tenets. Papists, however, must not, in the present state of public feeling, avow themselves the enemies of education. They must make a show of being willing to educate their youth, as the Pope has taught them; but it will soon be seen that all this zeal has evaporated, unless they shall be able to turn all their schools, like that of Cork, into Popish seminaries.

I intend to commence, in my next Number, a discussion of the alleged supremacy of Peter, and of his pretended successors; and I conclude the present with the following letters:—

TO THE PROTESTANT.

"DEAR SIR,—I hope your papers are extensively circulated and read in Ireland. The hostility to the word of God, and the spirit of domination exhibited by the Popish clergy there, demand the most vigilant attention, and the most decided resistance. They have generally or universally applauded and adopted Mr O'Connell's sentiments, lately delivered at a meeting in Kildare-street, Dublin, on the subject of the Hibernian schools. As a specimen of reasoning, his speech was sufficiently contemptible; but the arrogance, effrontery, and spirit of usurpation, exhibited in it, are no less remarkable. One of the provisions of the schools,—a provision adopted by both Protestants and Papists, in order to give equal facilities to children of parents of either profession,—was to exclude all catechisms and controversial writings, on both sides, and to use the Bible, which both parties professed to believe to be the word of God; at same time, leaving the explanation of this to the respective religious instructors out of school. By this plan the Society did afford, what they reckoned, equal facilities of education to the different classes. And on this plan, I believe, many mixed, and some Catholic schools are conducted in other places.

"But, says Mr O'Connell, 'No! this is not to give equal facilities. The Pope has lately emitted a bull against the use of the Bible in schools; and the dignified clergy have published, authoritatively, their manifestoes to the same purpose.' These, whether obligatory or not, are respected by the Catholics; so that the Society, by their rules, must, it seems, accommodate their procedure to every new bull of the Pope, and to every new manifesto of the clergy; or they cannot preserve the facilities for education 'equal.' O'Connell's demands amount to no less than this; that the Society, in adhering to one of its rules, should take the meaning of that rule from these authorities, and suffer it, and all their other rules, to be modified by their dictation. The absurdity is here apparent; but the arrogance of the demand, and the effrontery of the accusation of dishonesty, applied to the School Society, are intolerable. The Society, at first, explained what they meant by equal facilities of education. They have adhered to that meaning. Who infringed these facilities? The infringers are the Pope, the clergy, and their orator, Mr O'Connell.

But here, as usual, the aggressor is loudest and first in the complaint.

"It is well that such decided opposition to Mr O'Connell's project appeared at the meeting. Had the Pope's bull been admitted, in this instance, with the clergy's manifesto, and the traditions of the church, Protestants might have bidden adieu to all interference with the schools. Say the clergy, 'We never can acknowledge, in any Society of laymen, a right to regulate the religious concerns of children committed to our care.' 'Regulate,' i. e. so much as to give the Bible with or without note or comment, &c., and without attempting to teach them its meaning on controverted points. Had the Society submitted to this usurpation, a new bull might have been soon expected, excluding all school-books not approved by the Pope; excluding the Bible from the use of even Protestant children, lest they should communicate the sentiments of their books to the rest; excluding Protestant children and Protestant teachers for similar reasons. All this, and more, would accord well with what Popery used to be; and if bulls, manifestoes, traditions, and the Church, are to regulate these matters,—adieu to any thing saving Popish management. We know not what the next bull and manifesto may contain;—we know not; Papists themselves know not; Mr O'Connell knows not, what is contained in the treasury of the traditions. The infallible church holds the keys of this treasury, and no person can tell where this church is to be found; for we find the individuals who profess to belong to it, often opposing each other, in doctrine and in practice.

"It required no small degree of effrontery in Mr O'Connell and the clergy, to mention such a proposal to the Society, as submission to such foreign and usurped domination, and such indefinable authority; but it accorded well with the Popish system. The Pope refuses to a British people and parliament, the right to instruct subjects in their youth, by that perfect rule of morality, justice, and loyalty, which the Bible contains. The clergy claim authority over all the young people and their parents, not only without their consent, but against it. This, especially in a Protestant country, is usurpation. They have no right to any power, but by voluntary submission. All this, however, is but arrogance and domination with respect to fellow creatures. God says, 'Hear my word;' and, respecting Christ, 'Hear my Son.' The Pope and his clergy say, 'No; at your peril, hear us only.' Thus, God said to the first pair, 'Obey my voice;' the old serpent said, 'Nay; obey mine.' But God's word shall stand. Even to Popes and their clergy, as well as to other egregious sinners, he mercifully says, 'Hear and your souls shall live.'—Yours, AN IRISHMAN."

"Glasgow, 15th May, 1820.

"DEAR SIR,—I was extremely glad to see, in the 'PROTESTANT' of Saturday last, that you have again brought the enemies of the Bible into notice. Too much cannot be said, in reprobation of their misanthropic principles: and it will require all the eloquence of the Irish barrister to make them appear otherwise than odious. The counsellor blames the Hibernian Society, for not showing a readiness to enter into an investigation of their resolutions, and for not removing or avoiding the obstacles thrown in the way of affording 'equal facilities for education to all classes of professing Christians.' But if Papists, belonging to the Society, who certainly knew their own circumstances best, could not foresee the consequences of standing upon common ground with the Protestants, how could it be thought that the latter would anticipate them? Is the idea to be entertained, for a moment, that such a respectable body, connected, as it is, with some of the most distinguished personages of the British empire, and whose majority, I presume, is composed of friends to Bible reading, will crouch to the bull of a Pope, or the determination of the prelates of his communion? This, however, is precisely what they would wish to see; nor is this all, if we may judge from the conduct of their Tertullus; they would be 'lords of the ascendant,' and dictate, whenever they pleased, what gentlemen ought to do; and then, with the utmost effrontery, impute falsehood and dishonesty to those who might, in any degree, disapprove of their measures, or differ from them in opinion.

"But suppose, for the sake of argument, that the Bible and Testament were excluded from the schools in question, would this satisfy these alarmists? No: they would, if possible, extort farther concession, until nothing but the superstition of Jesuits and Douay doctors was inculcated on the simple and unsuspecting, of the Protestant, as well as the Popish persuasion; and, instead of being commended as Timothy was, for having 'known the holy Scriptures, which are able to make men wise unto salvation,' they would be reproved as fools, for 'following lying vanities, and forsaking their own mercy.'—I am, &c."

No. XCIX.

SATURDAY, JUNE 3D, 1820.

As an introduction to the subject of Papal supremacy, I lay before the reader the following communication, by a judicious and intelligent correspondent:—

"TO THE PROTESTANT.

"DEAR SIR,—I have ventured to trouble

you with a few thoughts on the Pope's supremacy. As the whole Popish system is built on that supposed supremacy bestowed exclusively on Peter, to whom they pretend the keys of doctrine, worship, discipline, and government, were committed; and as you do not appear to me, as yet, to have designed a full and formal discussion of that subject, I shall take the liberty to suggest a few hints to you, which probably may be of use to you, to facilitate the discussion of it, and which you are so capable to improve upon. The first and main text on which they build, is that in Mat. xvi. 18. 'And I say unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven,' &c. The apostle John records a circumstance which will give us a little light into this matter. Speaking of Peter, he says, ch. i. 42, 'And he brought him to Jesus. And when Jesus beheld him, he said, Thou art Simon the son of Jona, thou shalt be called Cephas, which is, being interpreted, a stone.' Cephas is not a Greek but a Syriac word, and therefore required to be translated into the Greek language, in which the New Testament was wrote. The Greek word, therefore, is Petros, a stone; and, strictly speaking, such a stone as we can handle, or turn over and move from its place. When names were given to men, as recorded in Scripture, whether compounded or not with the names of animals, or inanimate things, it was done in allusion to the natures and qualities of these animals, or things. And it was not the Jews only that practised this, but other nations also.

"What the reasons were why our Saviour gave him this name we are left to conjecture, as they are not revealed. What they were not, we can decide upon, positively, as they are revealed. The obvious qualities then of such a stone, are hardness or durability, and mobility. That this name, then, was not given him to signify his stability or infallibility is most certain; for of all the apostles, both before and after the ascension of Christ, he was the most unstable and versatile.

"Witness his effrontery in taking upon him to rebuke his Master, which drew from him this severe retort, 'Get thee behind me, Satan, for thou savourest not the things that be of God, but the things that be of men.' Also his denying his Lord and Master; likewise his dissimulation, for which the apostle Paul reproved him to his face. These are the only three things in which the Popes are successors to Peter, and may be said to form the Pope's triple crown. I question if Peter himself knew the meaning of his new name, or had it explained to him at that time; but I have no doubt but he would come to understand it in that night of dreadful darkness and perplexity, after he had denied his Master, and saw him condemned and crucified, when his busy mind would be searching on all sides for comfort, he would then think on the name Christ had given him, connect it with his prayer for him, and draw hope and comfort from it. As if Christ had said, 'Simon, Simon, you think you are a strong and stable man, little considering how fallible you are, how easily turned about like a stone, or wheat in a sieve, by Satan who desires to sift every particle of faith out of you; but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not.' Hereby he would know the reason of his being compared to a stone, in regard to its durability, that he should not be, like numberless other substances, liable to be utterly decompounded, or dissipated into smoke. We shall now see what bearing this has upon the above quoted passage in Mat. xvi. It is there said, 'And I say also unto thee that thou art Peter.' Here the translators have made a mistake, which, though at first sight it may appear trifling, yet is of serious import in different respects; it puts into the mouth of Christ what appears a childish senseless conceit,—'And I say also unto thee, that thou art Peter.' Here the word Peter stands in the verse as a mere name, without connection, and so without sense or meaning. Besides, though Christ gave him this name, he never afterwards addressed him by it, but always by the name Simon. It should have been translated, 'And I say also unto thee, that thou art a stone, and upon this rock.' Here is another mistranslation to which the former has given rise, for the Greek particle καὶ is frequently used as an adversative,—in English, but; and so it must be used here, because our Saviour manifestly contrasts Petros, a moveable stone, with Petra, an immoveable rock. 'But upon this rock.' Here the translators are short again, it should have been, 'the rock,' for the Greek article is put to it, which always pointed to a particular person, or thing, already known. But upon this 'the rock,' that you have so often read of in the Old Testament, 'the rock that begat thee;' 'the rock of ages;' 'the rock of salvation;' 'the rock of refuge;' and, as Paul says, 'they drank of that spiritual rock which followed them, and that rock was Christ." It is impossible, therefore, that Christ could mean the same persons by Petros and by Petra, as they are different words, and of different genders, and the accidents opposite—mobility opposed to immobility. The whole verse then will run thus, 'And I say also unto thee, that thou art a stone, but upon this, the rock, I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.' The Greek word δὲ, rendered also, being a discretive conjunction, is meant, therefore, to distinguish between things that are spoken about. The plain sense and meaning of the verse then will be, 'And I say unto thee, that notwithstanding of this glorious revelation now made unto thee, be not high-minded, but fear; beware of thinking too highly of thyself, this will give thee no pre-eminence. Though I have called thee to be an apostle, remember the name I have given thee—a moveable stone; and that thou wilt find ere Satan have done with thee. Thou art not fit, therefore, to be a foundation for my church; no, it is upon this rock alone, (in all probability pointing to himself), whom thou hast confessed to be the Christ, the Son of the living God, that I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.' It would appear here that our Saviour, foreseeing what would come to pass, meant to leave Papists totally inexcusable, by pointing out how entirely unfit Peter was for a foundation to his church. Besides the church, both of the Old and New Testament, is but one church, and must, therefore, rest on one foundation—Christ. For Paul says, 'Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ,' and "are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone." Signifying, according to the Greek construction, that Christ was the foundation the apostles and prophets themselves built upon. The apostle Peter himself says the very same thing, 1 Pet. ii. 6. And it is not unworthy of remark, that the apostle Peter sanctions all Paul's epistles, and ranks them along with the Scriptures of the Old Testament; a thing decidedly against the Papists, who could wish all Paul's epistles sunk in the bottom of the sea. 'Tis a wonderment that they have never as yet seen this, as an evidence of Peter's fallibility. But let us see what could entitle Peter to such a distinguished favour, for Christ appears to address him in terms of high consideration,—'Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven.' Was it simply because he had it revealed to him? Certainly not, for there could be no merit in that, though he was blessed in having it revealed to him. Was it because he had it exclusively revealed to him? Surely not, for the knowledge and acknowledgment of this was the very ground on which all the disciples joined him, and in which even his brother Andrew had the start of him, John i. 41. 'We have found the Messias, which is, being interpreted, the Christ.' Was it because he was more beloved by Christ than the rest? No; none of them had grieved him so much; besides, John was the beloved disciple, and would, therefore, have been preferred to the supremacy before Peter. Was it because he was more solid and stable than the rest? No; any of them would have had it before Peter for this reason. As this confession of their faith was common to them all, so they were all equally blessed, and so the keys were given unto them in common; and they had all in common the promise of the Spirit to enable them to exercise them, as appears from Mat. xviii. 18. What he says in the xvi. chapter to Peter individually, he says in the xviii. chapter to them all universally. All this must go for nothing with the Pope, who can impose any sense upon Scripture he pleases; he can even contradict the most express commands of Christ; and, what is still more base, make Christ contradict himself in the most flagrant manner. What can be more flagitious than to pretend that Christ gave the supremacy to Peter, after he had prohibited them, in the most express and peremptory manner imaginable, to exercise superiority one over another, Mat. xx. 20. When James and John, with their mother, came to Christ to ask of him this piece of pre-eminence, to set the one on his right hand, and the other on his left, in his kingdom, it is said, 'and when the ten heard it, they were moved with indignation against the two brethren. But Jesus called them unto him, and said, Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them.' And Luke adds, 'and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. But it shall not be so among you, but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister.' Can words convey a more direct and peremptory prohibition than this? Impossible; especially if we consider the kind of example used, and caveat added. Christ does not take his example from the high-priest under the law: that did not suit the object he had in view; for though the high-priest had the inferior priests under his hand, as it is said, yet the duties of both were clearly prescribed to them by the law. But the kings of the Gentiles were all perfect despots: their will was the law. But such is the Pope of Rome, his will is the law; so that Bellarmine says of him, 'if he should command vice to be virtue, and virtue to be vice, the church is bound to believe it.' A remarkable incident took place upon presenting the petition of these two brethren. It is said, 'and when the ten heard it, they were moved with indignation against the two brethren.'

"This is precisely what might have been expected in the present state of human nature; and the same ambition, after such a seducing object, will ever produce the same effects as it ever has done. Witness the wickedness carried on in the conclave: what lying, fraud, knavery, bribery, perjury, hypocrisy, and contention; and out of doors, what wars and excommunications, Pope delivering up Pope to the devil, and frequently setting all Europe in a flame,—the native consequence of ambition, and this direct violation of Christ's command, and caveat likewise.

"According to Mosheim, the bishops, that is, presbyters, or overseers, as the word bishop in the original signifies, and they were undistinguished in their character during the first and second centuries, 'The bishops,' he says, 'who lived in the cities, had, either by their own ministry, or that of the presbyters, erected new churches in the towns and villages adjacent. These churches continuing under the inspection and ministry of the bishops in cities, by whose labours and councils they had been engaged to embrace the gospel, grew imperceptibly into ecclesiastical provinces, which the Greeks afterwards called dioceses.' Behold here, then, the first rise of the man of sin, the consequence of transgressing the caveat. These bishops in cities, because, forsooth, they had been benefactors, claimed authority over them; and although that authority was moderately exercised at first, yet it grew up gradually from less to more, that it issued at last, in the revelation of a certain person whom Bellarmine calls a god on earth, and who, the Scripture says, exalts himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped. Another passage we shall adduce, is from Mat. xxiii. 8, 'But be not ye called Rabbi: for one is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren. And call no man your father upon the earth, for one is your Father, which is in heaven. Neither be ye called masters: for one is your Master, even Christ.'

"We have seen this passage quoted in the controversy, but never, in our opinion, fully explained or applied, so as to exhibit the peculiar force of it. It is manifest our Saviour does not mean to prohibit them the use of the word master, or father, as applying either to natural or spiritual generation, in every sense and application of it, for he himself acknowledges Nicodemus a master in Israel. A different word indeed is used, in the original, but quite synonymous; but he prohibits them to use it, or apply it to any man upon earth, in the same sense as it was applicable to him, and was due to him, as he taught as one having authority, and whose word was to be received and believed, merely because it was his word. And likewise the name father; in this sense it was due to God. Papists transgress this express prohibition, in both instances. The Pope is a master, in the same sense as Jesus Christ is, or he is nothing. The Pope calls himself father, and it must be in the same sense in which God is a father, for he is styled a God on earth, and he calls his votaries,—his sons,—his children.

"Now the apostle says, 'ye are all the children of God by faith in Jesus Christ.' In the very same way, therefore, are persons the children of the Pope, viz. by faith in the Pope. 'For one is your master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren.' Now brethren are all equals. Can any thing be more clear and express than this? The whole passage can neither be wrested nor explained away. But to give the supremacy to Peter is a flat contradiction of it. That however has been already shown to be utterly groundless—for Christ did not say that he would build his church upon Petros, a stone, but upon Petra, a rock. Neither did he say that Simon was Petra, a rock, but Petros, a loose moveable stone.

"But Papists have another fort to flee into, in case they should be beaten out of the former, viz. these three words in the last chapter of John's Gospel, 'Feed my sheep.' We know that shepherds feed sheep, but that a shepherd should feed shepherds is rather a solecism in pastoral affairs. But let us give them all fair play. Persons of every denomination are Christ's sheep, and these words give him a commission to feed them. This looks specious. But did not Christ give the very same commission to every one of the apostles, in these words, 'Go and preach the gospel?' but to preach the gospel, is to feed the sheep with the doctrines and ordinances thereof; so that they are one and the same thing in every point of view whatever. And at his final parting with them, did he not give the same extended commission to all of them? Mark xvi. 15. 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature.' John xx. 21. 'Then said Jesus to them again, Peace be unto you: as my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. And when he had said this, he breathed on them and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained.' Where then is the pre-eminence of Peter? It is by these texts destroyed for ever. The same commission to feed the sheep, and to exercise the keys, is given to them all jointly. But let us examine a little farther into this matter. Peter had three times denied his Master, by denying that he was his disciple, and the last time, to put an end to all strife, he denied it upon his solemn oath, and declared that he knew nothing at all about him. From that moment, Peter was no more an apostle of Jesus Christ than Pontius Pilate. Apostleship, supremacy, keys, and all went together. But though Peter had cast off Christ, Christ had not cast him off, and meant to restore him to his apostleship again, and as he had thrice denied him publicly in the face of God, angels, and men, he calls upon him three times to confess his love to him, and as often renews his commission, 'feed my sheep.' This it seems Christ thought necessary. There was something very remarkable took place the third time. It is said Peter was grieved because he said to him the third time, Lovest thou me, as if he had doubted of his sincerity. Peter had denied him three times, but had grieved Christ exceedingly the third time, by calling upon God, the searcher of hearts, to attest the truth of his entire ignorance of him, even before his Master's face. Christ therefore drew from him a corresponding appeal to himself as the searcher of hearts, that he really did love him, and Christ says nothing against it. If Judas fell from his apostleship by transgression, as Peter says, as certainly Peter fell from it by his denial of his Master by oath. The commission, "feed my sheep," restored him to his apostleship, but nothing more; for it was that commission, that made both him, and all the rest, apostles at first. It was building the church upon him, as they pretend, and giving him the keys, that invested him with the supremacy. But not a word is said here about a rock, or keys, or any thing else. These poor deluded men therefore do greatly err, not knowing the Scriptures.—The next thing is the Pope's infallibility, which they found upon the words of Christ, 'And lo I am with you alway, even to the end of the world.' The Popes always assumed it; but before the council of Trent some of their writers affirmed it belonged to a general council,—others to a general council, with concurrence of the Pope,—others to the Pope, with concurrence of a general council. Since that period the Pope seems to be exclusively invested with it. Christ has been present with his church since the apostles' days, and will be with his faithful ministers to the end of the world. But if the Popes lay claim to such inspiration, as to render them infallible, we should expect them all to be men of singularly holy lives and conversations. Such was Peter himself, in the general tenor of his life, and such, he says, were all the inspired men of old. "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." But have there not been Popes, and not a few of them whose lives were a disgrace to human nature? Have there not been Popes who have rescinded the apostolical decrees and bulls of former Popes, who had every way the same claim to infallibility as themselves? Does not this infallibility prove the fallibility of the Papal chair, themselves being judges? But that such things have taken place, is confirmed by all historians, even by those of their own profession.

"There is one thing, however, that Papists must prove, otherwise their whole system must fall to ruin, "like the baseless fabric of a vision," viz. that Peter actually exercised this supremacy, and that the rest of the apostles submitted to him in the exercise of it. But not only can they not do this, but the contrary can be clearly proven against them. Peter, in both his epistles, styles himself simply an apostle of Jesus Christ, not arch-apostle, or prince of the apostles, as Papists call him; directs them to Christ as the living stone, the chief corner stone. Here was the time to put in his claim, if he had any. He, good man, however, never dreamed of any such thing. Nor is there one word, in either of his epistles, or in all that is recorded of him, in the Acts of the Apostles, that savours of it in the least. When he writes to the elders, he says, 'The elders which are among you, I exhort, who am also an elder.' Why this notandum, but to show them that he was so far from claiming any higher dignity than that of apostle, that he considered himself only as a co-presbyter, for so the word is in the original, and that he was going to give them no exhortation that he could not take to himself as a co-presbyter. And so he exhorts them not to take the oversight of the flock, for filthy lucre, neither as being lords over God's heritage. Is this the character of the Popish clergy? It does not appear, therefore, that Peter ever claimed any supremacy over the church. But did the church ever acknowledge it? No: Paul withstood and reproved him to his face, because he was to be blamed. When a point of faith was to be settled anent circumcision, it was not Peter that was consulted, but the whole apostles and elders, and the decree run in their name, not his, and in the terms of James' sentence, not his. But what puts the matter beyond all doubt, is, that he actually received and executed a commission from the apostles, at Jerusalem, in their presbyterial capacity, and so acted under their authority. And what greatly confirms the matter is, that he acted jointly in the commission with John, as his equal. For it is said, Acts viii. 14, 'Now, when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John.' Now, our Saviour says, whether is greater, he that sends, or he that is sent? The answer is an axiom. He that sends is greater than he that is sent." "J. C."

SATURDAY, JUNE 10TH, 1820.

ON the subject of the alleged supremacy of the apostle Peter, I have little to add to what has been so well said by my judicious correspondent J. C. It must be evident, to all who understand our Lord's words, Mat. xvi. 18, that whatever honour he meant to confer upon that apostle, he did not constitute him the rock, or foundation, on which he was to build his church. Peter was no more fit to be such a foundation, than he was to create the universe: and it is the avowed doctrine of St Augustine, one of Rome's greatest oracles, that Christ did not promise to build his church upon Peter, but upon himself, the rock which Peter had confessed. Augustine writes as follows: "Thou art Peter, and upon the rock which thou hast confessed, upon this rock which thou hast known, saying, 'Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God,' will I build my church: I will build thee upon me, not me upon thee." August. de Verb. Domin. Serm. 13. See Via Tuta and Via Devia, p. 167. It must be admitted that this great divine was not a thorough-bred Papist. It was some ages after his time before the man of sin came to maturity, or that the Pope was declared universal bishop. Augustine was not fully initiated into the doctrine of Peter's supremacy. He did not foresee the use which was afterwards to be made of such a pretext, by the bishops of Rome; and accordingly, taking the words of Christ in their plain simple meaning, he gave them the true Protestant interpretation, that Christ himself, and not Peter, was the rock on which he would build his church.

Augustine, however, is one of the fathers of the church, whose unanimous consent is pleaded by Papists, as establishing all their nostrums. I consider the authority of this father, and of all the rest, with regard to the meaning of any passage of Scripture, as no greater than that of any divine of the present age: but when I can produce such an authority against the church of Rome, it is of great weight upon her own principles. I would tell the Pope, if he would admit me to an audience—"You teach that Peter is the rock on which Christ built his church; that you are Peter's successor: that you consider the whole weight of the church as resting upon you; and that this is according to the unanimous consent of the fathers of the church from the earliest ages." In reply to the last assertion I would say: "Here is one of the greatest fathers of the church, one who presides to this day over all your divines, even as St Crispin presides over cobblers, and St Gallus over sheep and geese, (see page 308) who plainly declares that Christ did not build his church upon the stone πέτρος, but upon himself (τῇ· πετρᾳ) the rock." I have many weightier reasons for rejecting the whole doctrine maintained by the church of Rome, on this point; but I think the above is enough to show, that she cannot plead on her behalf the unanimous consent of the fathers.

Dr Campbell of Aberdeen, in his Lectures on Ecclesiastical History, (Lect. v.) has conceded a good deal, on the subject of Peter's primacy, at least among the apostles; though he by no means concedes the point of supremacy; and it appears to me, that even on the point of primacy, the celebrated critic has conceded more than enough. There is no evidence in the New Testament, either that Christ appointed that apostle, or that his brethren chose him to preside over them, or that the whole of them, even upon the day of Pentecost, were not upon a footing of perfect equality; nay, from the circumstance of Peter's being appointed by the rest, as observed by my correspondent J. C. to go upon a mission to Samaria, it is very evident that the other apostles did not look upon him as their superior, from whom they were to receive instructions, seeing they actually gave him instructions, at least an appointment, to go upon a certain work, in the service of their common Master.

It is true that Peter makes a more conspicuous appearance in the evangelical narrative, during our Lord's personal ministry, than any other of the apostles; and his name is first mentioned as engaged in the great work of the day of Pentecost. But there is nothing of supremacy, or even of primacy, in this. In every company, however small, some one will be found more fit for business than the rest; some one, perhaps, more forward, more courageous, and more ready to engage in any enterprise; some one to whom the rest of the company will insensibly give place, or tacitly concede a temporary precedence, merely for the sake of present convenience, or for the attainment of some object which may be better effected by one hand, or one mouth, or one pen, than if a dozen of such instruments were employed about it, all at once. I have often seen in the affairs of this world—in public business—in the management of public charities, for instance, that the work falls almost naturally into the hands of two or three individuals, whose aptness for such business is known and acknowledged; and of these two or three, one will be looked up to, as better qualified to be a leader or president, than either of the other two. Providence has thus wisely ordered that human talents should find their level, and have scope for exercise; and if there were not a voluntary concession of precedence, in favour of those whose personal endowments qualified them for it, the business of the world could not be carried on, with any degree of regularity.

The same remarks apply to religious society. Suppose a few Christians, entire strangers to one another, were to meet in a desert. Suppose them to enter into conversation upon the subject of the common salvation, they would not have talked for an hour, till some one would engage the affections of the rest so far, as to induce them to request him to take the lead, and preside in their worship, while they continued together, and be their mouth in offering up their united prayers and thanksgivings to the God of their salvation. This would not give the distinguished individual a primacy or superiority over the rest. The very circumstance of his being greatest in spiritual gifts, would teach him to be the servant of all, and to consider himself the least of all.

In the small company of the apostles, Peter appears to have been such a character as I have here described. He was not the first of them who became Christ's followers. He was not the most distinguished by his Master's private friendship, for this honour was conferred on John, perhaps in a still greater degree upon Lazarus and his sisters; but Peter was a man of a bold and decided character; of a generous and ardent temper, rather too much inclined to what is called forwardness. From the more retiring disposition of the rest, they would naturally fall into the rear of him when they had any communication to make to their Master; and as he sometimes spoke to Christ in the name of all the apostles, Christ would of course reply more directly to him. This precedence, however, was merely personal, not official, as the church of Rome would have it. It arose out of the natural or spiritual endowments of the man, but conferred no superiority of office. If Christ had appointed Peter to the primacy, or if, in virtue of his qualifications for rule over the other apostles, they had chosen him to be perpetual president, he would then indeed have had an official superiority, but nothing of this kind appears from the New Testament. Though we admit that he presided in the first meeting of the church in Jerusalem, when there were present a hundred and twenty disciples, including the eleven apostles, this does not imply that he was superior to the other ten, any more than a minister preaching to a congregation, in which there are other ministers, would imply that the preacher was superior in office, to his brethren in the ministry. It is necessary for the sake of order, in every meeting for worship or business, that some one preside; to lead the worship, or state the business of the meeting. Peter seems to have done so, in the meeting above referred to, when the business was to elect an apostle in the room of Judas; but Peter did no more than what any other of the apostles might have done. He had no superiority but that of order for the time, and which any other of the apostles might have, the next time they met. Ministers in the church of Scotland have no superiority over one another. The Moderator of the General Assembly is, indeed, officially above them all while the Assembly sits; but immediately on the dissolution of that venerable body, he returns to a station of perfect equality with his brethren.

It does not appear that Peter presided in the meeting of the church in Jerusalem, with the apostles and elders, of which an account is given in the fifteenth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. It is not indeed said explicitly who presided there; but the probability is that it was James. After a good deal of discussion, Peter stood up, and stated some plain facts; and then declared his judgment upon the question before them. He was followed on the same side by Barnabas and Paul: after which James performed the part of president, by summing up the substance of what had been narrated, especially by Peter; showing its conformity with Old Testament prophecy; and proposing to the whole body the sentence which he thought should be pronounced. The brethren were satisfied, the thing was unanimously agreed to, and the question was set at rest. In the whole passage there is not a word of superiority claimed by, or conceded to Peter, by the other apostles, except it be the honour of having been chosen by God to preach the gospel to the Gentiles; an honour which was afterwards more abundantly conferred upon the apostle Paul.

From the history of the last mentioned apostle, and from the epistles which he wrote, it is very evident that he at least acknowledged no superiority in Peter. Had Peter been then acknowledged as the vicar of Christ on earth, the regular way would have been for Paul to go to him, and receive his commission from his hands. But Paul tells us plainly, that this was not the case; for the gospel which he preached, he received not from man, neither was he taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ, Gal. i. 12. He did not hold his commission at second hand from Peter, as all the Popish priests hold theirs of the Pope; and he adds in the second chapter of the same epistle, that not even the three apostles, James, and Cephas, (i. e. Peter) and John, who had been distinguished above all the rest on several occasions, particularly on the mount of transfiguration, added any thing to his authority as an apostle of Christ. These three, indeed, he says, seemed to be pillars, that is, leading men even among the apostles; but jointly or severally, he concedes to them no superiority over himself. Certainly then, he was not a believer in the Popish doctrine that Peter was the vicar of Christ, and prince of the apostles.

It seems to have been admitted, that in the apostolic college, as it is called, there was a difference of rank, arising solely from the endowments or gifts of the Holy Ghost, who divided to every one according to his own will. All the apostles were vessels meet for their Master's use; but some were honoured more than others. Thus we find that Paul speaks of some whom he calls the very chiefest apostles (2 Cor. xi. 5.) which implies that there was a distinction among them; but then he tells us that he was not a whit behind the very chiefest. Certainly, then, he acknowledged no superiority on the part of Peter, who, though a chief apostle, and a pillar, had no pre-eminence above him, who was as one born out of due time.

In the same chapter, (Gal. ii.) we have a melancholy evidence of the fact, that Peter was not the rock on which the church was built; but at best only a moveable stone, by his dissimulation with the Gentile converts, in order to keep on good terms with the Jewish ones. For this, Paul reproved him to his face, because he was to be blamed. Paul does not say that he approached him, as the vicar of Christ, with a humble representation and remonstrance, as would have been proper, had Peter been his ecclesiastical superior; but as one upon a footing of equality, and as one Christian would admonish another, when he is to blame, Paul reproved his brother apostle for the grievous error into which he had fallen, which was not only disheartening to the believing Gentiles, but which actually had the effect of seducing Barnabas, a most faithful disciple, from the simplicity of the gospel. See this subject treated more at length in No. vii.

Upon the same passage of scripture, Mat. xvi. 18, 19, the church of Rome builds this other error, that Peter exclusively was entrusted with the keys of the kingdom of heaven. Christ did indeed promise them to him, but not to him alone; any more than he described the blessedness of him alone, when he said, "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed it to thee, but my Father who is in heaven." Christ had put a question to all the apostles, "Whom say ye that I am?" Peter answered for them, "thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Christ, on receiving this answer, pronounced the blessing as above, which evidently extended to the other apostles to whom the same truth was revealed, and who concurred in the same confession. We might then as well say, that Christ blessed Peter exclusively of the rest, as that he promised the keys to him alone. But the matter is put beyond a doubt, by the declared purpose for which the keys were to be given; "Whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." This was a promise to Peter, that he should have power and authority (for of this the keys were a symbol), in the kingdom of heaven; that is, the New Testament church. But that Christ's promise extended to the other apostles, is evident from the fulfilment of it. When the appointed time arrived, that is, when he was about to ascend to heaven, he conferred this power on the eleven apostles without distinction. Binding and loosing in the kingdom of heaven, are terms of precisely the same import as remitting and retaining sins. They relate to the authority which Christ conferred on his inspired apostles with regard to doctrine, worship, government, and discipline in the church. It is certain, then, that Christ conferred this upon all the apostles. Thus we read, John xx. 21—23, "Then said Jesus unto them again, Peace be unto you; as my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost. Whose soever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained." Here there is no superiority or supremacy conferred upon Peter. He stands upon a perfect equality with his brethren in the apostleship; and as for what Christ afterwards said to him, "Feed my lambs, feed my sheep," it implied no more than what was required of the rest of the apostles, and what they were all alike empowered to do, by the divine commission, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature."

Much has been said and written about the power of the keys; that is, who is entitled to exercise authority in the church of Christ? and I am inclined to think that the only satisfactory answer that can be given to the question, is, that the power still remains where Christ originally placed it; that is, in the hands of the apostles, who were his accredited ambassadors. Christ himself is Lord and King in his own church. He hath the key of David. This symbol of authority is laid on his shoulder. "He openeth, and no man can shut; he shutteth, and no man can open." "The Father hath given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as he hath given him." But when Christ went to heaven, he left his apostles to act and speak on his behalf; and he invested them with such authority, that he who heard them, heard him, and he who despised them, despised him. As the Father sent him, so he sent them. This was connected with the promise and gift of the Holy Ghost, which was conferred on the day of Pentecost, in virtue of which they became infallible teachers and rulers in the kingdom of heaven. What the apostles did and taught under this divine influence, was divine teaching and divine operation. The Holy Ghost brought to their remembrance, and enabled them to state with infallible precision, the things which Christ himself had told them; and the Divine Spirit also instructed them with regard to all the other matters, which were necessary for the edification and government of the church; which things Christ himself only "began to do and teach," (Acts i. 1.) while he was personally with them; reserving the finishing lessons, to be imparted by the Holy Ghost, of whom he said, "when he is come, he will teach you all things and bring all things to your remembrance."

Now Christ himself having the key of David; that is, sovereign authority in the church, was pleased to devolve the exercise of that authority upon his apostles; but only in connection with their receiving the Holy Ghost; so that all that they did, and spoke, and wrote, should be under his divine inspiration. Authority exercised under such influence, was nothing less than divine authority. Such was that which the apostles exercised in their personal ministry in the churches which they planted; and having committed to writing what the Holy Ghost dictated for the government, instruction, and edification of the church in all future ages, their writings are the only authoritative rule by which the conduct of Christians and Christian churches is to be regulated. Christ gave authority to them, and they only of the human race have been honoured to carry the keys of the kingdom of heaven.

I am perfectly aware, that a claim of right to exercise the power conferred by the gift of the keys, is made by church rulers of all denominations of Christians; and I think nothing that I have said will be considered as interfering with such right, if it be kept in its proper place. In every church, however great, or however small, there must be the power of binding and loosing; of receiving and excluding members; of administering divine ordinances, whether of doctrine, worship, government, or discipline; but whether this power be lodged in the hands of many, or in the hands of few, it is only ministerial. It is, in a subordinate sense, making use of the keys which Christ gave to the apostles; but if the eye and the hand of Him who inspired the apostles, do not guide every turning of the keys, they will be used not for the edification, but for the destruction of the church. In plain English, the written word of the apostles is the only rule by which the power of Christ is to be administered in his church; and therefore, properly speaking, they only are the holders of the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and he would not have intrusted such power even to them, had he not ordained the exercise of it to be under the immediate guidance of the Holy Ghost, so that they should be infallibly secured against falling into error, in the exercise of the authority which he committed to them. There are many who despise church authority; and certainly the usurpations of the church of Rome are calculated to make men both dread and despise it; but all lawful authority in the church, is the authority of Christ; and he who despises it must bear his own burden.

It is worthy of remark, that in the very passage, (Mat. xviii. 15—18) which churches and church-rulers plead as their warrant for exercising the power of the keys, that power is expressly referred to the apostles. Offenders, after private means for their recovery to repentance have been used in vain, are to be reported to the church: and if any one shall refuse to hear the church, it is commanded that he be considered as a heathen and a publican; that is, that he be put away from their communion; and it is added, not absolutely or unconditionally, what the church shall do, shall be confirmed; but "Verily I say unto you (my apostles) whatsoever ye shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." The confirmation in heaven, therefore, of the sentence of any church upon earth, depends upon its being a sentence of the apostles. It must be a binding or a loosing; a retaining or a remitting of sins, according to their word; otherwise it is of no authority whatever in heaven, though it should have the sanction of all the councils and all the congregations in the world.

In all such discussions as these, we ought to remember that Christ himself hath the key of David. This prerogative he claimed for himself, after Peter was dead (Rev. iii. 7); and he holds the key in his own hand still. He has the entire disposal of the treasures of everlasting life. "It pleased the Father that in him all fulness should dwell;" and this fulness is dispensed, according to the testimony of his apostles, to all who apply to him. "Out of his fulness they themselves had received, even grace upon grace;" that is, favour upon favour, more than they could express: and what they saw, and heard, and contemplated of the word of life (1 John i. 1—3) they have declared to us, that we also may have fellowship with them, whose fellowship truly is with the Father, and with his Son, Jesus Christ. But supposing the key of such treasures to be transferred to the Pope of Rome, the pretended successor of Peter, the church would be left in dependence upon a fellow-creature, upon a broken reed that could afford no help, but would wound and disappoint him who should be so foolish as to lean upon it.

SATURDAY, JUNE 17TH, 1820.

A GRAVE author of the Church of Rome derives the supremacy of Peter from something like a pun, in the new name Cephas, which Christ gave him. This word, pronounced Kephas, which signifies a stone, resembles a Greek word which signifies head; therefore, he will have it, that Peter is the head of the church. "For therefore," says Optatus of Milevis, in Africa, "Christ gave him the cognomination of Cephas, ἀπὸ τῆς κεφαλῆς, to show that St Peter was the visible head of the catholic church." In Scotland, there are several families of the name of Roy, which is almost the same as Roi, which, in French, signifies king; ergo, all the Roys must be kings; and the M'Ilroys, or Macs-les-rois, must be princes of the blood royal. I am afraid the herald's office would not confirm this doctrine; but I am sure it is as good as that of the African divine, who finds the supremacy of Peter in the resemblance between the Greek word κεφαλη, "the head," and the Syriac word Cephas, "a stone." I find the words of the above named Optatus in Jeremy Taylor's Discourse of the Liberty of Prophesying, edit. 1647, page 127.

The first thing which Papists wish us to believe concerning Peter, is, that he was the vicar of Christ and prince of the apostles; the next is, that he was the founder and first bishop of the Church of Rome. Having shown that he was not, by divine authority, invested with the former office, I come now to show that he never held the latter; at least, that there is no evidence of his having done so; and, in a matter of so much importance, we ought to have the most positive evidence. In fact, the whole system of Popery rests upon the assumption that Peter was the first bishop of Rome, that is, the first Pope; and if this cannot be proved, and it certainly has never yet been proved, the whole fabric must fall to the ground.

It is my wish to do justice to this, as well as to every other subject that comes under my review; and, therefore, I shall give here the entire chapter, or "table of St Peter," as it is laid down by the translators of the Rhemish New Testament, omitting the years of the Roman emperors and of the ascension, and noting only the common Christian era.

"Anno Domini, 34. Peter causeth the disciples to proceed to the election of another apostle in Judas' room, Acts i. Receiveth, with the rest, the gifts of the Holy Ghost, on Whitsunday. He made the first sermon, and converted 3000, Acts ii. He cureth one born lame; preacheth Christ and penance to the Jews; so that 5000 believed, Acts iii. and iv. He is imprisoned, released again, threatened, and commanded to preach no more; but he, with John, answereth, that they must obey God more than man, Acts iv. He striketh dead, with a word, Ananias and Sapphira, for sacrilege, Acts v. He is sent with John to Samaria, to confirm the newly baptized, where he reproveth Simon Magus, Acts viii.

"A. D. 35. He healeth Eneas at Lydda, and raiseth Tabitha from death at Joppa, Acts ix. He is warned and taught by a vision to preach to Cornelius, a Gentile, Acts x. He defendeth his receiving of the Gentiles, Acts xi.; and records, (Acts xv.) that God called the first Gentiles by his ministry; so that Paul's first preaching to them, and his going to Arabia, must be after this. See St Chryst. in Act. No. 22, Euseb. lib. ii. cap. 3.

"A. D. 36. He continueth preaching in divers parts of Jewry, and the provinces adjoining. About two years after this, St Paul visiteth him in Jerusalem, Gal. i. He preacheth in Syria, and the provinces of Asia Minor, Bithynia, Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, ordaining bishops and priests in divers places, 1 Pet. i. Niceph. lib. ii. c. 35. Platina in Petro.

"A. D. 39. He goeth to Antioch, and preacheth there, and maketh that his seat; yet not remaining there continually, but, for the affairs of the church, departing thence sometimes to Jerusalem, sometimes to other places. Hiero. in Catalogo. Ignat. ad Magnesianos. At Jerusalem he is cast into prison, after the putting of St James to death, by the commandment of Herod. He is prayed for by the whole church, and delivered out of prison by an angel, Acts xii.

"A. D. 44. Avoiding the fury of Herod, he leaveth Jewry again. He appointeth Euodius bishop of Antioch. Euseb. in Chron. and lib. li. 3. cap. 16. Suidas Ignat. ad Antiochen. And passing by Corinth, HE CAME TO ROME, to convince Simon Magus. Hiero. in Catalogo. Euseb. lib. ii. cap. 12, 13, 24. Concil. tom. i. He approveth and declareth the gospel of St Mark to be canonical. Hiero. in Catalogo. Euseb. lib. ii. cap. 14. Having founded the Church of Rome, and planted his apostolical seat there, afterwards absent from the city, (either expelled thence, with other Jews, Cornel. Tacit. in Claudio; or rather, according to the office of his apostleship, leaving it for a time,) he visited other churches, and came to Jerusalem again, using, both in his absence and presence, Linus and Cletus for his coadjutors. Tom. 2. Concil. p. 656. Epiph. tom. 2. Hiero. 27.

"A. D. 51. He holdeth the first council, Acts xv. He is reprehended at Antioch by St Paul, Gal. ii., except that difference fell before the council, as some think, August. op. 19. He returneth to Rome again. The Roman faith, by his diligence, now made famous through the world, Rom. i. and xv. Theodoret in xvi. Rom. Thence he writeth his first epistle, 1 Pet. v. Euseb. lib. ii. cap. 14. Hiero. in Catalogo. He sendeth St Mark to Alexandria, and others to plant the faith in divers parts of the world, Grego. lib. v. cap. 60, and lib. vi. ep. 37, Nicepho. lib. ii. c. 35. He writeth his second epistle, a little before his death, which Christ revealed to him to be at hand, 2 Pet. i. He taketh order for his successor.

"A. D. 70. He was finally crucified at Rome. See the last Annot. John c. 21."

The annotation here referred to is as follows:—"Another shall gird thee. He prophesieth of Peter's martyrdom, and of the kind of death which he should suffer, that was crucifying; which the heretics, fearing that it were a step to prove that he was martyred in Rome, deny; whereas the fathers, and ancient writers, are as plain in this, as that he was at Rome." Then follows a reference to Origen, as quoted by Eusebius, and Eusebius himself, &c. &c., which may be allowed to make it as certain that Peter was crucified in Rome, as that he was bishop of Rome, or that he ever saw Rome, both of which yet remain to be proved; for nothing that these fathers have written tends to prove the fact of the apostle's having been there, except that there was a vague tradition on the subject, which is surely a foundation extremely slender for building such a fabric as the Church of Rome professes to build upon it.

If Peter ever was in Rome, he would have been there a person of much less consequence than the youngest dissenting minister is, at present, in Glasgow, not to speak of doctors in divinity. We know that when Paul was brought to that great city, with a military escort, and under all the solemnity of an appeal to Cesar, he was suffered to live for two years in a hired apartment, without being an object of public attention, except to such Jews and others as chose to call upon him. Nay, he was in such obscurity, that it required very diligent search to find out where he lodged, see 2 Tim. i. 17. Now, had Peter found his way to the same city, bringing no other news than the news of salvation by Jesus Christ, he would have been considered a person of no more consequence than any other wandering Jew, who might come to Rome upon business of his own. If he had proceeded to perform miracles, he would probably have engaged public notice. His miracles having been performed, to whatever power they were ascribed, would probably have been attested by some eye-witness; and we should have had some record of it by some of the writers of the day. We cannot even produce this evidence of Paul's having been in Rome; and we know the fact of his having been there from no other source than the apostolic record. We have not this evidence of Peter's having been there; and, therefore, we cannot reasonably be called upon to believe it; much less to build a system of religion upon it, as is done by the Church of Rome.

On such a subject, the vague tradition of fathers, who lived hundreds of years after the apostolic age, is of no authority whatever. I adhere to my position, that the apostle Peter was not in the esteem of the Roman empire, or even of Roman citizens, a person of such consequence, as to engage the particular notice of the historians of the day. There was, therefore, no record of his travels and labours preserved, except what was taken by his Christian brethren, and preserved in the New Testament. We know how difficult it is to come at the truth, with regard to persons who lived within a few years of our own time, especially if no written memorial of them has been preserved. It must have been much more difficult in the first ages of the Christian era, and in the disturbed state of the Roman empire, to ascertain any fact with regard to the life and death of men who were so generally abhorred, and so cruelly persecuted, as the Christians were, except what they and their cotemporaries had written. Though the writers who speak of Peter's having been at Rome, had lived within fifty years of his death, they would not have been able to ascertain the fact without great difficulty; surely then, where two or three hundred years had elapsed, it must have been impossible to know any thing of the matter, with certainty. There were few authors, and no printing, in those days. Real facts, with regard to a man politically so insignificant, could only be transmitted from mouth to mouth, by persons still more obscure; and, by the time of Origen or Eusebius, no man could tell what was true and what was not, except what the Christian churches had preserved, as the authentic testimony of eye and ear witnesses; that is, just what we have in the New Testament, and nothing more can be depended on.

Besides, the traditionary account of Peter's having been in Rome is not consistent with itself, or with the authentic account of him which we have in the New Testament. "Concerning the time of his coming to Rome," says Fulke, "the ancient writers do not agree. Eusebius saith, it was in the time of Claudius; but by Hierom, who saith he sat there twenty-five years, until the last year of Nero, it must follow, that he came thither the second or third of Claudius; yet Damasus saith, he came to Rome in the beginning of Nero's empire, and sat there twenty-five years; whereas, Nero reigned but fourteen years. He saith also, that his disputation with Simon Magus was in the presence of Nero the emperor. Eusebius reporteth it under Claudius. Anterius, bishop of Rome (as Nicephorus testifieth), did write that Peter was translated from Antioch to Rome, and from thence he passed to Alexandria, because he might more profit the church there." These are all matters of mere hearsay, reported hundreds of years after Peter's death, and, therefore, entitled to no credit at all. Had Peter been twenty-five years bishop of Rome, he must have been sitting there at the time that Paul was there, or, at least, when he addressed an epistle to the church in Rome; and yet it is a fact, that in his epistle to the believers in Rome, and in all his epistles written from Rome, Paul makes no mention of his brother apostle; but he does make mention of some things that would have been most disgraceful to Peter, had he been there. No salutations were sent to Peter by Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, while he pays this respect to a host of meaner persons, chap. xvi. And when he was a prisoner in Rome, he sent no salutations from Peter to any of the churches or individuals to whom he wrote; surely, then, Peter was not there. Paul says, "at his first appearance, no man stood by him, but that all forsook him." Surely, if Peter had been in Rome, he would not have deserted his brother in his affliction, and when brought before Nero to answer with his life. The church in Rome, of which Paul had heard so many good things, before he saw them, had declined so much by the time he came to them, that he spake as if there had not been one among them in whom he could confide. "All men," says he, "seek their own, not the things which are Christ's," Phil. ii. 21. He would surely have made the exception of Peter, had he been there.

The fact seems to be, that the tradition of Peter's having been at Rome, and his coming there to contend with Simon Magus, seems to have arisen out of a confused account of what took place in Samaria, Acts viii., in which it is recorded, that the apostle had a sorcerer to contend with. It was easy, after the lapse of two or three hundred years, to transfer the scene of this contest to Rome; especially when the church in the imperial city began to put forward her claim to be the mother and mistress of all churches. Then it appeared to be a matter of great importance to have it believed that the highly honoured apostle, Peter, was their founder, and first bishop. The slightest surmise would eagerly be caught hold of, and would be repeated from mouth to mouth, and from age to age, until the thing became fixed in the minds of all, as an undoubted truth. The meaning which was unjustly affixed to Christ's words, "I give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven," as addressed in the first instance to Peter, served to confirm the delusion.

One cannot help reflecting, with some degree of melancholy, on the low and contemptible ideas which Papists must have of the office and work of the apostles. Peter, according to them, came to Rome for the express purpose of opposing Simon Magus, as if this had been an object worthy of so long a journey, by so great a man. When such deceivers, as Simon and Elymas, came in the way of apostles, we are informed how they dealt with them; but we never read of apostles going out of their way to seek for them. These sorcerers were indeed enemies of the truth, but the apostles had as great enemies as they to contend with, in the hearts of all the men whom they addressed, until they were subdued by the gospel. It would have been matter of great triumph for Satan, if he had got all the apostles set a hunting after jugglers, and to neglect the work of preaching the gospel to sinners.

It might be admitted, were there the slightest evidence of it, that Peter, in the course of his journey, came to Rome; but Papists would gain nothing by the admission, unless it be farther shown that he was bishop of Rome, of which there is not the shadow of evidence. Nay, I maintain that his holding such an office would have been inconsistent with the higher office of an apostle, with which we are sure he was invested by Christ himself. The bishop of any one church has the official oversight of that church, but not of any other. Had Peter been chosen by the church in Rome to be their bishop, he could not have accepted of the office, without laying down that which he had received from his Lord and Master, and which made it imperative upon him to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. Upon Paul came daily the care of all the churches, especially of the Gentiles, which he had planted: and upon Peter, no doubt, came the care of all the churches, especially among the Jews, of which he was entrusted with the more immediate charge, as seems to have been intimated by the opening of Providence, and the suggestion of the Holy Ghost, and acquiesced in, by the two apostles themselves, Gal. ii. 7. The apostles doubtless were bishops in the highest sense of the word, that is, they were overseers or pastors of Christ's flock, wherever they were; but the oversight, or pastoral charge of particular churches, they committed to men who were also bishops, but in an inferior sense. It was part of the work of apostles to ordain ordinary bishops; and this power seems also to have been conferred on the evangelists Timothy and Titus; but the apostles themselves, so far as appears, never consented to become bishops of particular churches. Yet, wherever they had their residence, at any time, the bishops of the churches who had access to them, and the churches themselves, would, no doubt, look up to them as their spiritual fathers, and overseers in the Lord. Thus we may admit, that James in Jerusalem, and Peter in Antioch, and Paul in Rome, and John in Ephesus, exercised episcopal authority in these places, without supposing them officially attached to them as their peculiar charge. Who first preached the gospel in Rome, and planted the church there, we do not know; but it does not appear that ever they were favoured with the presence of any of the apostles, except Paul; and it is not even pretended that he was their bishop. Some of the fathers, indeed, join him with Peter, in laying the foundation of the Church of Rome; though it is certain, from Rom. i. 10, 11, that there was a church there before Paul came to it.

Christ's words to Peter, as explained by John, chap. xxi. 18, 19, lead us to believe that Peter must have suffered martyrdom; but where, or in what manner, we know nothing with certainty. The apostles fell one by one, when it pleased their Master to call them from labour and suffering, to rest and glory with himself; but it does not appear that any of them appointed successors; indeed, that was a power that did not belong to them. Each of them had received his commission directly from Christ, and to Him he resigned it, along with his life. They left bishops or pastors to oversee the churches, and feed the flock of Christ, after their death, and to the end of the world; and they left their writings, as the infallible rule of faith and manners to all their churches, and to all the pastors. But their office, as apostles, they did not leave to others; and, therefore, in this sense, they had no successors.

When James, and Peter, and Paul, were taken away by violent death, and when several others of the apostles were probably removed in the same way, it is reasonable to suppose that such of the original twelve as survived, would be looked up to, as possessing the authority of all the rest. The apostle John, we have reason to think, outlived Peter by a number of years. Had Peter then been prince of the apostles, and vicar of Christ, it might have been expected, that, had he bequeathed his power to any one, it would have been to this beloved disciple. This, however, is not so much as pretended; but it is pretended that Peter appointed Clement and Linus to be his co-adjutors, and one of them, it is not certain which, to be his successor in the see of Rome. Now this would have been very irregular procedure, had there been any truth in it. Who was Clement, and who was Linus, that either of them should have been promoted over the head of the apostle John, to be Christ's vicar on earth, and universal bishop?

"It is no way likely," says Dr Jeremy Taylor, "that a private person should skip over the head of an apostle; or why should his successors at Rome enjoy the benefit of it more than his successors at Antioch, since that he was at Antioch, and preached there, we have a divine authority; but that he did so at Rome, at most, we have but a human; and if it be replied, that because he died at Rome, it was argument enough that there his successors were to inherit his privilege; this, besides that at most it is but one little degree of probability, and not of strength sufficient to support an article of faith; it makes that the great divine right at Rome, and the apostolical presidency, was so contingent and fallible as to depend upon the decree of Nero; and if he had sent him to Antioch, there to have suffered martyrdom, the bishops of that town had been head of the Catholic church."—Liberty of Prophesying, page 134. Had such a headship been really conferred upon Peter, and had there been any credible evidence of the fact, it would not have been invalidated on account of its having been effected by a decree of Nero, because this might have been part of the plan ordained by Providence for carrying the thing into effect; even as it was by the determinate council and foreknowledge of God, that Christ was, by wicked hands, crucified and slain. But then the fact remains to be proved. It remains to be shown that Peter was divinely appointed head of the Catholic church. While this point remains unproved, we have a very good right to say, that had Nero sent Peter to be put to death at Antioch, or any where else, and had it been appointed that the place of his death should give name to his see, and to the church in all time coming, then it depended upon the man who commanded his death, whether Rome, or Antioch, or Jerusalem, should thenceforth give name to the Catholic church.

These things are extremely trifling, but we must sometimes descend to trifles, when we engage with children, and even with the fathers of Rome, who cannot rise above childish things. In short, there is no sensible man who would venture the value of a new hat upon the proof of the fact that Peter was bishop of Rome; and yet Papists are so simple as to venture their all, both for time and eternity, upon it.

No. CII.

SATURDAY, JUNE 24TH, 1820.

IN the evangelical history, Peter's name is usually, if not uniformly, mentioned first, when the names of the apostles are given; and in one instance, (Mat. x. 2,) Peter is called the first; but for any thing we know, this may have been because he was the oldest man. It is impossible to give a list of names without putting one before another, and some one first, unless it be in the form of a round robin; and the order in which they are first written will generally be that in which they are repeated. This circumstance appears a very slender ground for building a great system upon; but Popish authors, and especially bishop Hay, lay great stress upon it. Now, if Peter was vicar of Christ at all, he could not properly be acknowledged such, till after Christ had left the earth. It was when Christ was about to ascend to heaven, that he conferred upon his apostles all the authority which he meant them to exercise; and he instructed them to wait for the promised effusion of the Holy Spirit, before they entered upon their work. Peter's headship could not properly commence sooner than Christ's ascension; and yet it so happens that after this, he is not always mentioned first when apostles are spoken of. In 1 Cor. i. 12, and iii. 22, he is mentioned the last of three,—Paul, Apollos, and Cephas; thus, one who was not an apostle at all in the original sense of the word, is put before Peter; and in 1 Cor. iii. 5, he is omitted altogether; and only Paul and Apollos are mentioned, though the subject under discussion is the same as that in which his name has been mentioned. Paul mentions himself before Peter, Gal. ii. 7, and in the 9th verse of the same chapter, the arrangement is, James, Cephas, and John, which would never have been the case, had Peter been the Pope of the day. No man writing from Rome at present would say, Cardinal Gonsalvi and the Pope; he would doubtless mention the Pope first, if he had a particle of good manners in him; and had Peter been looked up to by the other apostles as their holy father, Paul would doubtless have respected, and spoken of him as such, for no man understood better, or taught more plainly, the duty of giving honour to whom honour is due.

"St Peter," says bishop Hay, in his Sincere Christian, vol. i. chap. xii., "acted in this supreme capacity as head of the church, both when he called the brethren to deliberate about choosing one in the place of Judas, Acts i., and also when he gave the definitive sentence in the council of Jerusalem, after there had been much disputing, Acts xv. 7; but when he had spoken, all the multitude held their peace, ver. 12, and submitted to his decision, as did also St James, who assented to, and confirmed what he had said." The right reverend bishop must have been aware, that he was writing this for persons who had not Bibles, or who were not allowed to look into them, or who would not be at the pains to look into them, if they had them. He represents the whole multitude's holding their peace when Peter had spoken, as an implicit acquiescence in what he had said, and submission to him. Had it been so, it would have been right, seeing he was an inspired apostle; but in point of fact it was not so. The people held their peace, or kept silence, not as a sign of submission to Peter, but that they might give audience to Barnabas and Paul, and hear what they had to say, which would have been unnecessary had they considered Peter as having settled the controversy by his ipse dixit.

It is true that James assented to, and confirmed what Peter had said. He confirmed it by a quotation from the Old Testament, which was always reckoned a satisfactory confirmation, by believers who were originally Jews; but it is not true that all the people submitted to Peter's decision, for neither the proposal nor the decision was his. The proposal was that of James, who said, My sentence is, &c.; and the thing was agreeable to "the apostles and elders, with the whole church," ver. 22, but the decision itself was that of the Holy Ghost, on whose testimony it was founded, and by whose authority it was announced. "It seemed good unto the Holy Ghost, and to us," ver. 28, is the language in which the decision is addressed to the church in Antioch. The decree, therefore, as it is called, had all the authority of the Holy Ghost speaking in the Old Testament scriptures, and also speaking by the mouth of apostles who were inspired and infallible interpreters of the Old Testament. It was a decision from which no one could dissent without rebellion against God. On this point I suppose all Protestants, at least, are agreed; and it is not necessary that I should enter upon the discussion of minor points, on which some of the most enlightened of them differ in opinion; and on which there is much said on all sides. It is enough that I have shown that the decision in this case was not that of Peter; and that, therefore, the circumstance furnishes no evidence of his supremacy.

"Again," says bishop Hay, "the writers of Christianity, and holy fathers in every age, have always attested it as a truth revealed by God, that Jesus Christ did constitute St Peter prince of the apostles, and visible head of the church," vol. i. chap. xii. The bishop does not say to whom this was revealed; and as we have no authentic, or even credible revelation later than that of "St John the Divine," we cannot reasonably be required to believe any thing that comes after him, in the form of a revelation to any other divine or father of the church. But it is not true, that holy fathers in the church, in every age, have always attested this. The thing was quite unknown in the first and purest ages of the church, as is known by every man at all acquainted with the subject; and Papists themselves know, that they cannot maintain the point but by barefaced forgery, lying, and impudence.

"It is an undoubted fact," says the bishop, "that Peter's successors have always claimed this supreme authority, and have exercised it throughout the whole church, as occasion required, in every age, from the very beginning. Now, considering the nature of man, it is evidently impossible that any bishop of the church should have acquired such authority over all the rest, even in the most different nations and the most distant kingdoms, or that he could have exercised it every where among them, if it had not been given him from the beginning, and ordained by Jesus Christ." I admit that since the bishops of Rome pretended to be Peter's successors, they have always claimed this supreme authority, that is, more authority than Peter himself possessed; but for ages after this apostle's death, there were none who pretended to be his successors, and of course none who claimed such authority. I request the reader not to take this on my word; but to read all the histories that he can obtain, even those of Papists themselves, and he will find that what I assert is true.

The bishop finds the Pope in possession of supreme power over all who choose to submit to him; he takes it for granted, that he enjoys this as Peter's successor; and he considers it impossible that he should have acquired such power over all other bishops, unless it had been given him from the beginning, and ordained by Jesus Christ. The same argument may be used on behalf of all the despots and wholesale murderers that have been in the world. This will give a divine origin to the religion of Mahomet, and to the usurpation of Buonaparte. To confine our remarks at present to the latter, if the mere possession of absolute authority over the human race be a proof that it emanates from Christ, then Buonaparte must have held his power under a divine right. It is not more wonderful that one bishop in the church should acquire authority over all the rest by fraud and cunning, than that one French general should acquire power over all the rest by the same means, with the addition of the power of the sword, in the hands of thousands of soldiers whom he had won to support his cause. Both instances were no doubt divinely permitted, like every other usurpation upon the civil and religious rights of men; but the things themselves were according to the working of Satan.

It is asserted by bishop Hay, that "considering the nature of man, it is evidently impossible that any one bishop should have acquired such authority over all the rest," &c., "if it had not been given him from the beginning, and ordained by Jesus Christ." Now, in opposition to his reverence, I maintain, that it was from the very nature of man that such a thing was possible, and practicable, and that the attempt became successful. I speak of man as a sinful creature, estranged from the love of God, and the way of righteousness. Such a creature naturally desires to usurp the place of God upon any scale of usurpation that may appear attainable, from the low degree of making his own will the rule of his own conduct, up to the high degree of making his will the rule of conduct, not only of fellow-creatures, but even of God himself. The radical vice of human nature is lust of power. This has appeared in the Church of Rome as much as it did in Pagan Rome, or in any kingdom whatever. Now where this passion exists in a high degree, with a corresponding degree of cunning and boldness, and where the state of society and other circumstances favour the design, the highest degree of power may be obtained by one man over his fellow-creatures. One favourable circumstance for the attainment of such an object, is a state of general ignorance and corruption of manners; and if the man who aims at supreme power be able to command a few agents possessed of some degree of knowledge, and animated by similar ambition, he may by degrees come to rule the world as he pleases. The bishops of Rome found society in the third and fourth centuries deplorably ignorant and vicious; and they found a numerous priesthood ready to aid them in deceiving the people, and building up the power of the see of Rome, expecting that Rome would, in return, help to establish their power in their respective sees and parishes. The plan succeeded, as the world knows to its cost; and it would be difficult to account for it, without "considering the nature of man," as deeply tainted with the love of power on the one hand, and on the other, immersed in ignorance and the love of vicious indulgence.

I do not recollect any other argument in favour of Peter's supremacy which I have not answered in my seventh Number, and in my later ones, beginning at the ninety-ninth.—I think it will appear to the satisfaction of the reader, that there is no evidence to be found in Scripture, that Peter was vicar of Christ, prince of the apostles, and visible head of the church. That Peter held no such office is the point which I have been endeavouring to establish; and I leave the reader to decide whether or not I have succeeded. If I have, the main pillar of Popery is subverted; and if I have not, I have yet other matter in reserve, which I hope will accomplish my purpose.

But in the mean time let us attend to what Papists maintain about the necessity of a visible head of the church on earth. Real Christians are content that there is a spiritual and glorious Head of the church at the right hand of God in heaven, to whom they can come with all their petitions, in the full confidence of having their sins forgiven and all their need supplied: but this is not enough for Papists. They must have a head on earth, who is a sinner like themselves, and who will indulge them in their sins, without damping their prospects of happiness in the other world; and precisely such a head the Pope of Rome is, and has been, for many hundred years.

Bishop Hay asks; "Why did Christ institute one visible head of his church upon earth?" and he answers:—"Because, as the church is a visible body, or society of men, it was most becoming they should have a visible supreme head among them, like to the members of whom the body is composed. Besides, as the church was ordained to spread over all nations, differing from one another in language, customs, government, and every thing else except religion, it would have been morally impossible to have kept them all united in one body, if there were not one common visible head of supreme authority among them, to which all must submit: so that this head of the church is the centre of unity, by which the church of Christ, throughout the whole world, is joined in one body."—Sincere Christian, chap. xii.

In reply to this, I maintain, that the church of Christ is never represented in the New Testament as a visible body, having a visible head on earth; and therefore all that the bishop says about the necessity of such a head must go for nothing. He is not speaking of any particular or national church, and neither am I, but of the church of Christ; that is, the whole body of believers in Christ, and the sanctified through his blood, of all kindreds, and tongues, and people, and nations. These were never meant to be one visible body on earth; they could never all meet in one place, or be the subjects of one earthly head, in any sense of the word. They are all united to Christ, and to one another in him, who is really the head of his body, the church; and who never devolved the honour of this headship upon any creature. A mere human head could be of no use to such a body; because it could communicate no life, and it could not take an oversight of all or of any of the members; but Christ, by his word and Spirit, gives life to all the members of his body; by the same divine influence, he unites them to himself, and to one another, in an invisible, but indissoluble bond of union; he takes the oversight of every one of them; he feeds his flock like a shepherd; he leads them in the way of righteousness, and guides them with his eye.

To descend from this view of the Church of Christ and her divine Head, to the Church of Rome, and the Pope as her head, is such an example of the βαθος, or art of sinking, that I scarcely know how to write it. If the Pope were to limit his claim of headship to the Church of Rome, it might be conceded, that the head is good enough for the body; but when he claims to be the head of the catholic or universal Church of Christ, the thing is more absurd and impious than human language can express.

The headship which the Pope claims over the church, makes him virtually head of the state also, in all countries where Popery is the established religion. He claims, and has conceded to him, an allegiance more sacred than subjects yield to their princes; and from the hold which he has of the consciences of the people, by the agency of his priests, their allegiance to their civil rulers is just what the Pope pleases to make it. Nay, he is not satisfied with the allegiance of the subjects of all kings and princes where his religion prevails; but he must have the allegiance of sovereign princes themselves; and to these arrogant claims may be ascribed half the wars which desolated Europe for a thousand years.

Lord Clarendon, in his Introduction to his work entitled, "Religion and Policy," represents this usurpation of the bishop of Rome as having been "without doubt the cause of more rapine, and the effusion of more blood, than all the ambition of other princes and usurpers that hath been since the death of our Saviour; and," says he, "the propagation of Christianity hath been more obstructed by that obstinate, humorous, and senseless ambition, than by the arms and tyranny of the Turks and infidels. And how can we reasonably hope," continues his Lordship, "that those great and powerful princes, who command so much the greater part of the world, will ever embrace the Christian faith, when they know that they are not only thereby to cease to be Mahometans, but to cease to be monarchs, and admit another prince to have an equal, if not superior, command over their own subjects in their own dominions, and must cease to be emperors before they can be admitted to be Christians? When our Saviour himself, whilst he was upon the earth, and instituted that religion by which all men are to be saved, was so tender of, and jealous for, the entire power, prerogative, and privileges of kings and princes, that he would not suffer them either to be invaded or affronted for the advancement of the gospel itself; and consequently never intended, that by becoming Christians and followers of him, from being Jews and Gentiles, they should lose any of the pre-eminences they were possessed of; or that their subjects should pay them a less entire obedience and submission than they had formerly done; and when he intended that their conversion should be the most effectual means to reduce all the world to the faith of Christ; as indeed it was like to have been, till the Popes' usurpation of a spiritual distinct sovereignty obstructed the progress of it, and drove more from it, than ever it reconciled to it."

The same consideration must have a tendency to induce Mahometan and heathen princes to oppose the propagation of Christianity among their people. If Popery were Christianity, they would be sensible at once that they could not embrace it, without becoming subjects of a foreign power, and that none of their subjects could embrace it, without having their allegiance transferred to the Pope. If these princes were to see Christianity in its true character, as the friend of order and subordination, they could not oppose the propagation of it, without obstructing the peace and comfort of their subjects, as well as of themselves; but when they see Christianity only in the light of Popery, it is not surprising that they hate and oppose it, as the bane of every country into which it has found its way. But for Popery, the gospel might long ere now have been preached and believed throughout the whole world, as we hope it will be when Popery is destroyed; and as this grand consummation has been obstructed chiefly by the Church of Rome, for many centuries, that church, and all her adherents, may be expected to suffer, when the time shall arrive, the dreadful punishment which such wickedness deserves.

In showing how absurdly the Popes of Rome pretend to be the successors of Peter, I shall make considerable use, in my next Number, of the work of the noble and learned historian above quoted; and I shall make my extracts the more freely and largely, because I believe the work itself is in the possession of few, if any, of my readers on this side of the Tweed. I do not know a work of greater value in relation to this part of the controversy between Protestants and the Church of Rome. The edition before me, which, I believe, is the first and only one, was printed at Oxford as lately as 1791, with sufficient attestation of its authenticity. But before I give the result of Lord Clarendon's researches, I shall present the reader with the confused account which the Popish historian, Dupin, gives of those whom he conceived to be Peter's successors in the see of Rome.

"Let us begin," says he, "with the successors of St Peter, in the Church of Rome, the first and principal church." It is worth while to attend to this mode of expression. Dupin found, that during the first three centuries, there was not so much as a hint, that the Church of Rome was the catholic, or only true church of Christ; and he calls it only the first and principal church, for no reason that can be shown, but that Rome was the first and principal city at that time in the world. In what follows, he gives nothing as certain, with regard to Peter's successors, but only as a commonly received opinion hundreds of years after the period to which he refers.

"According to the common received opinion, to St Peter succeeded St Linus, to St Linus, Anacletus or Cletus, and to him St Clement. This order is observed by St Irenæus, Eusebius, and St Jerome, and in the ancient catalogues of the Popes; but Optatus, Rufinus, and St Augustine, and some other Latin authors, substitute St Clement immediately to St Linus, and place Anacletus in the third rank. Some distinguish Cletus from Anacletus. The author of the Apostolical Constitutions says, that St Linus was ordained by St Paul, and St Clement by St Peter. St Epiphanius conjectures, that St Peter at first ordained St Clement; but he refusing to accept the pontificate, and going out of the way, that St Linus and St Cletus did sucessively govern the Church of Rome, and that after the death of St Peter, St Clement succeeded to St Cletus. The best way is to hold the most common and most ancient opinion." Vol. ii. chap. 2.

The plain English of the above is, that nothing is certainly known of the matter, which is a strong presumptive argument, that the knowledge of it is of no importance to the comfort and edification of Christians. The author tells us with great gravity, that after the death of St Peter, St Clement succeeded St Linus; but he cannot tell, and no man in the world can tell, who was Peter's immediate successor, supposing it were admitted that he was bishop of Rome, which it is not. It is of no use to refer to a commonly received opinion, in the time of Eusebius or Augustine, hundreds of years after the thing is supposed to have happened, for they could know no more than we do. Dupin, writing of the succession of bishops in the see of Rome, tells us, that in the third century, after the death of St Fabianus, the see of Rome was vacant a whole year. The Church of Rome has often been called a many-headed monster; but here she appears as a monster without a head, and how she could live a whole year in this state, is not easy to divine.

No. CIII.

SATURDAY, JULY 1ST, 1820.

SUPPOSING it were granted that Peter was the first bishop of the church in Rome, the Pope would gain nothing by it, unless he were to become such a bishop as Christian bishops were in those days. Amidst the immense population of that great city, the Christians who composed the church were a poor and despised company, ever exposed to the violence of their heathen neighbours and superiors; and their bishop or pastor, whoever he was, would be looked upon in no higher light than the ringleader of the sect, and the principal object of hatred, by all the votaries of the idols of Rome. It is absurd to speak of a bishop, in these circumstances, having a see, and a chair, and a throne. These symbols of majesty the Pope pretends to have derived from the first bishop of Rome; and doubtless there is as much justice in the pretence, as there is in the impositions practised at Loretto, where a gaudy image, dressed up in silk, and gold, and precious stones, is given out as a true representation of Mary, the wife of Joseph of Nazareth. Let the Pope put himself upon a footing of equality with his pretended predecessor. Let him go about preaching remission of sins, in the name of Jesus of Nazareth. Let him renounce the vanities of this world, as Peter did; and let him forbear meddling with the civil affairs of worldly kingdoms, which Peter claimed no right to do. In short, let him become a minister of the gospel, and, if any church shall call him to it, a bishop, in the New Testament sense of the word; and though I will not even then concede to him that he is Peter's successor, I will do him the greater honour of calling him one to whom the apostle would not have been ashamed to say, "The elders who are among you I exhort, being also an elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed: feed the flock that is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock: and when the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away," 1 Pet. v. 1—4.

When Papists think of the see of Peter, they form in their minds an image of a peaceable and prosperous state of society, such as we may see in our own day, in what are called Christian countries, where bishops reign as kings, and where the people, if they be virtuously and peaceably disposed, may reign with them, in the enjoyment of all the happiness which the world can afford. When they think of the chair of Peter, they consider him as having occupied a seat of eminence, in a tranquil and unmolested seminary, like a professor of divinity, in one of our colleges. The chair, by degrees, is elevated to the dignity of a throne; and then Peter is considered as having been exactly what the Pope is now; or rather what he was five hundred years ago, when he reigned over the kingdoms, and even over the kings of the earth. But such notions are as absurd as the metamorphoses of Ovid; and they have no more to do with truth than the Arabian Nights' Entertainments.

When the church in Rome, in the days of primitive purity, on the martyrdom of one bishop, were looking about for another, the question would not be, Who is the most cunning politician? or, who has the greatest number of crowned heads on his side? but, who is most ready, and most willing, to have his head cut off, or to be thrown alive to be devoured by wild beasts, for his confession of the name of Jesus? Such was the state of the church in Rome, for the first three centuries, that her bishops could claim scarcely any pre-eminence but that of suffering; and they had not even in this respect a pre-eminence over other bishops; though, in virtue of their more conspicuous place in the church, they would be more exposed than their private brethren.

I have made these general remarks, in order to introduce Lord Clarendon's account of what is known, or rather of what is not known, of Peter, and of those who are reported to have been his nearest successors:—"If we look," says he, vol. i. page 12, "upon the fountain of all ecclesiastical story, from the time of the apostles even to that of Constantine, which was about 320 years, in which there were three and thirty Popes, we may reasonably say, that no rivulet conveyed any thing of moment from that pure fountain—of moment to us, more than what the Scripture itself tells us of the very history. There is not only no authority that obliges, but no reason that persuades us, to believe any thing positively in the transactions of the church or of churchmen; nor does it appear from whence we have the very lives of the apostles, and other holy men, which are derived to us; and which we have much more reason to suspect, because, as there was no collection of them in writing, till after Constantine's time, so what was afterwards put in writing hath been oftentimes altered, many things having been reformed and left out, according to the discretion and gravity of the age; and that body of the lives of the saints, which hath now most reputation amongst the Catholics, was compiled but in our own age, by the Jesuit Ribadineyra, who was chaplain to Philip II. in England, when he married Queen Mary, and of whose skill in collecting history we may make some judgment, by what he hath left us of England; which, relating only to the transactions of twenty years, is so full of mistakes and errors, with reference to persons, times, and actions, that no Englishman, who is best versed in the accounts of that time, can receive any information. But, as I said before, his collection of the saints hath most reputation in all Catholic countries, of any other, and is translated into all languages, though it contains not half the particulars, even of St Paul himself, as former and more ancient editions do; and yet it contains very much more than any learned and wise Catholic will seriously profess to believe.

"There is no consent in the very succession; very little pretence to jurisdiction over any other persons where themselves resided; and no mention of the manner of their election, and how they came to be chosen, till after three hundred years."—His Lordship then gives an account of the confusion and contradictions of authors about the succession of the Popes, which is anticipated by the extract from Dupin, in my last Number, and then proceeds:—"And if their tradition be so uncertain an evidence of such an historical verity, in so few years after Christianity was first preached or professed, how can we, or any reasonable man, give credit to those allegations of many things done, and words spoken, by our Saviour himself, and of his apostles, for which they allege no other proof but tradition, so concealed between themselves, that nobody ever heard mention of either, till nine hundred years after the death of Christ? But let tradition be as weak and as partial a witness as it must be still reckoned to be, we do deny that they have even such a witness for them; and, by the particular disquisition we shall make into every half age, and less, of the church, it will appear, that this their pretence is not in the least degree supported or favoured by tradition."

The Pope claims to be head of the church, and as such to have jurisdiction over all other bishops; but his own oracle, tradition, gives him nothing of this in the first ages. "Towards any thing that looks like jurisdiction (and how far it extended and was submitted to is not apparent), there is some dark mention of the bringing in of holy water, and of ordaining that no priest should say above one mass a day, by Pope Alexander the first; and of the ordering of three to be said on Christmas eve, by Pope Telesphorus; and of the appointing godfathers and godmothers in baptism, by Pope Hyginus, which the Anabaptists will hardly be persuaded to believe." Let it be observed, there is only a dark mention of these things by tradition, for we have no evidence that the words mass and holy water belonged to the phraseology of the second century, about the beginning of which, Alexander the first is said to have begun his reign. "The difference about Easter, indeed," continues his Lordship, "made a great noise, and divided the churches, and was determined by Pope Pius the first; but revived and continued, with great passion and animosity, for forty years after, until Pope Victor, in a council at Rome (which they say was the next lawful council to that of the apostles at Jerusalem), with as much passion, declared his judgment in that particular; which is a shrewd evidence that the authority of Pope Pius was not considered with a full resignation. Some particulars of less moment, as the ordering that no vessels of wood should be used in the mass, but of glass, and shortly after, that cups of plate only should be used in that service, are mentioned to be established about or soon after that time.

"But in what manner those orders were issued and accepted, and what obedience was paid thereunto, is nowhere mentioned, and may be best guessed at by the respect that was given to Pope Pius, in the point of Easter. And certain it is, that no act of solemn jurisdiction, by the Pope, or church itself, will be found manifestly to have been done, till the emperor became Christian; nor can it easily be conceived, that any of those edicts could be digested or published with any formality, or that they were communicated with less secrecy than the Pope concealed his own person or the place of his abode; either of which was no sooner known than he was seized upon and carried to his execution," p. 15. It must be very evident that, in such circumstances, the church in Rome would have little to do with councils, or decrees, or jurisdiction over other churches; and her bishops must have had something else to do than to think of lording it over other bishops. They would think it honour and privilege enough to be allowed to meet in the most private manner, to observe divine ordinances, to edify one another, and to fortify one another's minds in the prospect of death, which was constantly before them, and which many of them were called to suffer, in its most hideous forms, for no crime but that of being Christians. My learned author gives a number of particulars that clearly prove, by their own traditions (if these can prove any thing), and by the writings of saints, in a later age, many of whom must have derived their materials from tradition, that no authority or jurisdiction, like that afterwards claimed by the Pope, was understood to be vested in the church or bishop of Rome. The supposition, indeed, is absurd; for the thing was impossible in the then circumstances of the church. In condescension, I suppose, to popish authors, and not wishing to dispute about a word, Lord Clarendon speaks of the bishops of the church in Rome, from the beginning, under the name of Popes; but this word owes its birth to a much later age. The bishops or elders of all the churches might, in the way of respect, have been called fathers, that is, Papas, or Popes. It was not, however, till the bishop of Rome had obtained the ascendency, that he was called, by way of distinction, the Pope; and those who afterwards wrote the histories and traditions of the church, in order to give the authority of antiquity to the name, and the usurpation which is expressed, gave the title to all the preceding bishops in that see. This has an imposing effect upon the mind of the reader. He reads of the Popes of Rome, in narratives which relate to the first and second centuries; and as he finds the bishops of no other church called by that name, he is insensibly led to think, that the church of Rome and her bishops must have had a superiority of some kind, from the very beginning; but the charm will be dissolved, when he reflects, that the bishops of Rome were not called Popes in primitive times, either by themselves or their contemporaries, but only by persons who wrote about them, after the church of Rome, and the Pope as her head, had appeared as the antichrist, and the oppressor of the true church.

Though the bishops of Rome were not in circumstances to exercise jurisdiction over other bishops and churches, till the emperor became Christian, and took them under his wing, it appears that, before that time, some of them had departed from the faith and purity of the first Christian bishops. We find that one of the holy fathers was not only guilty of idolatry, but also of denying the fact after it was detected. Marcellinus, who is placed about the end of the third century, "terrified by the persecution in the time of Dioclesian (when, in thirty days, there were 17,000 Christians put to death for their religion), preserved his life by sacrificing to the idol gods, and was for that scandal and impiety, they say, convened before a number of bishops, in Sinuessa, in the kingdom of Naples, who might more securely have met in Rome itself; he, for some days, passionately denied the charge, until he was convinced (convicted) by thirty witnesses, when he made great submission, professed great repentance, and declared that he deserved to be deposed, but the council refused to do it, for want of power; whereupon the dejected Pope assumed new and unnecessary courage, returned to Rome, defied and reviled the emperor to his face, till he caused his head to be cut off."—Religion and Policy, p. 17.

Dupin professes to disbelieve this story, and he represents it as merely an accusation of the Donatists (vol. ii. chap. vi.); but the Rhemish translators, in their note on Luke xxii. 31, admit the probability of it, as well as the fall of several other Popes, without derogating in the least from their infallibility; because, though the men fell, the chair stood firm: that is, the Popes erred personally, but the office did not.

The election of one Pope, on the death of another, which is now a matter of great political interest, and has been, for more than a thousand years, does not appear to have been fixed by any definite rule, during the first three centuries. In the times of persecution, when the man who was chosen bishop to-day, was, on that very account, in danger of being murdered to-morrow, there was little temptation to aspire to the office, from worldly motives. The election was probably made by the people with so little noise, that no public notice would be taken of it; and the individual, on whom the choice of his brethren fell, would consider himself called upon, by the voice of Providence, to accept the office, with all its labours and dangers, without ever thinking that he was thereby to become a sovereign prince, and the head of the whole church. There is not even a tradition with regard to the mode of election in those days; from which we may infer, that there was no controversy about the matter, but that, when the office became vacant, the people would exercise their Christian liberty, and invite the man whom they thought best qualified for the office, to preside over them as their bishop; and it is not unreasonable to suppose, that they had sometimes more than one at a time, to preserve order and dispense ordinances, seeing they were cut off so rapidly by the sword of persecution.

"To the end," says Lord Clarendon, "of Pope Marcellinus, who was put to death, in the year 307, there was no form prescribed for the election, nor any persons appointed, or who pretended power to elect; and, it is probable enough, that the Pope dying might recommend his successor; for, besides that, they say that St Peter nominated St Clement; they say likewise that Stephen the first was recommended by Pope Lucius, that went before, who was the three and twentieth Pope; and, it is very probable, that those pious persons, who were all martyrs (for of the first three and thirty Popes, the last of which was Melchiades, who suffered in the tenth and last persecution, under the emperor Maximianus, there were not above three or four who died natural deaths), I say, it is very probable that they had all so great a reverence and veneration from the people, that they were very willing to receive any man whom the Popes recommended to be their successors; and most of the admittances being within five, or six, or seven, or eight days, after the death of the last Pope, may persuade us that there was very little faction or formality in the election; there being then no room for any ambition (except it were for martyrdom), or any secure place to assemble in, for such business; so that we may reasonably presume, that they who, during that long time, supplied that high office, did it rather by a general admission and acceptation, than by any formal election," p. 20. One pastor about to die, recommending a successor, is perfectly consistent with Christian liberty; and may, in many instances, be a Christian duty. I am only sorry that the author should have dishonoured the holy men of whom he speaks, by calling them Popes.

Our next inquiry shall be, to discover what claim or exercise the Popes had to any jurisdiction, in other kingdoms and states, in or after the reign of Constantine, and whence they derived it: and what opposition and contradiction they met withal, from time to time, by which the ancient opinion of antiquity will best appear.

"It is agreed, I think, on all hands, that Silvester the first was bishop of Rome, when Constantine came to be emperor; though there is no mention what interval there was between the death of Melchiades and the election of Silvester, or in what manner he was chosen; and there seems to be some contradiction in the authors about the computation of that time; for Silvester is said to have reigned three and twenty years and ten months, and to have died in the year 334, whereas it was in the year 321 that Melchiades was put to death; between which several times, there are but thirteen years, or thereabouts. However, it appears that Silvester was then Pope, and some authors will have it, that Constantine was christened by him. Sure it is, that as that emperor performed many acts of piety, in building of churches in several places, for the exercise of the Christian religion, so he paid great respect to Pope Silvester, and gave him a rich crown, which they say he never wore himself, though he left it to his successors," p. 21. It will readily occur to every reader, that from that day the bishop of Rome would appear in a new character. To every carnal mind, the crown of gold would have more attractions than the crown of martyrdom. Unconverted men, mere heathens in principle, would now profess themselves Christians, as a step towards the favour of the emperor; and they would insinuate themselves into the priesthood, with the view of one day obtaining the rich crown. Crowns are not made for nothing: they are not worn for mere ornament. A man wearing a crown, without the sovereign power, of which it is a sign, would be an object of contempt to himself, and to all the world. Having obtained this shadow of sovereign power, the bishops of Rome could not rest till they obtained also the substance, which they did, in the course of a few ages. Every successive Pope kept this object steadily in his eye; and the uniformity and harmony of their exertions, for hundreds of years, without so much as one instance of a Pope undoing what his predecessors had done, in the way of advancing the power of his see, shows clearly, that it was one spirit that animated the whole, namely, the wicked one, who worketh with all deceivableness of unrighteousness. I do not suppose that Silvester's immediate successor, to whom the crown was bequeathed, or his successors for a hundred years, contemplated the giddy height to which their remote successors were to rise; but it was the study of every one to add something to the power and influence which he had received from his predecessor, and thus to raise his see to sovereign authority over every other.

The authority of Silvester, notwithstanding the favour of the emperor, does not seem to have been very extensive. The council of Nice was held in his time, but he does not appear to have had a voice in it, much less authority over it. Constantine himself was present in this council, and he alone confirmed the decrees and acts thereof, and sent them so confirmed to Pope Silvester, who thereupon called a council at Rome, of 267 bishops, who confirmed all that had been done at Nice, which confirmation was no other than a submission and conformity thereunto; as the council at Granada, in Spain, which was then likewise assembled, and is called the first Eliberitan council, likewise did. And there needs no other evidence of the emperor's supreme authority in that council, than his letter to all churches, for the due observance of all that was done at Nice, and for the observation of Easter, and the burning of all books written by Arius, which he commanded to be done in a very imperial style: "Si quid autem scriptum ab Ario compositum reperiatur, ut igni id tradatur volumus; ut non modo improba ejus doctrina abrogetur, verum etiam ne monumentum quidem aliquod ejus relinquatur. Illud equidem prædictum volo; si quis libellum aliquem ab Ario conscriptum celare, nec continuo igni comburere deprehensus fuerit, supplicium ei mortis esse constitutum. i. e. But if any writing, composed by Arius, be got hold of, our will is, that it be committed to the flames; that not only his accursed doctrines be extirpated, but also, that not even the slightest vestige of him may be left. This, also, I desire to be proclaimed, that if any person is caught concealing any treatise written by Arius, or neglecting instantly to burn it, the punishment ordained for him is death."

No. CIV.

SATURDAY, JULY 8TH, 1820.

THE bishop of Rome, having got the emperor of Rome on his side, began to strut and swagger at a mighty rate. Then he would have all the world submit to him, in matters of religion, even as they submitted to the emperor in secular and civil matters. The world, however, or rather the churches in different parts of the world, were not yet so submissive. Some bishops, in the east, had held a council, without asking leave of the bishop of Rome. Julius, the Pope of the day, reprehended them for their presumption; and they, knowing that they owed him no subjection, treated the reprehension with great contempt, and, shortly after, met in a council at Antioch. See Religion and Policy, vol. i. p. 23. This was in the fourth century, from which the reader will see, that it was a long time after the death of Peter, ere his pretended successors even laid claim to the power which they afterwards possessed; and that, after the claim was made, it was for a time indignantly resisted.

The bishops of Rome continued, from age to age, adding to their power, and encroaching upon the liberties of the people. "We now come," says Lord Clarendon, "to the time of Gregory the First, (afterwards surnamed the Great,) who, being a monk of St Bennett's order, wrote a letter to the emperor Mauritius, beseeching him not to approve of his election, and fled to a mountain, to avoid being found, until he was discovered by a pigeon; and when he could not avoid the acceptation of his office, to show his great humility, he introduced a new style into his bulls; for he was the first who inserted that expression, Servus servorum Dei, (Servant of the servants of God,) though Monsieur Mazeray (who deserves to be looked upon as the most accurate and impartial historian this age hath produced) assures us, that the title of Pope, of Father of the church, of His Holiness, of Pontifex Maximus, of Servus servorum Dei, were common to all bishops before his time, of which we shall say more hereafter. But let him be as humble in his title as he please, it cannot be denied, that, from the time that he was Pope, he used all the means he could, fair and foul, to make himself greater than any of his predecessors. And so indeed he did; for, notwithstanding all his obligations to the emperor Mauritius, and the professions he had made to him, Phocas no sooner rebelled and killed Mauritius, and made himself emperor, than Pope Gregory acknowledged him, sent a legate de latere to him, gave him all the assistance and countenance he could to support his wicked action and title, and received again from him all those offices which might contribute to his own greatness: and he did indeed many great things, and raised the papacy to a higher pitch than ever it had been at: and this was about the year 600, for he died not till 605."—Religion and Policy, vol. i. p. 47.

As this was the most important era of the papacy, and as the events, above referred to, prepared the way for the bishop of Rome's being declared universal bishop, it may be worth while to enter a little more into detail; and I shall merely remark, in passing, that if it were true that the Popes, as the successors of Peter, were to be really the head of the Catholic church, and universal bishops, it is somewhat strange, that 600 years should elapse ere the church was favoured with this head on earth, which is now declared, by all good Papists, to be so necessary to her existence.

Gregory the Great will be allowed to have been, in comparison with some, a good, and in comparison with others, a great man; but these very qualities gave him the power of exalting the dignity of his see above all its former greatness. "It has ever been," says Bower, in his life of this Pope, "even from the earliest times, a maxim with the Popes, never to part with any power or jurisdiction which their predecessors had acquired, by what means soever they had acquired it; nor to give up the least privilege, which any of their predecessors, right or wrong, ever had claimed. From that maxim no Pope has hitherto swerved, no, not Gregory himself, however conscientious, just, and scrupulously religious, in other respects."

It fell out, during the reign of this Pope, that the bishop of Constantinople began to assume the title of universal bishop, or patriarch; and it appears, that he had, at least, the authority of one council, and the consent of one emperor, for his so doing. Constantinople was now an imperial city, as well as Rome. It threatened to become even the imperial city; and who could then deny its bishop the title of the œcumenical or universal bishop? When Gregory heard of the new title of one whom he considered his inferior, he became dreadfully alarmed, as well he might; for it now depended upon the caprice of an emperor or empress, whether Rome or Constantinople should be the mother and mistress of all churches. Gregory, for a time, forgot all other cares. He saw the very Christian religion in imminent danger; not because the bishop of Constantinople had assumed a higher title than he possessed, but because the title itself, as he maintained, was impious and antichristian. He wrote letters to his nuncio at Constantinople, (for Popes, by this time, had their ambassadors at foreign courts), charging him, as he tendered the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, to use his utmost endeavours with the emperor and with the empress, and above all, with the bishop himself, his beloved brother, to divert him from ever more using the proud, the profane, the antichristian title of universal bishop. Such, let it be observed, was Pope Gregory the Great's opinion of the title which has been borne by his successors for twelve hundred years. His nuncio did all that he could to persuade the eastern patriarch to renounce his new title; but he could not prevail. It had been bestowed upon him, he said, by a great council, and not upon him alone, but also on his successors; that he had not power to resign it, nor would his successors stand to his resignation, if he should.

Gregory afterwards wrote a long letter to the patriarch himself, loading the title of universal bishop with all the opprobrious names he could think of; calling it vain, ambitious, execrable, antichristian, blasphemous, infernal, diabolical; and applying to him who assumed it what was said by the prophet Isaiah of Lucifer: "Whom do you imitate," says he, "in assuming that arrogant title? whom but him, who, swelled with pride, exalting himself above so many legions of angels, his equals, that he might be subject to none, and all might be subject to him?" "The apostle Peter," continues Pope Gregory, "was the first member of the universal church. As for Paul, Andrew, and John, they were only the heads of particular congregations; but all were members of the church under one head, and none would ever be called UNIVERSAL." Here is a plain avowal, by a Pope, that no Pope, or even apostle possessed the authority of universal bishop, or head of the church. "Again," says Pope Gregory to his dear brother of Constantinople, "if none of the apostles would be called universal, what will you answer on the last day to Christ, the Head of the church universal? You, who, by arrogating that name, strive to subject all his members to yourself."—"But this is the time which Christ himself foretold; the earth is now laid waste and destroyed, with the plague and the sword; all things that have been predicted are now accomplished; the king of pride, that is, antichrist, is at hand; and what I dread to say, an army of priests is ready to receive him; for they who were chosen to point out to others the way of humility and meekness, are themselves now become the slaves of pride and ambition." Greg. l. 4. ep. 32. If any Pope had written in the same style a thousand years after, he would have been called a reformer, and a follower of Luther and Calvin.

Finding it impossible to make any impression upon the stubborn patriarch, or Pope of the east, Gregory wrote letters to both the emperor and the empress, begging and beseeching them to prevail upon the said patriarch to give up his diabolical title. After declaiming against the title, as quite antichristian, against the patriarch, as a disturber of the peace of the church, and the good order established by Christ, and against all who encouraged him in so impious and detestable an attempt, he addresses the empress thus: "Though Gregory (speaking of himself) is guilty of many great sins, for which he well deserves thus to be punished, Peter is himself guilty of no sins, nor ought he to suffer for mine. I therefore, over and over again, beg, intreat, and conjure you by the Almighty, not to forsake the virtuous steps of your ancestors, but, treading in them, to court and secure to yourself the protection and favour of that apostle, who is not to be robbed of the honour that is due to his merit, for the sins of one who has no merit, and who so unworthily serves him." Greg. l. 4. ep. 34. Here Gregory lets out the secret cause of his opposition to the title assumed by the bishop of Constantinople. It was derogatory to the see of Peter, which he himself had the honour to fill. It was therefore antichristian, diabolical, and every thing else that is bad.

He was as unsuccessful with the emperor and the empress, as he had been with the patriarch himself; nay, the emperor rather favoured the new title, as befitting the bishop of what he now wished to be considered the imperial city. Gregory, almost in despair, wrote letters to some of the greatest bishops in the east, endeavouring to excite their zeal against the proud title assumed by their patriarch. The bishop of Alexandria wrote a letter to Gregory, in which he calls him also universal bishop, thinking it would end the controversy, if the two rivals were called by the same title, and put upon a footing of equality; but Gregory spurned at this with great indignation: "If," says he, in his reply, "you give more to me than is due to me, you rob yourself of what is due to you. I choose to be distinguished by my manners, and not by titles. Nothing can redound to my honour that redounds to the dishonour of my brethren. I place my honour in maintaining them in theirs. If you call me universal Pope, you thereby own yourself to be no Pope. Let no such titles, therefore, be mentioned, or ever heard among us. Your Holiness says in your letter that I commanded you. I command you! I know who you are, who I am. In rank you are my brother, by your manners my father. I therefore did not command; and beg you will henceforth ever forbear the word. I only pointed out to you what I thought it was right you should know." Greg. l. 7. ep. 36. See Bower's Lives of the Popes:—Life of Gregory.

Perhaps it would be uncandid to say, that all this was said in hypocrisy, while Gregory was really labouring to get the obnoxious title transferred to himself alone. There are circumstances, however, which excite a strong suspicion that it was even so. Seeing the emperor, Mauritius, did not enter into his views, but that he countenanced the bishop of Constantinople, Gregory seems so far to have withdrawn his allegiance from him, as to rejoice in the successful treason of Phocas, who murdered his master and his children, and was proclaimed emperor in his stead. Gregory was unable to contain his joy at this event. He wrote Phocas in the most fulsome style of congratulation. "We," says he, "have been hitherto most grievously afflicted; but the Almighty hath chosen you, and placed you on the imperial throne, to banish, by your merciful disposition, all our afflictions and sorrows. Let the heavens therefore rejoice, let the earth leap for joy, let the whole people return thanks for so happy a change. May the republic long enjoy these most happy times! May God, with his grace, direct your heart in every good thought, in every good deed! May the Holy Ghost, that dwells in your breast, ever guide and assist you, and that you may, after a long course of years, pass from an earthly and temporal to an everlasting and heavenly kingdom."

Phocas received the imperial throne by treason and murder; and when in possession of absolute power, he shewed himself as great a monster of cruelty and wickedness, as any of his predecessors have been; but Pope Gregory the Great lauds him, and praises him, and calls upon heaven and earth to praise him, for no other reason, so far as appears, than that he would deliver the see of Rome from the disgrace of having the patriarch of Constantinople preferred before the bishop of Rome, under the title of universal bishop. It was the manner of Popes to attach themselves to those successful monsters who could help them to the attainment of the object of their ambition; and they again lent all their influence to confirm such monsters in the power which they had usurped. If you will get me proclaimed emperor, I shall take care that you be proclaimed universal bishop, seems to have been the understanding between the traitor and murderer, Phocas, and the most holy father of the Church of Rome. The thing was done. Phocas became emperor; and though Gregory did not live to enjoy all the fruits of this revolution; though he did not receive, in his own person, the high title of universal bishop, Phocas lived to confer it upon one of the Popes within three years of the death of Gregory. Yes, Boniface III. prevailed upon the bloody monster, Phocas, to revoke the decree, settling the title of universal bishop on the patriarch of Constantinople; and he got a new decree, settling this title upon himself and his successors. Gregory the great had condemned this title, as vain, proud, profane, impious, execrable, blasphemous, antichristian, heretical, diabolical; but no matter; when it came to be applied to the Pope of Rome, it was all good and lawful. It has been claimed and borne by the Popes to this very day; and therefore, they are justly chargeable with all the blasphemy and execrableness which their great Father, saint Gregory, laid to the account of it.

Now indeed the Pope appeared as a god on earth. He sat in the temple of God, showing himself as God. He received his high dignity from a traitor and a murderer; and, it must be allowed, that the power which it conferred has been often exercised in a manner corresponding with its origin, and the character of him who conferred it. The title of universal bishop, as vested in the patriarch of Constantinople, seems to have been no more than a badge of honour; at least he did not pretend to universal jurisdiction in virtue of it. But no sooner was the title transferred to the Pope of Rome, and he thereby declared head of the church, than he began to show his power and authority in a very arbitrary manner. He immediately called a council at Rome, and had it decreed, that no election of a bishop should thenceforth be deemed lawful and good, unless made by the people and clergy, approved by the prince or lord of the city, and confirmed by the Pope, interposing his authority in the following terms: We will and command, volumus et jubemus. See Bower's Life of Boniface. This bound the bishops, in all countries, to the Pope of Rome, through them it bound all the inferior priests, and through them, all the people to the same supreme head, so that in fact the Pope became absolute monarch of what was called Christendom. It is true that some countries yielded more prompt obedience than others, and some never submitted at all; but these were comparatively few, at least in the western empire. Thus was the papal supremacy introduced and established, in the year 607, which is usually marked as one of those periods at which the prophetic number of 1260 years is understood to commence.

The Pope, however, was not yet high enough. He had got the full command of the spiritual sword, but the temporal one was also necessary, in order to give the necessary effect to the other. A temporal kingdom, and the power of calling out an armed force were necessary, in order to his maintaining the dignity to which he had attained. It is true, the Pope never made any great figure, as a military commander; but he found it necessary, in order to the maintenance of his dignity, to get the sovereign power over certain portions of rich territory in Italy; and he obtained this by the aid of another traitor, whose usurpation he encouraged. This was Pepin, who was a sort of prime minister to Childeric, king of France. The king was a silly, and the minister was a clever man; and the latter saw no good reason why he should not occupy the place of the former. He resolved, therefore, to take the opinion of the Pope, as upon a question of morality, or divinity, or casuistry, or politics, no matter which. The question which he proposed to his Holiness, was, "Who best deserved to be styled king; he who was possessed of the power, or he who was only possessed of the title?" The crafty Pope, says Bower, in his Life of Pope Zachary, well understood the true meaning of that question; and therefore solved it, we may be sure, in favour of Pepin; declaring that, "in his opinion, he ought rather to be styled king, who possessed the power, than he who possessed only the title."

Pepin had now what would be received as a divine authority, for supplanting his master, king Childeric; and this was immediately done. Most of the great men in the kingdom were Pepin's creatures and dependents, and therefore easily brought over to maintain his title to the kingdom. Now, as one good turn deserves another, the Pope naturally looked to Pepin, as one able and willing to advance his power and dignity. The Pope of the day did not live to reap the fruit of his good offices, on behalf of the usurper; but, as usual, his successor took advantage of his labours, and improved them for the aggrandizement of the holy see. Stephen II. successor of Zachary, had a quarrel with the king of the Lombards; and the holy father, being unable to cope with so powerful a prince, applied once and again to Pepin, now king of France, to help him. Pepin acknowledged his obligations to his holy father; and brought such a powerful force to bear upon the king of the Lombards, as soon made him submit, and promise to give up the territory, which he had violently taken from the emperor, not to the rightful owner, from whom he had taken it, but to the holy see of St Peter, so as to make the holy apostle appear to the world as no better than a resetter of theft.

The king of the Lombards, however, after Pepin had withdrawn his army, refused to perform his promise. He attacked the Pope a second time. He besieged Rome itself, and reduced the city to the greatest extremity; when the poor Pope was obliged to apply to Pepin again, to save his city and his life. He first addressed a letter to Pepin, as from himself, in the following style:—"To defend the church is, of all works, the most meritorious; and that to which is reserved the greatest reward in the world to come. God might himself have defended his church, or raised up others to defend the just rights of his apostle, St Peter. But it pleased him to choose you, my most excellent son, out of the whole human race, for that holy purpose. For it was in compliance with his divine inspiration and command, that I applied to you, that I came into your kingdom, that I exhorted you to espouse the cause of his beloved apostle, and your great protector, St Peter. You espoused his cause accordingly; and your zeal for his honour was quickly rewarded with a signal and miraculous victory. But St Peter, my most excellent son, has not yet reaped the least advantage from so glorious a victory, though owing entirely to him. The perfidious and wicked Aistulphus (the king of the Lombards) has not yet yielded to him one foot of ground; nay, unmindful of his oath, and actuated by the devil, he has begun hostilities anew, and, bidding defiance both to you and St Peter, threatens us, and the whole Roman people, with death and destruction." The Pope, however, doubtful of the effect of his own eloquence upon the mind of the French monarch, is said to have procured a letter from the apostle Peter himself, which he sent to Pepin as a genuine epistle from his great predecessor, the prince of the apostles. The following is an extract, from which, I am afraid my readers will infer, that Peter did not improve in the art of letter-writing after he left this world:—"Simon Peter, a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ, to the three most excellent kings, Pepin, Charles, and Carloman; (the two last were Pepin's sons) to all the holy bishops, abbots, presbyters, and monks; to all the dukes, counts, commanders of the French army; and to the whole people of France: Grace unto you and peace be multiplied."—"I am the apostle Peter, to whom it was said, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock, &c. Feed my sheep, &c. And to thee will I give the keys, &c. As this was all said to me in particular, all who hearken to me, and obey my exhortations, may persuade themselves, and firmly believe that their sins are forgiven them."—"Hearken therefore to me, to me Peter, the apostle and servant of Jesus Christ; and since I have preferred you to all the nations of the earth, hasten, I beseech and conjure you, if you care to be cleansed from your sins, and to earn an eternal reward, hasten to the relief of my city, of my church, of the people committed to my care, ready to fall into the hands of the wicked Lombards, their merciless enemies. It has pleased the Almighty that my body should rest in this city; the body that has suffered, for the sake of Christ, such exquisite torments. And can you, my most Christian sons, stand by unconcerned and see it insulted by the most wicked of nations? No, let it never be said, and it will I hope, never be said, that I, the apostle of Jesus Christ, that my apostolic church, the foundation of the faith, that my flock recommended to you by me and my vicar, have trusted in you, but trusted in vain. Our lady, the virgin Mary, the mother of God, joins in earnestly intreating, nay, and commands you to hasten, to run, to fly to the relief of my favourite people, reduced almost to the last gasp; and calling in that extremity, night and day, upon her, and upon me. The thrones and dominions, the principalities and the powers, and the whole multitude of the heavenly host, intreat you, together with us, not to delay, but to come with all possible speed, and rescue my chosen flock from the jaws of the ravening wolves ready to devour them. My vicar might, in this extremity, have recurred, and not in vain, to other nations; but, with me, the French are, and ever have been the first, the best, the most deserving of all nations; and I would not suffer the reward, the exceeding great reward, that is reserved in this and the other world, for those who shall deliver my people, to be earned by any other."—Bower's Life of Stephen II.

It is difficult to say what effect the eloquence of the holy apostle might have had upon the mind of Pepin and his two sons, had it arrived in time; for as no swift angelic messenger was employed, Pepin had left France with an army, to help the Pope, before Peter's letter reached him. He effectually subdued the king of the Lombards. He took the provinces and cities, which Aistulphus had taken from the emperor, and most magnanimously gave them to the Pope, thus enriching the holy see with what was not his own.

Thus was the bishop of Rome raised to the rank and sovereignty of a great prince. This is usually considered the last step of his elevation. It took place in the year 756; and this, I believe, is the latest period to which the commencement of the prophetic number of 1260 years is referred. Supposing the book of Revelation to have been written in the year 90, which is the period usually assigned to it, the time which elapsed between that and the last stage of papal usurpation, is precisely 666 years, which reminds us of the number of the name of the beast, Rev. xiii. 18. I mention this merely in passing, as it is by no means my intention to enter, at present, upon the Apocalyptical signs of Antichrist. To those who wish to see this subject discussed, in a serious and sensible manner, I beg leave to recommend a pamphlet, just published, by the Rev. Mr Mason, of Wishatown, on Daniel's Prophetic Number of 2300 days.

No. CV.

SATURDAY, JULY 15TH, 1820.

THE preceding Number traced the progress of papal usurpation, from the time of Constantine the Great till the year 756, when the Pope became a temporal prince. The means by which he obtained his greatness, and the instruments that helped him to it, were such as the god of this world usually employs, for carrying on his work of deceit and violence, in order to effect the ruin of both the bodies and souls of men. This fact alone should convince every Christian, that popery is not of God, but of the devil; that it is not Christianity, but the opposite of it, and its irreconcilable enemy. As there is no evidence, either in Scripture or credible tradition, that the Pope of Rome was divinely appointed head of the church, it might have been expected, that such modern papists, as possess a portion of common sense, would have been very tender of the subject, and cautious how they brought it forward for public discussion. But as it is the main pillar of their system, they must give it a prominent place in all their books of controversy, even at the risk of being considered destitute of common sense.

In Bishop Hay's "Sincere Christian Instructed from the Written Word," we have the following catechetical exercise. "Q. Who are the successors of St Peter as head of the church? A. The bishops of the city of Rome, of which St Peter was the first bishop, and suffered martyrdom in that city for the faith of Christ, leaving his successors there the heirs of all his power and authority." To this statement I have only one objection:—namely, it is not true. It is one of those palpable lies by which Satan deceives those who love darkness rather than the light; and I again defy the Church of Rome to produce a particle of evidence, that Peter transmitted his power and authority to any man whatever. "Q. Wherein," continues the catechist, "consists the power of the bishop of Rome, as head of the church? A. As he is appointed by Jesus Christ, to be the supreme head and pastor of the church under him, to be the spiritual father and teacher of all Christians, with full power to feed and govern the whole flock; therefore he is the supreme judge and lawgiver, in all things relating to religion, whether as to faith, manners, or discipline. The primacy, both of honour and jurisdiction, over all other bishops, belongs to him: and all the members of the church are obliged to pay the greatest respect, veneration, and obedience, to his decrees and orders, in all things belonging to religion. Q. How is the head of the church commonly called? A. He is called the Pope, which word signifies father, and is given to the head of the church: because, being the vicar of Jesus Christ, he is the common spiritual father of all Christians." One of the first things we should expect to find in a spiritual father is, that he be a spiritual man; but it is notorious to all the world, that the greater part of the Popes were merely carnal men, and more taken up with the cares of this world, than with things spiritual and eternal. And if we could suppose a Pope to be a spiritual man, in the Bible sense of the words, he would have more modesty and more humility, than to pretend to be the "common spiritual father of all Christians;" which title, as he would know, belongs to God alone.

I long ago maintained, that the head of the catholic or universal church must be infallible, otherwise there would be no security against defection; but bishop Hay seems not to be quite certain whether the Pope be infallible or not, though he seems rather inclined to believe that he is. He puts a question, and gives an answer thus:—"Q. When the head of the church emits any decree concerning faith or morals, to which he requires submission from all the faithful, is he himself infallible in what he there teaches? A. This is not proposed as an article of divine faith, nor has the church made any decision concerning it. Great numbers of the most learned divines are of opinion, that in such a case the head of the church is infallible in what he teaches; but there are others of a contrary opinion, who think that his decree is not to be considered as infallibly certain, till the body of the bishops receive it, either by their express approbation, or by their tacit submission to it, by which it becomes a decree of the whole church, whose infallibility is undoubted." Chap. xii.

By the admission of the reverend prelate at the beginning of the above answer, he furnishes materials for overthrowing his own doctrine. If the infallibility of the Pope be not a matter of divine faith, and if the great and learned divines of the church be not agreed about it, what has become of the boasted unity of the Church of Rome in all matters of faith? and how does it appear, that the Pope was appointed head of the church, for the very purpose of maintaining unity of doctrine, when the members of the body are not agreed about a most fundamental doctrine, namely, the seat of that infallibility which is held undoubtedly to be in the church? I shall suppose that the Pope gives out, or, to use the bishop's own language, "emits a decree concerning faith;" and that the subject of it is his own infallibility, which he commands to be believed by all the faithful; great numbers of the most learned divines would require no more than his own word for it; because they are of opinion, that the head of the church is infallible in what he teaches: but there are others of a contrary opinion. Then there is a schism in the church; and that too, in relation to a point of vital importance; for if the opinion of the first class of divines be the true one, then, whatever the Pope decrees, ought to be instantly and implicitly accepted and obeyed; and those who refuse are guilty of rebellion against the authority of the holy see, which, in a Papist's esteem, is the same thing as rebellion against God.

On the other hand, if the true and catholic doctrine be, that a decree of the Pope "is not to be considered as infallibly certain, till the body of bishops receive it, either by their express approbation, or by their tacit submission to it," then, those who receive such decrees on the authority of the Pope alone, and obey them, are guilty of contemning the whole "body of bishops," and setting at nought their authority, though it be admitted that they are the same as the whole church. This must be a very grievous error; for it is maintained, that their sentence, being that of the whole church, is undoubtedly infallible. The infallibility of the Pope alone is not so undoubted, for there are some who deny it; therefore, those who believe in it, and act upon it, must be in a most dangerous condition; I might even call it damnable, if I were to adopt the language of the holy Council of Trent.

Again, if no decree of the Pope is to be considered infallible, or to be received with a divine faith, till the "body of bishops," meaning, I suppose, all the bishops in the world, receive it by their express approbation, or tacit submission, then it may be a hundred years, and more, after a decree is emitted by his Holiness, ere it can be lawfully received by his spiritual children; for they may not, during all that time, have received sufficient evidence, that the "body of bishops," in all parts of the world, have approved of such decree. It is some hundreds of years since the Pope pretended to be infallible, as he ought most certainly to be, if he be Christ's vicar, and head of the church; but it seems, at this very day, the "body of bishops" are not agreed about it; and what confidence then can the people in general have in it? The truth is, Papists are trusting in a broken reed that will do more than disappoint them in the day of trial. It will pierce and wound every hand that leans upon it.

Bishop Hay, as I have said, seems inclined to adopt the opinion of those, who think that "the Pope himself, when he speaks to all the faithful, as head of the church, is infallible in what he teaches;" and he says, that for this opinion there are "several very strong reasons, both from Scripture, tradition, and reason." He introduces his proof from Scripture as follows: "Because this privilege of the particular direction and assistance of God, in teaching true doctrine, was given to the high priest of the old law, and the synagogue being only a figure of the law of grace, and of the Church of Christ, the same privilege must certainly be given to the high priest of the church also, otherwise the figure would have been more perfect than the thing figured, the shadow more privileged than the substance." I do most readily grant, that the same, and greater privilege, is granted to the high priest of the church under the law of grace, as the bishop calls it, though I believe what he calls the old law, was as really a law of grace as the new. But the question will occur, Who is the high priest, of whom the high priest of the old law was a figure? The bishop will have it to be the Pope of Rome; and because the high priest of the Jews was infallible in what he announced as the mind of God (which, however, may reasonably be doubted), therefore the Pope of Rome is infallible in all his decrees. This is Popish Episcopal logic of the highest order; and if all men are not thereby persuaded to fall down and worship the Pope as the great high priest of the Christian profession, the guilt of disobedience must rest upon their own heads.

Now it appears evidently from the New Testament, that the high priest of our profession, of whom Aaron and his sons were a figure, is no other than the Lord Jesus Christ himself (Heb. iii. 1, 2.); and that he is infallible there can be no doubt among Christians; but to ascribe this office, and this infallibility, to the Pope of Rome, is such an instance of impiety and presumption, as we shall search for in vain, except in the writings of such men as Bishop Hay, who are determined, at all hazards, to support the usurpation of him who sitteth in the temple of God, and who exalteth himself above all that is called God, and that is worshipped.

The other scripture proofs relate to Peter, as the rock on which the church is built; and Christ's words to Peter, "I have prayed for thee," &c. which I have already considered. The proofs from tradition, are the mere ravings of ghostly fathers, whose authority is not the weight of a straw, in relation to a matter that ought to rest upon divine authority, if it is to command the faith of Christians. The proofs from reason are partly as follow, for I have not room for them all; but such as I give will afford as fair a specimen of Popish lying and impudence as any man could wish to see.

"The proofs from reason," says Bishop Hay, "are founded on facts, and on principles received by all members of the church as divine truths; for, (1.) There never was an instance of any Pope who proposed any doctrine to be believed by the church, that was contrary to the sacred truths of faith revealed by Christ; for, though there have been a few, and only a few Popes, that were bad men in their own practice, yet the most inveterate adversaries of the Catholic faith could never yet show that any Pope taught bad doctrine. (2.) Never yet did any Pope emit any decree concerning the truths of faith or sound morality, but was received by the great body of the bishops, as containing the most solid and wholesome doctrine. (3.) Many different heresies that have arisen in different ages in the church, have been proscribed and condemned by the authority of the head of the church alone, both before the first general council was held, and since. (4.) In all controversies of moment that have arisen in the church about points of faith, the bishops have always had recourse to the head of the church, as the supreme tribunal for settling them; and, if the obstinacy of the party condemned by him made it advisable to have recourse to general councils, these councils never were found to do any thing else, after the most mature examination, but to confirm the sentence already passed by the head."—Sincere Christian, &c. chap. xii.

I question if there was ever so much downright falsehood contained in so small a space, as in the first of these four particulars which Bishop Hay gives as facts. It is false, that no Pope ever yet taught bad doctrine; for, not to speak of others, the creed of Pope Pius IV. as we shall see by and by, is error and nonsense throughout. It is false, that only a few Popes were men of bad lives, for very many of them were monsters of wickedness. This must have been very well known by Bishop Hay, unless, indeed, his moral perceptions and feelings, like those of other Papists, were so depraved, that the grossest wickedness practised by great ecclesiastics, did not make them, in his esteem, "bad men in their own practice." He must have known, that very many of the Popes were habitually guilty of such crimes as would have entitled them to the appellation of bad men among the virtuous part of the community. He cannot, therefore, be acquitted of the crime of writing a falsehood, knowing it to be such. I request the reader not to take this sweeping accusation against the holy fathers of Rome upon my bare word, for I admit, that standing alone, it is of no more authority than that of the Bishop. But let him read attentively the most respectable ecclesiastical histories, even those written by Papists, and he will find that the assertions of Bishop Hay are directly opposed to truth. That "the body of the bishops" received the decrees of the Pope, and that they appealed to him as head of the church, are matters of no importance, for after they had become dependent upon him, as they all were, when their election was declared invalid without his confirmation, they would readily lick up any thing that he was pleased to "emit."

But suppose I were to admit the fact, that the Popes never taught bad doctrine, and, that very few of them led wicked lives, this would not prove the Pope to be infallible; because the same thing may be affirmed of hundreds and thousands who never made so high a claim. Yes, in the churches of England and Scotland, and among dissenters of different names, there are many pastors who cannot justly be accused of teaching error, or leading wicked lives; but it would require a logician like Bishop Hay, to prove them all infallible.

In opposition to Bishop Hay's assertion, that "the most inveterate adversaries of the Catholic faith could never yet show that any Pope ever taught bad doctrine," it might be enough to assert, that every enemy of Popery, that ever lifted a tongue or a pen, has most abundantly shown this very thing. Every Pope has taught bad doctrine, and nothing else, ever since he began to teach that he was head of the church, and the vicar of Christ. Pope Pius IV. whom I have already mentioned, was at the pains to draw up, or order to be drawn up, a digest of the errors of the Church of Rome, which had accumulated by his time; he proposed them to be believed by all the faithful as infallible truths; and they are at this day received and held by all sound Papists, as of equal authority with the word of God. As I think this document ought to be generally known, in order to show what bad doctrine the Pope teaches, I shall give it here entire.

"I most firmly receive and embrace the apostolical and ecclesiastical traditions, and the rest of the observances and constitutions of the church.

"I do also receive the holy Scriptures in the same sense that holy mother church does, to whom it belongs to judge of the true sense and interpretation of them; neither will I receive nor interpret them otherwise, than according to the unanimous consent of the fathers.

"I do likewise profess, that there are seven sacraments of the new law, truly and properly so called, instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord; and that they are necessary to the salvation of mankind, though not all of them to every one, viz. Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Orders, and Matrimony; and that they confer grace; and that of these, Baptism, Confirmation, and Orders, may not be repeated without sacrilege. I do also receive and admit the received and approved rites of the Catholic church, in the solemn administration of the above-said sacraments.

"I do embrace and receive all and every thing that hath been defined and declared by the holy Council of Trent, concerning original sin and justification.

"I do in like manner profess, that in mass is offered a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead, and that in the most holy sacrament of the eucharist there is truly, really, and substantially, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that there is a change made of the whole substance of bread into the body, and of the whole substance of wine into the blood, which change the Catholic church calls transubstantiation.

"I believe also, that under one kind only, a whole and entire Christ, and a true sacrament, is taken.

"I do firmly maintain that there is a purgatory, and that the souls there detained, are relieved by the prayers of the faithful.

"I do likewise believe, that the saints reigning together with Christ, are to be worshipped and prayed unto, and that they do offer up prayers for us, and that their relics are to be worshipped.

"I do most firmly assert, that the images of Christ, and of the Mother of God, always a virgin, and of the other saints, ought to be had and retained, and that due honour and veneration is to be given to them.

"I also affirm, that the power of indulgences was left by Christ in the church, and that the use of them is very beneficial to Christian people.

"I do acknowledge the holy, catholic, apostolic, Roman church, to be the mother and mistress of all churches, and do promise and swear true obedience to the Bishop of Rome and successor of St Peter, the prince of the apostles, and vicar of Jesus Christ.

"I do also, without any doubt, receive and profess all other things which have been delivered, defined, and declared, by the sacred canons and general councils, and especially by the holy Council of Trent: and all things contrary thereto, and all heresies whatsoever, condemned, rejected, and anathematised by the church, I do likewise condemn, reject, and anathematise."

To make the matter as sure as possible, an oath is subjoined to the above creed, to be taken by all the clergy. Having made profession of their faith, they add, "This is the true Catholic faith, without which no man can be saved, and which at this time I freely confess and truly embrace; and I will take care, by the help of God, that the same be retained and firmly professed, whole and inviolate, as long as I live, and as much as in me lies; that it be held, taught, and preached, by all those that are under my power, and by such as I shall have charge over in my profession, thus I, N. N. do promise, vow, and swear; so help me God, and these his holy gospels."

Such is the famous creed of Pope Pius IV. which is understood to express the whole faith of a Papist, in addition to the twelve articles in what is commonly called the Apostles' Creed. It is made the basis of several catechisms, which are in my possession. The above is a translation of it, as given by Mr Bennett in his Memorial of the Reformation, 2d. edit. chap. i. I have given it at length, not for the purpose of making an exposure of its errors at present, as I have exposed most of them already; but for the purpose of exposing the impudence of such writers as Bishop Hay, who assert that no enemy of Popery could ever yet show that any Pope ever taught bad doctrine. It may safely be left in the hands of any child who can read the Bible with understanding; and I have no doubt that any such child would soon perceive its doctrine to be bad in the extreme.

On this creed, and the solemn oath with which it is swallowed, I only remark farther at present, that it binds every Romish priest to believe both parts of a contradiction, and to abstain from every attempt to understand the Word of God. He swears to believe all that has been delivered by general councils, especially the Council of Trent; and that he will never receive or interpret the Holy Scriptures otherwise than according to the unanimous consent of the fathers. Such unanimous consent never existed, and when a priest swears that he will never receive the Scriptures otherwise, it is the same as to swear that he will never receive them at all; and from the manner in which some of the priests speak and write of the Bible, we may charitably believe that they are true to their oath. Besides, it is well known that there are many contradictions in the decrees, canons, and definitions of general councils. How then can a man swear to receive and obey them all, without an absolute surrender of his reason and his conscience? I know that Papists think very lightly of surrendering their reason, for it is what they do openly and avowedly every day, when they worship a piece of bread as the God that made them. But they do not yet so explicitly surrender their conscience; though it is virtually done by their avowal of implicit belief that a thing is and is not at the same time; or, for instance, that the Pope is above a council, and that a council is above the Pope, are both true.

No. CVI.

SATURDAY, JULY 22D, 1820.

THE infallibility of the Pope does not imply foreknowledge, which is one reason why the holy father commits so many blunders, both in his teaching and administration. It is in the recollection of many of my readers, that, about twenty years ago, the Pope blessed Buonaparte as his dear son in the faith, and even consented to set the imperial crown on his head. The holy father seemed even to glory in this dear son, as if he had been another Elijah, who had restored the true religion, after it had been subverted by the Jezebel goddess of reason. But the father did not foresee the future perversity of this son; and that the dignity and power, to which he had contributed to raise him, would be employed against himself. Such, however, turned out to be the case. Buonaparte was as great an oppressor of the holy see, as the king of the Lombards had been. It does not, however, appear, that the present Pope had so much interest in heaven as his predecessor Stephen had; or, that the virgin Mary and St Peter interposed on his behalf, either by word or writing. Indeed, so far as appears, he might have been calling upon these for help till this day, and with as much earnestness as the priests of Baal called upon their god, and he would have called in vain, had it not been for the persevering and successful exertions of a government and people, whom he curses and excommunicates every year on Holy Thursday.

The Pope could not bring any thunder from heaven, to bear upon his relentless oppressor, but he made the best use he could of that which he professed to have on the earth, as the reader will see from the following authentic document. I shall give it entire, for the sake of preserving it for the use of future historians, and writers on the Popish controversy. It is a great deal too long; and it will occupy the remainder of this, and half of the next Number. Like the writings of almost all Papists, from the head of their church downwards, it is remarkable for its profuse wordiness, which arises, I suppose, from the want of distinct conception; for when a writer has an idea distinctly in his own head, he will easily be able to convey it to others in few words. It would be impossible to do justice to this document, in the way of abridging it; and, therefore, I hope, the reader will bear with it, though it should try his patience, for the sake of the historical and other curious matter which it contains.

The Excommunication of the French Emperor and his adherents, by the Pope.

The following curious Paper is translated from the Latin original, which was sent over by Mr Hill, the British Minister, in Sardinia. A translation in French has been circulated by the British Government, for the information of the Catholic world.—We copy the present translation, which we believe to be correct, from the Literary Panorama for March.

Apostolic Letters, in Form of Brief,

"Whereby are declared excommunicated, and de novo are excommunicated, the authors, the active agents, and the partisans of the usurpation on the state of Rome, and on the other states appertaining to the holy see.

PIUS PP. VII.—Ad perpetuam rei Memoriam:

"WHEN, on the memorable 2d of February, 1808, the French troops, after having invaded the other and the richest provinces of the Pontifical state, with a sudden and hostile impetus entered Rome itself, it was impossible that we could bring our mind to attribute that outrage simply to political or to military reasons, reported among the people by the invaders; that is to say, to defend themselves in this city, and to exclude their enemies from the territories of the holy Roman church; neither did we see in it merely the desire of the chief of the French nation to take vengeance on our firmness and constancy, in refusing to acquiesce in his requests. We saw instantly, that this proceeding had a much more extensive view than a temporary occupation, a military precaution, or a simple demonstration of anger against ourselves. We saw revive, and again glow, and again burst out on all sides, those fraudulent and impious plots, which appeared to be, if not subdued, at least repressed; which originated among those men deceived and deceiving 'by philosophy and vain deceit, introducing damnable heresies,' and who had long planned, and formed parties to accomplish, the destruction of our holy religion. We saw that, in our humble personage, they insulted, they circumvented, they attacked the holy see of the most blessed prince of the apostles, in order that they might by any means overthrow it, from its very foundation; and with it the Catholic church, although established on the most solid rock, by its divine Founder, in this holy see.

"We had thought, we had also hoped, that the French government, taught by experience the evils in which that most powerful nation had involved itself by unreined impiety and schism, and convinced by the unanimous declarations of by far the greater part of its citizens, was truly and heartily persuaded, that its own security, as well as the public happiness, was deeply interested in the free and sincere restoration of the exercise of the Catholic religion, and in its defence against all assailants. Moved by this opinion, and excited by this hope, we, unworthy as we are, who upon earth represent the God of Peace, scarcely perceived any prospect of repairing the disasters of the Gallican church, when—the whole world is our witness! with what alacrity we listened to proposals of peace, and how much it cost us, and the church itself, to conduct those treaties to such a conclusion as it was possible to obtain: but, immortal God! in what did our hopes terminate! What has been the fruit of our so great indulgence and liberality! From the very promulgation of that agreement, we have been constrained to complain, with the prophet, 'Behold, in peace my bitterness becomes most bitter.' This bitterness we have not concealed from the church, nor from our brethren the cardinals of the holy Roman church, in our allocution to them in consistory, May 24, 1802. We then informed them, that, to the convention we had made, were added several articles unknown to us, and disapproved by us the instant we knew them. In reality, by these articles, not only was the free exercise of the Catholic religion withheld, in points of the greatest consequence and interest to the liberty which had been verbally assured, stipulated, and solemnly promised, as introductory to the convention, and as its basis; but also, in several of these articles, the doctrine of the gospel was closely attacked.

"Nearly the same was the result of the convention concluded by us with the government of the Italian Republic. Those very articles were interpreted in a manner altogether arbitrary, with highly perverse and peculiar fraud, as well as injury; against which arbitrary and perverse interpretation we had guarded with the utmost solicitude.

"Both these conventions being violated in this manner, and disfigured in whatever had been stipulated in favour of the church,—the spiritual power also being subjected to the will of the laic; so far were the salutary effects that we had proposed to ourselves following these conventions, that other, and still greater evils and injuries to the church of Jesus Christ, we saw growing and spreading daily.

"We shall not here enumerate particularly those evils, because they are sufficiently known in the world, and deplored with tears by all good men: they are besides sufficiently declared in the two consistorial allocutions, which we made March 16, and July 11, 1808; which we caused to be made public as much as our state of restraint admitted. From those all may know, and all posterity will see, what at that time were our sentiments on so many and great injuries suffered from the government of France, in things appertaining to the church: they will know with what long-suffering and patience we were so long silent,—with what constancy we maintained the love of peace; and how firmly we retained the hope, that a remedy adequate to such great evils might be found, and that an end might be put to them; for which cause we have deferred from day to day the lifting up of our apostolic voice. They will see what were our labours and anxieties,—what our endeavours, deprecations, protestations, sighings (incessant have they been!) that the wounds of the church might be healed,—while we have intreated that new sufferings might not be inflicted upon her: but, in vain have been exhausted all the powers of humility, of moderation, of mildness, by which hitherto we have studied to shield the rights and interests of the church from him, who had associated himself with the devices of the impious to destroy it utterly; who with that spirit had affected friendship for her, that he might more readily betray her,—who had feigned to protect her that he might more securely oppress her.

"Much and often, even daily, have we been bid to hope, especially when our journey into France was wished for and solicited; but from that period our expostulations have been eluded by bold tergiversations and cavillings; and by answers given purposely to prolong the matter, or to mislead by fallacy. At length they could obtain no attention. As the time appointed for maturing the councils already taken against this holy see, and the Church of Christ, approached, we were assailed, we were harassed perpetually, and perpetually were demands, either exorbitant or captious, made; the nature of which showed clearly enough, and more than enough, that two objects, equally destructive and ruinous to this holy see and church, were kept in view; that is to say, either that by assenting to them we should be guilty of betraying our office, or that if we refused, occasion might from thence be taken of declaring against us an open war.

"As we could in no wise comply with those demands made upon us, they being contrary to conscience, from thence a pretext was formed to send, in a hostile manner, military forces into this holy city: they seized Fort Saint Angelo; they occupied stations in the streets, in the squares; the palace itself, in which we resided, the Quirinal palace, was threatened with all the horrors of war and siege, by a great body of infantry and cavalry: but we, being strengthened by God, through whom we can do all things, and sustained by a conscientious sense of our duty, were nothing alarmed, nor dejected in our mind by this sudden terror, and this display of the apparatus of war. With a peaceful, an equable mind, as we ought, we performed the sacred ceremonies, and the divine mysteries appropriated to that most holy day, with all becoming solemnity; and neither through fear, nor through forgetfulness, nor by negligence, were any of them omitted, which were appointed as our duty in such a situation of things.

"We recollected, with Saint Ambrose, (de Basilic. tradend. No. 17.) that the holy man Naboth, the possessor of his vineyard, when called by demand of the king to surrender his vineyard, in which the king, after having rooted up the vines, might plant a vile garden of herbs, he answered him, 'The Lord forbid that I should give the inheritance of my fathers to thee!' Much less could we suppose it was lawful for us to deliver up so ancient and sacred a heritage (i. e. the temporal sovereignty of this holy see, not without the evident appointment of Divine Providence, possessed by the Roman Pontiffs, our predecessors, for so long a series of ages,) or even by silence to seem to consent, that any should obtain this city, the metropolis of the Catholic world, where, after disturbing and destroying the most holy form of discipline, which was left by Jesus Christ to his holy church, and ordained by the sacred canons under the guidance of the Spirit of God, he should in its stead substitute a code, not only contrary to the holy canons, but in opposition and even repugnant to the precepts of the Gospels, according to his custom, and to the new order of things of the present day, which manifestly tends to confound by consociation all superstitions, and every sect with the Catholic church.

"Naboth defended his vineyard, even with his own blood, (St Amb. ibid.) Could we, therefore, (whatever in the issue might befall us) decline from defending the rights and possessions of the holy Roman church, which, to promote as far as in us lay, we had bound ourselves by the most solemn of religious obligations? or, Could we refrain from vindicating the liberty of the apostolic see, which is so intimately combined with the liberty and utility of the universal church?

"How extremely fit, and even necessary these temporal principalities are to secure to the supreme head of the church the safe and free exercise of his spiritual functions, which, by the divine will, are committed to him over all the world, may be from the present occurrences (were other arguments wanting) already too clearly demonstrated. On this account, although we affected not this temporal sovereignty, either for grandeur, or for wealth, or for dominion,—an unwarrantable desire, equally distant from our natural disposition and our most holy character, which from our earliest years we have always regarded,—yet we have strongly felt that it was due to the indispensable duty of our office, from the very day of the 2d of February, 1808, to the utmost of our power amidst such constraints, to issue by our cardinal, secretary of state, a solemn protestation, by which to render public the cause of the tribulation under which we suffered, and to declare our resolution to maintain whole and entire the rights of the apostolic see.

"When, in the mean while, the invaders obtained no advantage by threats, they determined to act towards us on another system. By a certain slow, but most vexatious and even most cruel kind of persecution, they attacked, with intention to weaken, by little and little, our constancy, which they had not been able to shake by sudden terror. Therefore, while they held us in custody in our palace, there passed scarcely a single day from the said second day of February, which was not marked by some new injury to this holy see, or by some new vexation to our very soul. All the troops which had been employed by us to preserve civil order and discipline, were taken from us, and mixed with the French bands. Our very body guards, men the most select and most noble, were imprisoned in the Castle of St. Angelo; there they were detained many days, then they were dispersed, and their companies dissolved. At the gates, and in other places of this most celebrated city, corps de garde were posted. The post-office, and all printing-offices, especially that of our Apostolic Chamber, and that of the Congregation de Propaganda Fide, were subjected to military force and orders; by which we were deprived of the liberty of printing, or of directing others to print what we desired. The regulations for administering public justice were disturbed and hindered. Solicited by fraud, by deceit, by every kind of evil artifice, to swell the mass of what they called national guards, our subjects became rebels against their lawful prince. The most audacious and most abandoned of them accepting the tricoloured French and Italian cockade, and protected by that as by a shield, with impunity spread themselves every where,—now in bodies, now single; and, either by command or by permission, broke out into every enormity against the ministers of the church, against the government, against good men. Journals, or, as they call them, Feuilles Periodiques, in defiance of our complaints, were printed at Rome, and circulated among the populace and in foreign parts, filled with injuries, sarcasms, and calumnies, decrying either the pontifical power or dignity. Sundry of our declarations, which were of great moment, and signed with our own hand, or by that of our first minister, and by our order affixed in the customary places,—these by the hands of the vilest satellites (amid the greatest indignation and lamentation of all good men) were torn down, torn in pieces, and trod under foot. Ill-advised youth, and other citizens, were invited, elected, and inscribed in suspicious conventicles, although such were most strictly prohibited, under the penalty even of anathema, by laws, both civil and ecclesiastic, enacted by our predecessors, Clement VII. and Benedict XIV. Many of our administrators and official agents, as well of the city as of the provinces, men of the greatest integrity and fidelity, were insulted, were thrown into prison, were exiled to great distances. Searches after papers and writings of every kind, in the private repositories of the magistrates of the pontificate, not even excepting those of the first minister of our cabinet, were made with violence. Three of our first ministers, secretaries of state, whom we had been obliged to employ one after the other, were carried off from our own residence; and at last, the majority of the most holy cardinals of the sacred Roman church, our fellows and fellow-labourers, were torn from our side, and transported afar off by military force.

"These facts, and others not less contrary to every right, human and divine, wickedly attempted and hardily perpetrated, are so well known by the public, that there is no necessity to recount them numerically, or to expatiate on them at large. Neither have we omitted (that we might not so much as seem to connive at them, or in any manner to assent to them) to expostulate sharply and strongly according to the duty of our place.

"Despoiled in such a manner, as it were, of all the ornaments of dignity and supports of authority,—deprived of all the accessaries to the fulfilment of our office, and especially of those in which all the churches were interested,—suffering injuries of every description,— vexed by all kinds of terrors and excruciations,—oppressed so extremely, that even the exercise of both our powers was daily further impeded,—after the singular and evident providence of God, the best and greatest which has supported our fortitude, we are beholden to the prudence of such of our ministers as remained, to the fidelity of our subjects, and to the piety of the faithful, that any semblance of those powers is yet remaining.

"But, if our temporal power were reduced to a vain and empty appearance, in this city and in the adjoining provinces, it was in the most flourishing province of Urbino, of March, and of Camerini, at the same time absolutely taken away. Wherefore, we did not fail to issue a solemn protest against this manifest and sacrilegious usurpation of so many states of the church; as also to admonish our beloved against the seductions of an unjust and illegitimate government; nor did we omit to address an instruction to our venerable brethren, the bishops of those provinces.

"That government, however, was not slow! How speedily did it prove by facts, and furnish decisive evidence, that in that instruction we had foretold what religion had to expect from it! The occupation, the plunder of the patrimony of Jesus Christ, the abolition of religious houses, the expulsion of the holy virgins from their cloisters, the profanation of churches, the allowance of unbridled licentiousness, the contempt of ecclesiastical discipline and of the holy canons; the promulgation of a code, and of other laws, contrary not only to those holy canons, but also to the precepts of the gospels and to the divine rights; the abasement and oppression of the clergy; the subjection of the sacred power of the bishops to the power of laymen; the force in many ways put upon their consciences; the violent displacing of them from their cathedrals, and sending them away, with other equally nefarious, equally sacrilegious atrocities against the liberty, the immunity, and the doctrine of the church in those our provinces, committed instantly, as before in all those other places which had fallen under the power of that government,—these, these, are the wonderful rewards!—these the illustrious monuments of that astonishing attachment to the Catholic religion, which, even at this day, is incessantly boasted of and promised!

"For us, who experience so many bitternesses on the part of those from whom we could least expect them, already filled with them, and afflicted by them on every side, we grieve not so much for the present as for the future state of our persecutors:—'for if the living Lord be angry with us a little [while, Eng. tr.] for our chastening and correction, yet shall he be at one again with his servants: but thou, who hast been the author of all mischiefs against the church [the Hebrews] how shalt thou escape the hand of God? God will not forgive any, neither will he respect the greatness of any: for he made both the small and great; and to the most powerful he has reserved the most powerful punishment'. * Moreover, we desire, that by whatever means, even by our own life, the eternal perdition of our persecutors might be prevented, and their salvation ensured!—for still we love them; and never have we ceased to love them! We desire never to depart from that spirit of charity, that spirit of meekness † which nature has imparted to us, which our will has exercised, and that we might in future, as we have hitherto, spare the rod, which has been given to us, together with the charge of the whole flock of the Lord, in the person of the most blessed Peter, from the prince of pastors, for the correction and the punishment of wanderers, and of obdurate sheep, and for making them an example and a salutary terror to others."

SATURDAY, JULY 29TH, 1820.

Excommunication of Buonaparte, &c. continued from preceding Number.

"BUT this is not the moment for lenity. Every one who beholds cannot but see, unless he be wilfully blind, to what such atrocities tend, if they be not opposed in some manner, while it may be done. On the other hand, there is none who does not see, that there remains no hope, in any shape, that their authors, either by admonitions, or by councils, or by entreaties, or by expostulations, may be rendered friendly to the church. To those means they have left no access: they neither hear them, nor answer them, but by accumulating injuries upon injuries;—nor can it be pretended that they submit to the church as sons to a mother, or as disciples to their mistress,—by those who devise nothing, who do nothing, who attempt nothing, but with intention to subject her as a servant to her master, and by subjecting her to overturn her very foundations.

"What then remains for us to do, unless we would incur the reproach of negligence or slothfulness, or perhaps even that of having wickedly deserted the cause of God!—except to lay aside all reference to terrestrial things, to renounce all fleshly prudence, and to follow the precept of the gospel, 'If he will not hear the church, let him be to thee as a heathen man, and a publican.' ‡ Let them once again understand that, 'by the law of Christ, their sovereignty is subjected to our throne:

for we also exercise a sovereignty; we add also, a more noble sovereignty, unless it were just that the spirit should yield to the flesh, and celestial things to terrestrial.' * Many great Pontiffs, illustrious by their doctrine and holiness, by one or other of those crimes which are subjected to anathema by the sacred canons, have been reduced to equal extremities in behalf of the church, against kings and contumacious princes. Shall we fear to follow their example even in this, after so many crimes, so nefarious, so atrocious, so sacrilegious, so universally known, so openly manifest to all? Should not our fear be greater, rather to have justly deserved the accusation of having so done too late, rather than too early; especially, when by this last crime, the most wicked of all that have hitherto been perpetrated against our temporal sovereignty, we are warned, that from henceforth we shall not be more free to discharge those so weighty and necessary duties of our Apostolic Ministry?

"Wherefore, by the authority of Almighty God, and of the most holy apostles Peter and Paul, and by our own, we declare all those who after the invasion of this holy city, and the ecclesiastical dominions, and the sacrilegious violation of the patrimony of the blessed Peter, the prince of the apostles, by the Gallic troops (outrages complained of by us in the aforesaid two consistorial allocutions, and in many protests and reclamations published by our order in the said city, and states of the church), against the immunity of the church, against the church itself, and the rights of this holy see, and its temporal authority, perpetrated either by themselves or by others, together with all their abettors, advisers, adherents, or others in any manner concerned in the furthering of the aforesaid violences, we decree that they have incurred the GREATER EXCOMMUNICATION, with the other censures and penalties inflicted by the sacred canons, by the apostolic constitutions, and by the general councils; especially by that of the Council of Trent, (Sess. xxii. cap. xi. de Reform.); and if need be, we do anew excommunicate and anathematize them; we declare that they have incurred, as penalties, the loss of all and every kind of privilege, grace and indulgence, in whatsoever manner granted to them, whether by us, or by the Roman Pontiffs our predecessors; neither from this censure can they be liberated or absolved by any, unless by us, or by the Roman Pontiff for the time being, unless in the article of death; and then falling again under the same censures in case of recovery: and further they are incompetent and incapable to obtain the benefit attending on absolution, until they have publicly retracted, revoked, annulled, and abolished, to the utmost possible, all and every kind of outrage; and have effectually reinstated all things, or otherwise have made condign satisfaction to the church, and to us, and to this holy see, in the premises aforesaid.

"Wherefore we decree and declare by these presents, that all those, and likewise all others, deserving of the most special mention, together with their successors in office, shall never, under any pretence, be in any degree relieved from the retraction, revocation, annulling, and abolition of all the outrages above-mentioned; but shall be bound to make adequate, real, and effectual satisfaction to the church, to us, and to the said holy see, according to these presents; yea, they are always bound under these obligations, and shall so continue, in order to the validity of whatever benefits they may obtain from absolution.

"But, while we are constrained to draw from its scabbard the sword of church severity, we do not in the least forget, that, unworthy though we be, we hold the place of him who, when he exercises his justice, does not forget mercy. Therefore, we direct and command, first our own subjects, and also all Christian people, in virtue of holy obedience, that none of them on occasion of these letters, or by any pretext derived from them, should presume to hurt, injure, prejudice, or damage in any manner whatever, the said parties, their property, rights, or prerogatives. Even while inflicting those punishments which God has put in our power, for so many and so great injuries to God, and to his holy church, we propose to ourselves, above all, 'that those who now trouble us should be converted, and be troubled with us (St Aug. Ps. liv. 1.), if haply it might prove that 'God should give them repentance to the acknowledgement of the truth.' †

"For these causes, lifting up our hands to heaven in the humility of our heart, we do again remit and commend to God, whose, rather than ours, is that most just cause which we support; and again by his grace assisting us, we profess our readiness to drink to the very dregs, on the behalf of his church, that cup which he himself first of all condescended to drink for her. We beseech and entreat him by the bowels of his mercy, that he would not despise nor reject the prayers and deprecations addressed to him by us, day and night, for their recovery. Certainly, no day so bright or equally joyful, could shine for us, as that on which it were granted us by the Divine mercy to see our sons, now the cause of so much tribulation and grief to us, again taking refuge in our paternal bosom, and speedily returning to the sheepfold.

the parties before-mentioned, or any others interested in the premises, in whatever manner, or of whatever state, degree, order, pre-eminence, or dignity they may be, or otherwise; or who ought to be mentioned individually, or specially, by any other expression or term of dignity, by pleading that they have not consented, or that having been called, cited, and heard, that they have not been sufficiently convinced of the verity and justice of the occasion of these presents, or for any other cause, colour, or pretext whatever) we say, may not at any time be impeached of subreption or obreption, or nullity, or want of intention on our part, or want of consent of the parties interested, nor of any other defect whatever: neither shall they be held, impugned, infringed, refracted, questioned, or reduced to terms of right; neither shall any remedy lie against them by special pleading, or by restitution to the import of the whole, or by other evasion of right, of fact, or of grace; neither shall this remedy, having been solicited, granted, and issued of our knowledge and plenitude of power, be questioned in judgment, or out of judgment; but the present letters shall always continue firm, valid, and efficacious, and shall maintain and obtain their full and entire effect; and by those whom they concern, and for so long as they concern them, they shall be held inviolable and unshaken: so, and not otherwise, shall they be taken by all judges, ordinary, or delegate; also by the auditors of causes of the apostolic palace, and by the cardinals of the holy Roman Church, also by the legates a latere, and by the Nuncios of the said see, and by all others enjoying or to enjoy whatsoever pre-eminence, or power; depriving them and each of them, whoever he be, of the power, faculty, and authority of otherwise judging of them, and interpreting them: declaring null and void whatever may be attempted against them by any one, whether by authority, and of knowledge, or by ignorance.

"Notwithstanding the foregoing, and so far as need be, our rule, and that of the apostolic chancery, de jure quæsito non tollendo, and the other apostolic constitutions and appointments, and whatever other statutes and customs established by oath, or by apostolic confirmation, or by any other corroboration and establishment,—notwithstanding all usages and styles from time immemorial, all previous privileges, indulgences, and apostolic letters;—notwithstanding all other, or whatsoever persons, and with whatever dignity resplendent, whether ecclesiastical or worldly, and however qualified, and requiring specially to be expressed, under whatever tenor and form of words,—notwithstanding, also, whatever clause derogatory of derogatories, or other efficacious of most efficacious, or insolite, or irritating, and all other decrees, purporting to be of motion, of knowledge, and of full power, whether consistorial, or otherwise, in whatever manner, contrary to these premises granted, yielded, made, and often repeated, and however often they may have been seen, approved, confirmed, and renewed,—from all and singular of them in the present instance, we derogate;—from their whole tenor general and special, specific, express, and individual, word by word, and not only by general clauses, under whatever form expressed,—according to the tenor of these presents, as if they were here inserted and explained word for word, formally, and nothing of them omitted; taking them as if they were wholly and sufficiently expressed and inserted in these presents; which, notwithstanding, shall still continue in their full strength and primary effect for this special purpose; and we do expressly derogate from whatever is contrary to them; and our will is that such be derogated from.

"And whereas these present letters cannot be safely published, especially in those places where there is the greatest need, as is a notorious fact, our will is that they, or copies of them, be affixed and published at the doors of the church of the Lateran, of the Basilica of the Prince of the Apostles, also of the Apostolic Chancery, of the General Court of the Monte Citorio, and in the Square of the Campo di Fiore in this city; and that, being so affixed and published, they should be binding on all and singular who are concerned in them, as if they had been served on each of them nominally and personally.

"And further our will is, that to the same letters, or otherwise printed copies of them, subscribed by the hand of some notary public, and furnished with the seal of some person of ecclesiastical dignity, faith be given, in every place, and among every people, as well in judgment as out of judgment, wherever they may be exhibited, as if these presents themselves were here exhibited and shown.

"Given at Rome, at the Church of Santa Maria the Major, under the Fisherman's Ring, the 10th day of July, 1809, in the Tenth Year of our Pontificate.

PIUS, PP. VII."

"This curious paper, which will be memorable in the annals of ecclesiastical history, needs no comment. We may, however, readily suppose, from the well-known disposition of the French Emperor, that this bold act of his Holiness would be warmly resented. We are informed, by the public papers, that the Pope had been escorted, under a strict guard, to Savona, where he had been kept in close confinement several days. He was then removed to Grenoble, with a design, as it was supposed, of being taken farther into France; but the people flocked with such eagerness from all parts to pay homage to the unfortunate Pontiff, increasing in numbers in proportion to his progress, that the French general deemed it prudent to return with him to Savona, till further orders were received from Paris. No person is permitted to see him, but those to whose care he is entrusted.

"It is also added, That before he left Rome, aware of the dreadful measures to which the French ruler might have recourse, in order to extort from him what measures his policy might require, he had, in conjunction with the body of cardinals, chosen his coadjutor and successor to the Pontificate, who is said to be the Archbishop of Palermo." Religious Monitor for Aug. 1810.

I have inserted this document rather for preservation, than with a view to the exposure of its impieties. Yet there are some things in it that show the cloven foot as distinctly as if it had been the work of the Alexanders and the Innocents, of a period before the Reformation. With some remarks on these I shall occupy the remaining pages of this Number.

The holy father is pleased to proclaim, in one short sentence, both his littleness and his greatness—"We, unworthy as we are, who upon earth represent the God of peace,"—(see No. CVI. page 445.) It is difficult to imagine greater impiety and presumption, than for one who is unworthy, to give himself out as God's representative! God never had a representative in the world but one, and he was infinitely worthy. God was represented, or to speak more properly, manifested in the person of Jesus Christ, who in his life and doctrine gave a true representation of the divine character. And Christ, as Mediator, has received from the Father sovereign authority over all persons and things in earth, and also in heaven. In the exercise of this authority, he may be called the representative of the Father. He received the kingdom from him, and will deliver it up to him again, (1 Cor. xv. 24.) But for a sinful creature to usurp the authority, and assume the title of representative of God on earth, is such shocking impiety, that we can scarcely suppose the idea to have originated with man, depraved as he is. It must have proceeded from the angel of the bottomless pit.

Nothing can more plainly point out the Man of sin, spoken of by the apostle Paul, (2 Thess. ii. 3, 4.) than this assumption of the style of representative of God. It implies, not merely a claim to be regarded as a God; but to be regarded, obeyed, and worshipped as the substitute of the only living and true God. Thus the inspired apostle expounds it. He "opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God;" and the application of this to the Pope of Rome is proved by the fact, that he is, on certain occasions, especially on his being raised to the Pontificate, the object of humble and prostrate adoration by the cardinals, inferior clergy, and all whom he is pleased to admit to the "august ceremony of the adoration."

I am not speaking of the Popes who reigned five hundred years ago, and who gave laws to the world during the dark ages. I am speaking of the Sovereign Pontiff, who reigns in Rome at this very day. He claims to be the representative of God on the earth; and as such he virtually gives himself out, as the God whom all men on earth ought to worship. The true God hath declared that he will not give his glory to another. There is nothing of which he is so jealous as of the worship that is due to him. Let our modern Papists think of this; and let them consider how they will be able to answer at the last day, when the great idol who deceived the nations of the world, and all who were deceived by him, and who fell down to worship him, shall be called to give an account of their idolatries, and other abominations.

Intimately connected with this, is the claim which his Holiness asserts over all temporal and earthly thrones. He refers immediately to that of France, but, as his language is general, and in the plural, it is evidently meant to apply to all the kingdoms in the world. "Let them once again understand," says he, "that by the law of Christ, their sovereignty is subjected to our throne; for we also exercise a sovereignty; we add also, a more noble sovereignty, unless it were just that the spirit should yield to the flesh, and celestial things to terrestrial." We know one, and only one, who can say with truth, "By me kings reign, and princes decree justice. By me princes rule, and nobles, yea all the judges of the earth." (Prov. viii. 15, 16.) We know no other "throne" or power to which the princes of this world are subject: but there is a silly priest in Rome, called the Pope, who modestly gives himself out as occupying the throne of the King eternal, immortal, and invisible; and who therefore claims to have authority over the princes of this world. I again request my readers to remember, that this is not the language of a monk of the dark ages. It is the language of the man, who, at this moment, presides over what is called the Catholic Church,—of the man, to whom every Popish priest in Britain and Ireland, has sworn implicit obedience and subjection. He does not at present mention the British throne by name, as subject to his throne; but it is implied in his general reference to all temporal thrones. He did formerly declare the British throne to be subject to his. He has never yet withdrawn the claim; and the army of priests who have sworn allegiance to him, are watching their opportunity of again asserting the sovereignty of their spiritual head, who was never yet known to relinquish a claim of power and authority which he or his predecessors had made.

Let us reflect then for a moment, what would be the consequence, if we had one or two hundred Papists in our houses of Parliament, and, perhaps, a dozen of them in the Privy Council. Every one of them would be the humble servant of his priest and confessor, and every priest is the sworn vassal of Pope Pius the VII., who publicly declares, that he has a throne that is above all earthly thrones, and therefore, above that of Great Britain; whose predecessors excommunicated and deposed our sovereigns at their pleasure, and gave the kingdom to others; the right and authority of doing which, has never, by the Popes, been relinquished; but by the present Pope, re-asserted in the deed which I have under consideration. Then surely, every Papist who should have power, would feel it to be his bounden duty to re-establish the glory of his church, and of the head of his church, in this kingdom, which he must, and really does consider, as having been unjustly and most wickedly separated from the dominion of the holy see of St Peter.

It will be replied, that our English Papists declare upon oath, that the Pope of Rome hath no civil power or authority in Great Britain or Ireland; but this declaration is of no value, seeing the Pope himself has not made it. Innocent III. excommunicated and deposed King John, and laid England under an interdict. Both Clement VII. and Paul III. excommunicated Henry VIII. Pius V. excommunicated Queen Elizabeth, and commanded her subjects to rebel against her; and there is scarcely a kingdom in Europe whose sovereign did not at one time or other suffer the same indignity. Now the Pope has never yet said, that the throne of Britain is not subject to his throne. He has never condemned the deeds of his predecessors, who excommunicated and deposed our sovereigns. He is just as ready to urge his claim of sovereignty over Britain as over France, when he shall see a favourable opportunity: and let his subjects swear what they will, there is a prior and more sacred oath, which at least every priest has sworn, which binds him above all earthly things, to obey, and promote the interest of the holy see. The binding obligation of this oath cannot be set aside by an oath of allegiance to any secular prince, or by any declaratory oath with regard to the authority which the Pope has or ought to have in this kingdom. It binds him to support every measure that shall promote the honour of the Pope, and the interest of Popery, if it should even be the setting up of a Popish Pretender to the crown. I do not say that this is likely to happen in our day; but let Papists get into power, and it will not be their fault if it do not happen: nay, they are under the most solemn obligations to bring it about if they can; and from a speech by Dr Dromgoole, one of their Irish demagogues, we learn that they are not without the hope of seeing it at no very distant period. See PROT. p. 135.

No. CVIII.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 5TH, 1820.

IT was not because Buonaparte was a usurper, and a wholesale and retail murderer, that the Pope denounced against him the dreadful sentence of Excommunication which occupies the greater part of my last two Numbers. He might have gone on plundering and massacring the nations of Europe one after another, and yet have enjoyed full communion with the holy see, in all the spiritual privileges which belong to it. It was his invasion of the holy see itself, and of the city of Rome, that was the heinous offence that brought upon his head the thunder of the Vatican. "Therefore," says the Pope, "by the authority of Almighty God, and of the most holy apostles Peter and Paul, and by our own, we declare all those who, after the invasion of this holy city, and the ecclesiastical dominions, and the sacrilegious violation of the patrimony of the blessed Peter, the prince of the apostles," &c. &c., "We decree, that they have incurred the GREATER EXCOMMUNICATION, &c."

I need not inquire what Peter or Paul had to do with such paltry patrimony as a few thousand acres of Italian ground, after they had obtained the crown of life, and an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away: but it is worth while to point out the gross impiety of his Holiness, in interposing the authority of the Almighty in the manner he has done. He seems to have the same notions of the true God as the Syrians had; "He is the god of the hills, but not the god of the valleys." He is the god of Italy and of the ecclesiastical dominions, but not the god of Holland, or of Prussia; else why not be called upon to interpose on behalf of these kingdoms, when they were invaded and plundered by the French troops? The Almighty is the God of the whole earth; and Buonaparte's depredations upon the Netherlands must have been as offensive to Him, as the invasion of the Ecclesiastical dominions; but the unworthy representative of God on the earth, as the Pope modestly styles himself, took no interest in the misery of other countries; he did not think of applying his spiritual power for the correction of the invader, until his ambition began to affect himself, and his dominions. Then, indeed, it was a different matter. He could "spare the rod" no longer. The rod, he says, was given to him "with the charge of the whole flock of the Lord, in the person of the most blessed Peter, from the prince of pastors, for the correction and the punishment of wanderers, and of obdurate sheep." But it appears that Buonaparte was not looked upon by his Holiness as a wanderer from the right path, or an obdurate sheep, notwithstanding his manifold crimes, till he invaded the dominions of the holy see. From that day, he was unworthy of the communion of the faithful; and he fell of course to be excommunicated.

As it is time to be drawing the subject of the Pope and his supremacy to a close, I shall endeavour to comprise what I have farther to say within the present Number. It would be easy to show from the mode of electing men to be Popes, and from the conduct of the greater part of them after they were elected, that there is nothing heavenly or divine in the system; but that the whole is tainted by the most disgusting of this world's politics. I refer to the Life of Pope Sixtus V., written in Italian by Gregorio Leti, and translated into English by Ellis Farneworth, as affording a full view of the mode of electing to the holy chair; and such a scene of caballing and deceit will not readily be witnessed in those who conduct the affairs of the worst secular government in the world. The moral character of Sixtus was superior to that of most of his predecessors; yet he acquired the Pontificate by means of a system of cunning and falsehood, practised for many years. By his talents and address he raised himself from being a swineherd, to the dignity of a cardinal; and then, by seeming to renounce all the cares of this world, by affecting the feebleness of an old man, with one foot in the grave, and the other lifted up to follow, he succeeded in procuring himself to be elected to the Pontificate. He had long foreseen, that when the chair should become vacant, it would be difficult to fill it, as the cardinals were divided into different parties almost equally balanced. He saw that none of the parties were sufficiently confident of their own strength, and that they would probably unite in the choice of some crazy old man, merely to keep the chair occupied for a few months, each party expecting to gather more strength before the old man should die. Such a crazy subject appeared the Cardinal Montalto, for that was the name he bore in the conclave.

"During the ten days that the funeral ceremonies of the deceased Pope lasted," says the biographer of Sixtus V., "they that had any pretensions to the papacy were carrying on their schemes and intrigues, running about to solicit the suffrages and interest of their friends; whilst Montalto did not seem to give himself the least trouble or concern. He took so uncommon a road to it, that nobody suspected he had any design at all of the kind. Some of the cardinals out of contempt called him the Ass of La Marca, (which he pretended not to hear, or take notice of,) looking upon his faculties and intellects as entirely gone; and others seeing him bent down with disease and old age, did not in the least dream of his ever being elected. But we must take notice, by the by, that he was the youngest of all those who aspired to the pontificate; and though he often used to say, that an old fellow of seventy was fit for nothing in this world; it is certain, that at that time, he was only in his sixty-fourth year. Indeed, hardly any one could have imagined, that the cardinals would turn their eyes upon a person that could scarcely stand upon his legs, whom they thought little better than a dotard and a driveller; as the government of the holy see requires a man of sound and strong faculties, both of body and mind. Yet it was to these very failings that Montalto owed his exaltation," p. 172. When he was incidentally mentioned as having as good a chance as any other, he replied, "The cardinals would be very wrong-headed, indeed, to think of such a poor object as him, who had it not in his power to do any one thing but wish well to his patrons and friends." When the thing was more seriously proposed to him, he fell into such a violent fit of coughing, that his friends thought he would have died upon the spot, and he said, as soon as he could speak, "that his reign would be but of a few days; that, besides the continual difficulty with which he drew his breath, he had not strength enough to support such a weight; and that his small experience in affairs, made him altogether unfit for a charge of so important a nature, except he could depend upon the assistance of others." They answered, that God would give him strength sufficient to govern his church; to which he replied, "that he never would accept of it upon any terms whatsoever, except they would all three promise not to abandon him, but take the greatest part of the weight off his shoulders, as he was neither able, nor could in conscience pretend, to take the whole of it upon himself." The other cardinals (three in number), assuring him that they would, he said, "If you are resolved to make me Pope, it will only be placing yourselves upon the throne; we must share the pontificate; for my part I shall be content with the bare title; let them call me Pope, and you are heartily welcome to the power and authority." Afterwards he told his brother cardinals, "Let me conjure you not to think of choosing me, except you will be content to bear the whole burden of the government yourselves." This was just what these cardinals wanted, and they determined to support him in the election.

The election of a Pope is performed in one of three ways; by scrutiny, which resembles what we call ballot; by access, which is thus explained:—When one of the cardinals proposes a name, those who are for the same person rise from their seats, and go to the place where the proposer sits. The third way is by adoration, and is thus performed: "That cardinal who is the candidate's chief friend, goes up to him, and making a low reverence, cries out, a Pope, a Pope! when it happens that two-thirds of them do the same, he is then acknowledged as such; but if there wants only one of that number, the election is void." Thus after a Pope elect has been adored, it is sometimes necessary to make a scrutiny, to ascertain whether he has had the requisite number of adorers. "Whilst they were crowding towards Montalto to congratulate him, he sat coughing and weeping, as if some great misfortune had befallen him. But when the Cardinal Dean ordered them to retire to their respective places, that they might proceed to a regular scrutiny, he drew near to St Sixtus, and whispered in his ear, "Pray take care that the scrutiny is of no prejudice to the adoration;" which was the first discovery he made of his ambition. It was observed, that after the scrutiny was begun, Montalto walked backwards and forwards, and seemed to be in great agitation of spirit; but when he perceived there was a sufficient number of votes to secure his election, he threw the staff with which he used to support himself, into the middle of the chapel, stretched himself up, and appeared taller, by almost a foot, than he had done for several years, hawking and spitting with as much strength as a man of thirty years old. The cardinals, astonished at so sudden an alteration, looked at him with amazement, and Farnese, observing by some signs that St Sixtus and Alexandrino already began to repent of their forwardness in this election, said aloud, "Stay a little, softly, there is a mistake in the scrutiny." But Montalto, with a stern look, boldly answered, "there is no mistake, the scrutiny is good, and in due form;" and immediately thundered out the Te Deum himself, in a voice that made the chapel shake.

The first master of the ceremonies came to him, as is usual, and said, "My Lord Cardinal Montalto, your eminence is duly elected Pope; the holy college desires to know whether you please to accept the papacy;" to which he replied, somewhat sharply, "It is trifling and impertinent to ask, whether I will accept that which I have already accepted, as I have sufficiently shown by singing the Te Deum. However, to satisfy any scruple that may arise, I tell you that I accept it with great pleasure, and would accept another, if I could get it; for I find myself strong enough, by the divine assistance, to manage two papacies.

Farnese who stood near him, hearing this, said to St Saverino, "The gentlemen that took upon them to conduct this election, thought to have engrossed the whole administration of affairs to themselves, by choosing a fool and idiot; but I plainly see, we have got a Pope that will make fools and idiots both of them and us." St Severino only shrugged up his shoulders, and said, "Lord have mercy on us all." Thus the poor frogs had chosen a serpent for their king, and they were not able to shake him off.

When he was asked what name he would take, he answered, Sixtus V., which he did in honour of Pope Sixtus IV., who had been a monk of the same order. It was observed, that whilst the cardinals were putting on his pontifical robes, he stretched out his arms with great vigour and activity; upon which, Rusticucci, who was surprised by such a metamorphosis, said to him in a familiar way, "I perceive, holy father, the pontificate is a sovereign panacea, since it can restore youth and health to old sick cardinals;" to which he replied, in a grave and majestic manner, "So I find it." The very moment the scrutiny was ended, he laid aside that appearance of humility he had so long worn; and instead of his former civility and complaisance, he behaved with great state and reserve to every body; but, more particularly to them to whom he had been most obliged for his exaltation.

Dressed in his robes, and seated on the pontifical throne, the cardinals advanced two and two to adore him. His Holiness gave them, separately, the kiss of charity, on both cheeks; and then admitted every body who was in the conclave, to the honour of kissing his feet. It is said, when Farnese came among the rest, to perform that ceremony, he did it with great reluctance, and showed particular signs of disgust, at prostrating himself before a person of his mean birth. Some people thought he said in his heart, "Non tibi, sed Petro," "Not to thee, but St Peter." Be that as it will, when he beheld him sitting so erect, and with so much majesty upon the throne, he said to him, "Your Holiness seems a quite different sort of a man from what you were a few hours ago." "Yes," said he, "I was then looking for the keys of paradise, which obliged me to stoop a little; but now I have found them, it is time to look upwards, as I am arrived at the summit of all human glory, and can rise no higher in this world."

After the adoration was finished, and other customary ceremonies performed, the Cardinal Deacon caused a window to be broken open, and then proclaimed to the people, "Behold, I bring you glad tidings of great joy, the most illustrious Cardinal Montalto is chosen Pope, and has taken the name of Sixtus V." See book iv. Life of Sixtus V.; in which are many things interesting, impious, and ludicrous, which I am obliged to omit. Sixtus ruled both the cardinals and the people for several years, with a rod of iron; but as the cardinals could not deny that he had been chosen by the Holy Ghost, and them, the moment the election was declared, they were irrevocably bound to him as their holy father. There was no possibility of getting quit of him in a lawful way; but it was suspected that he died by poison, as many other Popes are supposed to have done.

I have been thus particular in describing an individual case, and that of a Pope of comparatively good moral character, that the reader may be able to judge what title these holy fathers have to be called the successors of Peter, the vicars of Christ, and the representatives on earth of the God of peace.

Cardinal Joyeuse, writing to King Henry IV., May 19th, 1605, gives the following character of a cardinal, whose election to the Papacy he found it necessary to promote. "The Cardinal Aldobrandini, and the Cardinal Montalto, (nephew, I believe, of Sixtus V.) came to us, desiring us to join with them to make Cardinal Tosco Pope. After we had discoursed a great while on this affair, we had much ado to resolve upon it; because the said cardinal was looked upon as a man who had lived a life not too exemplary, very apt to be choleric and angry, who had always in his mouth unchaste and immodest words, and who was given to other customs, unbecoming not only the head of the church, but any person whatever, who had but the least advantage of an honest education. In short, he was a man from whom the world could expect no good to the church; the election of whom would go against the consciences of many pious persons of the college, and might perhaps gain us nothing but disgrace and reproach from all the assembly of cardinals. Nevertheless, the little hopes that we had of having a Pope to our mind, the fear of falling on one of those who were excluded by your Majesty, the desire of not displeasing the Cardinal Aldobrandini, and the opinion which we had, that this man would be inclined to favour the affairs of your Majesty, made us resolve to assure Aldobrandini that we gave our full consent to this election."—Clarendon's Religion and Policy, or Papal Usurpations, chap. ii. This requires no comment.

It is usual for the cardinal, who is raised to the Papacy, to assume a new name. This is said to have originated in the year 844, with one whose name was Bocco di Porco, that is, hogs-face, or swine-snout. When he came to the dignity of Pope, being ashamed of it, he assumed the name of Sergius. It has ever since been the custom, though there have been some exceptions, for him who is raised to the Papacy to assume a new name. For this, the following reasons are given by Popish writers: First, because Christ, when he called his apostles, changed some of their names. Secondly, to signify, that as they changed their names, they should change also their nature. Lastly, that he who is chosen to so excellent an estate, should not be disgraced by a vile name.

Polydore Virgil, in his 4th book De Inventione Rerum, cap. 10, thus writes: "The bishop of Rome hath one peculiar prerogative or privilege, which is, that when once he is created bishop of that see, he may alter and change his name at his pleasure. As, for example, if perchance he hath been heretofore an evil-doer, he may call his name Bonifacius, that is to say, well-doer. If he have been a coward, or timorous sheep's-head, he may call himself Leo (that is, lion). If he be a clown, he may call himself Urbanus (a polite gentleman). Instead of lewd, or wicked, he may call himself Pius, or Innocent. If he have been a scandalous fellow, he may assume the appellation of Benedictus, that is, well spoken of: to the end, that the sovereign bishop, at least in name, may be an ornament and honour to the dignity of the Papacy."—See this, and a great deal more to the same purpose, in The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome, vol. ii. pp. 309, 310.

In this work we have the following summary of the personal character of a number of Popes, which I adduce in opposition to Bishop Hay's assertion, that only a few of them were bad men in their own practice. "Some Popes have been excessively covetous; as Boniface VIII., Calixtus III., John XXIII. and Boniface IX. Some puft up with Luciferian pride; as Bennet XII., Adrian IV., Celestine III., Innocent IV., Alexander III., Gregory XIII., Clement V., VI., and VII., Boniface VIII., Paul II., John XXIII., and many others; indeed, who not that ever wore the triple crown? Divers Popes have been conjurers, as Silvester III., and all his successors, for nine or ten Popes together; others sold themselves by league to the devil; as Sylvester II. and Alexander VI. So many notorious whoremongers have filled the chair, that it would be too tedious to name them. Famous cheats have been Popes;—Alexander III., Boniface VIII., Celestine V., and Benedict X. Murderers were Pius IV., Gregory VII., Stephen VIII., Sixtus V., Gregory XIV., and Honorius II. Poisoners of one another;—Damasus II., Victor II. and III., Celestine IV., and Paul III., &c. &c.," vol. ii. pp. 251, 252. By sorcerers we may understand their being, at least, pretenders to the art of magic; and by having sold themselves to the devil, we may infer that such was the popular belief, and perhaps the belief of the author, founded upon the monstrous and diabolical wickedness of these holy fathers, who are called by the title of holiness itself. Perhaps the idea of men's selling themselves to the devil may have originated in the words of Elijah to Ahab, (1 Kings xxi. 20.) "Thou hast sold thyself to work evil in the sight of the Lord." But, in order to this, it is not necessary that there be a personal contract, or league, between the devil and them.

In the above summary, I find Sixtus V. classed among the Popes who were murderers; but I do not recollect any incident in his history that entitles him to this, except what was common to him with all tyrants in power. He made very little account of human life, and ordered men to be destroyed at his pleasure. The following incident affords a view of his cruel decision of character, though it did not extend to actual murder: Pasquin (the statue so called, on which what were called pasquinades, were stuck), was dressed, one morning, in a very dirty shirt; and being asked by Marforio, "Why he wore such dirty linen?" answered, "He could get no other, for the Pope had made his washer-woman a princess." Meaning Donna Camilla, the Pope's sister, who had formerly been a laundress. This stinging piece of raillery was carried to his Holiness, who ordered strict search for the author, but to no purpose. He issued a proclamation, offering the author 1000 pistoles, and promising to spare his life, if he would discover himself; and threatening to hang him if he was found out by any body else. The poor author was so tempted by the offer, as to go, and make full confession to the Pope, who ordered the 1000 pistoles to be immediately paid. "We promised you your life, and 1000 pistoles," said his Holiness, "you have received both, and say you are satisfied: but we reserved to ourselves the power of cutting off your hands, and boring your tongue through, to prevent your being so witty for the future." Which was directly executed: Sixtus declaring, "that he did not deserve the punishment so much for the pasquinade, as for being so audacious as to avow it."—Life of Pope Sixtus V., p. 395.

On the wickedness of the Popes there is matter for many volumes, but it is time that I take up another subject. To those who wish to read in detail what I have given in the gross, I recommend the following works, some of which I have not seen, but they are recommended by a learned correspondent, who has been long engaged in the same warfare. Walch's Compendious History of Popes, London, 1759. The History of Popery, 2 vols. 4to., London, 1735. Another History of Popery, 2 vols., London, 1679; entitled also, Weekly Packet from Rome. This is a work of both arguments and facts, and it contains a great deal of curious matter. Bower's History of the Popes, 7 vols. 4to., London, 1750-66. Lord Clarendon's Papal Usurpations, or Religion and Policy, 2 vols. 8vo., Oxford, 1791. Foulis's History of Romish Treachery and Usurpations; and the Romish Horse Leech; besides such histories as Mosheim, Milner, &c., which are known to all.

No. CIX.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 12TH, 1820.

AT the conclusion of my 107th Number, I requested the reader to consider what would be the consequence, if we had one or two hundred Papists in our houses of parliament. It has been said, that this is putting a case that could not be realized, even supposing "Catholic Emancipation" were granted in all the extent that is demanded; because, it is said, there are not so many Papists qualified, or eligible to seats in parliament, though they were laid open to them. This, I am persuaded, is a mistake; and I have not a doubt, that if they were made eligible, upwards of a hundred would be found in the first parliament that should meet after the privilege was extended to them.

Ireland sends just a hundred members to the house of commons. Papists boast that their number there is to that of Protestants, as five to one; but I will take it as only four to one; and taking this as proper data by which to calculate the number of representatives, the Papist would return eighty of the hundred. And then there are the popish peers in both England and Ireland who would claim seats in the upper house; besides the English commoners whose return might be effected by the Papists in England. That Papists would elect none but men of their own faith cannot be doubted; and such is the influence of the priests over the people, that the ghostly fathers would be virtually the electors. This indeed I am informed on good authority, is, in some measure, the case already. Since the Papists in Ireland obtained the privilege of electing members of parliament, though they can elect none but Protestants, the priests have risen amazingly in importance; because the Protestant candidates must pay court to them, in order to secure the votes of the people; and we may easily imagine, that few will be found hardy enough to give a vote contrary to the mind of the priest, seeing he is believed to hold the fate of every soul in his hand. We cannot be surprised that many of the Irish members are advocates of what is called "Emancipation," seeing their election may have depended upon their declaring themselves on that side; but if they were not very short-sighted they might see, that the parliament that shall concede what is demanded with so much clamour, will be the last parliament for them. In vain would they apply to the people, or to the priests to be returned again, unless they should become Papists; for no Papist would vote for a Protestant, if there remained a qualified Papist in the three kingdoms. If Ireland should not contain a sufficient number of persons so qualified, there are great plenty to be found among the sons of Popish peers, and the inferior gentry of the same communion in England and Scotland, who would be as eligible to be returned for Ireland, as if they belonged to that kingdom.

For the information of the reader, I insert the following statement of the number and condition of the adherents of Rome, in England, in the year 1813. It is given, on the authority of the Dublin Evening Post, in the Orthodox Journal for January 1814. It is said to have been obtained through the channel of a Liverpool gentleman "of eminent character and intelligence;" but as it is evident that the writer belongs to the body about which he writes, and to which he may be supposed a little partial, we ought to receive his account of the respectability, and superior morality of his brethren, with some grains of allowance.

ENGLISH CATHOLICS.

(From the Dublin Evening Post.)

The extraordinary progress which the cause of the Catholics of Ireland has made within the last few years, through the talent and prudence of its leaders, has incidentally brought forth the Catholics of England to public notice. This body of men has not yet thoroughly recovered from the languor and depression inflicted by the penal laws; and their apparent inertia may be accounted for by the habits of despondency, which frequent insults and aggressions had wrought upon them.

Events, however, are now dissipating this gloom: and the approaching Session is likely to render their movements a subject of general attention.

Our anxiety to procure useful and authentic information for our readers, upon every subject connected with the cause of Religious Freedom, has led us to a diligent inquiry into the present condition of the English Catholic body, and we have been fortunate enough to obtain, through the channel of a correspondent in Liverpool, of eminent character and intelligence, the following statement, upon which we can perfectly rely.

The subject is somewhat new and original—the ground hitherto unbroken—and the matter various and detailed.

The total number of Catholics in England and Wales is computed to exceed 300,000. The principal Catholic counties are Lancashire, Yorkshire, Staffordshire, Warwickshire, and Northumberland. These, with Durham, Cheshire, Norfolk, Suffolk, Kent, and Worcestershire, (the next in number) contain about 200,000. London and its suburbs, with Surrey and Middlesex, are rated at 50,000. The remaining 50,000 are thinly scattered throughout the other counties and cities—but chiefly in Bristol, Bath, Portsmouth, Plymouth, Southampton, Exeter, Gloucester, and a few watering places.

Some compute the total number at 400,000, and this we cannot positively contradict; but we rely with more confidence upon the proportionate population of the respective districts, as above given, than upon our computation of the aggregate amount.

Their classes are three—Clergy, Nobility, and Commoners—and each forms a venerable, though decayed, monument of ancient worth and respectability!

I. CLERGY—They have ceased, during upwards of two centuries, to possess any regular hierarchy. There are no bishops or priests, as in Ireland, officiating in appropriate dioceses or parishes. They are governed, in spirituals, by four superiors, called vicars apostolic; these vicars are deputed by the Pope, and exercise vicarial powers revocable at pleasure. They are, indeed, bishops in the Catholic Church, but do not enjoy episcopal authority in Britain; their sees are little more than nominal, or "in partibus," as it is termed—as Centurien, Castaballa. &c. Each vicar has a district, therefore, assigned to him, not a see.

Thus, Dr Gibson in the northern; Dr Milner in the Midland; Dr Poynter in the London; and Dr Collingridge in the Western district.

In like manner each priest has a separate district; not, however, any particular parish, but a "Mission," and he is termed a "Missionary!" He acts by virtue of a faculty, granted by the apostolic vicar of the district, and is removable at his pleasure.

In Ireland, on the contrary, where the regular succession has been preserved, no bishop is removable at the mere will of the Pope—nor is any parish priest removable at the mere will of his bishop. To effect such removal, there must exist a canonical cause, an accuser, a regular trial, sentence, and ratification.

It will be recollected, that Lord Redesdale (in his speech in the Lords, in May, 1803) took upon him to state roundly, that the Catholic clergy in Ireland were wholly dependent upon the Pope; and in England, quite independent; a proof, amongst many, of his Lordship's incaution and want of knowledge.

In every county of England there are Catholic chapels and congregations. Altogether there are about 900 chapels, mostly erected within the last twenty-five years; and generally clean, commodious, and well built. Lancashire alone counts upwards of one hundred Catholic chapels. Moreover, most of the Catholic country gentlemen of fortune maintain chapels in their houses. Service is performed daily in the private chapel, and the traveller is freely admitted to assist at the office.

In the summer 1813, Dr Smith (the Vicar-Assistant to the venerable Dr Gibson), in the Northern district, confirmed the following numbers of Catholic children, in three towns alone:

In Manchester	800
— Liverpool	1000
— Preston	1200

Hence some estimate may be formed of the Catholic population of England.

II. PEERS.—The Catholic peers are seven in number, viz.

	Created.
1. Earl of Shrewsbury, Premier and Earl of Waterford and Wexford in Ireland	1442
2. Viscount Fauconberg	1643
3. Baron Stourton	1448
4. Baron Petre	1603
5. Baron Arundel	1605
6. Baron Dormer	1615
7. Baron Clifford	1672

The presumptive heir to the dukedom of Norfolk * is also a Catholic. In Scotland there are two Catholic earls—Traquair and Newburgh.

The Catholic baronets of England are seventeen in number: namely—

	Created.
Sir Wm. Gerard, Lancashire	1611
Sir Edward Hales, Kent	1611
Sir Henry Englefield, Berks	1612
Sir G. Jerningham, Norfolk	1621
Sir Henry Tichborne, Hants	1628
Sir John Throckmorton, Berks	1641
Sir Edward Blount, Shropshire	1642
Sir Windsor Hunloke, Derbyshire	1643
Sir Carn. Haggerston, Lincolnshire	1643
Sir Thos. Webbe, Wiltshire	1644
Sir R. Smythe, Warwickshire	1669
Sir Rich. Bedingfield, Norfolk	1661
Sir T. Massey Stanley, Cheshire	1661
Sir Thos. Gage, Suffolk	1662
Sir John Lawson, Yorkshire
Sir H. Maire Lawson, Yorkshire	1665
Sir Piere Mertyn, Flintshire	1670

The principal names which have dropped off lately, either by deaths or conformity, have been those of Howard, Duke of Norfolk; Browne, Lord Montague; Roper, Lord Teynham; Vavasour, Curzon, Acton, Mannock, Gascoigne, Fleetwood, Swinburne—all Peers or Baronets.

Amongst the English Catholics are many ancient families, of name and renown in English history. Their present heads are mostly country gentlemen, retired, reserved; of sedentary, and nearly secluded habits of life. Such are the names of Constable, Clifford, Weld, Howard, Plowden, Townley, Jones, Stapleton, Carey, Stonor, Eyre, Heneage, Stanley, Turberville, Selby, Browne, Tunstall, Eyston, Errington, Chichester, Chomley, Giffard, Tasborough, Biddulph, Eccleston, Huddleston, Berrington, Charlton, Dalton, Sheldon, Perrers, Canning, Berkely, Manby, Riddall, Darell, Fermor, Trafford, Weston, &c. &c. &c.

There are about five hundred of these Catholic families, not inferior to many in the British Peerage in ancient, pure, and noble lineage—some, who can boast the legitimate Plantagenet blood—several who enjoy landed estates, lineally transmitted since the Norman days, and even the Saxon era. These, though not now titled, may be classed by the herald amongst nobility. The heads of these families mostly live retired upon patrimonial incomes, varying in annual value from £1500 to £25,000.

It may appear curious to those who know the name of Giffard in Ireland only, that the parent stock in England is wholly Catholic. The Giffards of Chillington, in Staffordshire, possess landed estates of £8000 a year, and upwards; and of this family is Sir John Throckmorton's lady, the elegant and accomplished correspondent of the pathetic poet, Cowper.

III. COMMONERS.—We have spoken of the clergy, nobility, and higher classes of the English Catholic body. The inferior orders are little distinguishable from the corresponding classes of their Protestant neighbours (or Churchmen, as they are termed).

Here the broad features of distinction almost disappear—Industry, association, necessity, obliterate the characteristic traits. Generally speaking, they are little farmers, shopkeepers, artists, and labourers—decent, humble, timid, shy, and careful. It is supposed that they are rather more moral, regular, submissive, and inoffensive, than their neighbours; and also of a more sedate and stationary habit of life. Emigrations from their parishes, pauperism, and crimes, are said to be rare amongst them.

There may be some foundation for this eulogium; but, whether it is due to the control of vigilant censors, to a guarded purity of deportment, to a more moral system of education, to the virtuous precepts of their religion, or to accident, we do not venture to determine.

Wales affords but few Catholics—a singular fact of a race, in lesser points, obstinately wedded to ancient usage.

Wales, separated from England only by hedges and streams, remains profoundly ignorant of the English language, and clings to her own, with all the jealousy of national pride.

Yet, Wales ceded her ancient religion, (without scruple or hesitation) to a people, whose language she still disdains to understand. She drinks, with delicious rapture, of every stream that flows from English eccentricity; and neither the mummery of the Jumpers, nor the frenzy of the Ezekielites, renders the spiritual potion too muddy for the ardent and enthusiastic Welchman.

The author of the above statement considers it "a singular fact," that "Wales affords but few Catholics," while the Welch are said to be "a race, in lesser points, obstinately wedded to ancient usage." Now, perhaps, this is the very circumstance that accounts for the fact. The "ancient usage," with regard to religious worship, in Wales, was certainly not Popish worship, or any thing like Popery. The religion of Rome was a mere novelty in that ancient principality. It could not have existed there many centuries before the Reformation; and, therefore, when the Reformation delivered the Welch from the thraldom of the ghostly intruders, in the form of Romish priests, they would gladly return to their more ancient usages.

Britain, there is reason to think, was favoured with the light of Christianity as early as the first century. I do not state this as a matter of absolute certainty; but as one of great probability; and I have never seen any thing that renders it incredible. There is extant a writing ascribed to Clemens, the fellow-labourer of the apostle Paul, in which he says that Paul, in preaching the gospel, went to the utmost bounds of the west: (Το τερμα της δυσεως, terminum, finem occidentis, the extremity of the west) which may very properly apply to the British isles, which were the western extremity of the Roman empire. The expression does not necessarily mean the most western part in point of longitude; but the most remote part in a western direction. Eusebius, in the fourth century, says, that the gospel was preached in the British isles by some of the apostles. He, of course, could not speak from his own knowledge; but he must have had such evidence as satisfied him of the fact. Tertullian, in the second century, says, that before his time Christianity had extended itself to parts of Britain inaccessible to the Roman arms. These must have been the mountainous parts of Wales and Scotland, into which the Romans were not able to penetrate. Gildas says, that the gospel was preached in Britain before the defeat of Boadicea, which took place in the year 61; and the British Triads state, that the knowledge of Christianity was brought to Britain by the father of Caractacus, who was liberated from his detention at Rome seven years after the defeat of Caractacus, that is, A. D. 58 or 59, the time in which (according to Eusebius, Jerome, Petavius, Scaliger, &c.) Paul was set at liberty from his first confinement at Rome. See the Bishop of St David's Protestant Catechism, Section viii.

These things are not asserted as divine truths. They are not so certain, as that we can build an article of faith upon them, as the Church of Rome builds her monstrous fabric upon the assertion that Peter was the first bishop of that city, of which there is much less evidence than that Paul preached the gospel in England. But though we cannot assert the above as matters of divine record, they are credible articles of history, and sufficiently authentic for my present purpose, which is to show that Popery was not the religion of the ancient Britons from whom the Welch are descended.

Assuming the above facts as matter of credible history (and they have never been shown to be fabulous), the learned prelate above mentioned, in a letter to Lord Kenyon, 1819, writes as follows:—"To the labours and preaching of the great apostle of the Gentiles, we are indebted for the first introduction of the gospel. Of its existence to the beginning of the fourth century, we have the testimony of Tertullian, Origen, and Gildas. Public councils and synods, and religious institutions, attest its continuance in the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries.—The rejection of the Pope's authority (by the Church of England) in the seventh century, stamps the first feature of its Protestant character. Its observance of Easter, its aversion to image worship, and its vernacular version of the scriptures, show its independence on the Church of Rome during the Saxon government, down to the Norman conquest." Pp. 2, 3.

Now, long before this period, the ancient British had been driven by their Saxon invaders, to take refuge among the mountains of Wales. They carried their language and their religion with them. Considering their many disadvantages, it is not to be supposed that they preserved, or professed Christianity, in every point, pure as it was received from the apostles; but it was long ere they submitted to Rome. Popery was a novelty to them; and though forced upon them for a time, they readily threw it off when they were favoured by the light of the Reformation. This is what our Popish eulogist calls ceding their ancient religion, without scruple or hesitation, to a people whose language they still disdain to understand. It was rather throwing their idols to the moles and to the bats, and returning to the religion of their remote ancestors.

If it shall be replied, that St Wenefride is a Welch saint of great antiquity, and that she belonged to the Church of Rome; I answer, we have no credible evidence of this. That which we have as her life, was written hundreds of years after the period in which she is said to have lived; and when nothing of her character or history could be known with certainty. I will not deny, that there may have lived a noble lady of that name, distinguished for piety and benevolence; and that her memory may have been held in veneration for ages. Some idle monk taking advantage of this, would collect all the stories that were current among the people; and, with the aid of a lively imagination, he could easily dress up such a legend as that which we have under the title of the Life and Miracles of St Winefride. Scott of Dunse, commonly called Duns Scotus, was, no doubt, a learned and great man in his day; but among the common people in the south of Scotland, he is known only as Michael Scott the warlock (wizard), and as such is the subject of many silly and absurd stories, which are as remote from real history as the miracles of Winefride the saint.

It may be true, that some extravagance is exhibited in the worship of certain sects in Wales, which every sober Protestant will lament and condemn; but I venture to affirm, that the folly of the Jumpers and Ezekielites, be they who they may, is not greater than that of many in the Church of Rome, who have been canonized, and who are at this day worshipped as saints.

If we may judge of the morality of Papists, from that which comes under our own eye in this city and neighbourhood, we should be very far indeed from supposing, like the writer of the foregoing statement, "that they are rather more moral, submissive, and inoffensive, than their neighbours; and also of a more sedate and stationary habit of life." In every point, the very reverse of this is the truth, except, perhaps, in the article of being submissive, in which so far as regards submission to their priests, we must yield to them the superiority. Candour, however, requires me to admit, that Glasgow does not afford a specimen, by which we can fairly judge of the morality of Papists in the southern part of the island, or even of the north. We have few, if any, of native growth. Where men are born, and grow up, and settle in life, there are certain ties of neighbourhood, and acquaintanceship, and friendship, which form a kind of check upon their conduct. No one can become notoriously wicked, without danger of being cast off by his more respectable neighbours, and of being obliged to leave the place. Perhaps not one in ten of our Popish population has this advantage of old local acquaintanceship. The increase of our manufactures, and the demand for labour in building, during the rapid enlargement of our city, attracted thousands from the sister island. These were generally of the poorest class, without the knowledge of any thing, beyond a few articles of their wretched superstition; who had the fewest inducements to remain at home, and who have the fewest motives to distinguish themselves by superior good conduct. By the influx of such, our poor's rates have been grievously augmented; and the morality of the lower orders, the very reverse of being improved.

No. CX.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 19TH, 1820.

REMARKING upon the statement in my last Number, relating to "English Catholics," and the allegation, that they are, in respect of morals, superior to their neighbours, I observed it was otherwise in this part of the kingdom; but I admitted that it was not quite fair to judge of the English stock, by the Irish sample which is exhibited to our view in this city and its neighbourhood. Where families have been long settled, and where circumstances are more favourable, we reasonably expect to find a more respectable body: but even, where circumstances are most favourable for insuring good conduct, and where the adherents of Rome have the advantage of good education, and of intercourse with enlightened society, I will not admit that they are more moral than Christians of any denomination whatever. It is customary to call those who have no religion at all, of the established religion, whatever it may be. Thus a great proportion of our population are called Protestants who have no right to the appellation; it is not even thought worth while to deny it to the most sensual and profligate part of the community, though heathens would be a more appropriate term; for they are idolaters in the grossest sense of the word—"whose god is their belly." It may be admitted, that the morality of Papists in England, like that of every other sect whose numbers are comparatively small, in the midst of an enlightened population, will be superior to that of persons whom no Christian sect would acknowledge. If we would make a fair estimate of the moral effects of the two systems, we must look at the mass of the people where each predominates; and, I am sure, Britain, with all its faults, will not shrink from a comparison with France or Italy, or any Popish country in the world:—not even with "Catholic Ireland," "the island of saints."

An inclination to magnify their numbers is a vice of which Papists are notoriously guilty. Thus a writer in Glasgow, who took the signature of Julius, and who writes very much like Amicus Veritatis, in a letter in the Orthodox Journal, for March last, made an indecent attack on Mr Cleland, for giving, as he said, an unfair statement of the number belonging to his communion in this city and suburbs. Mr Cleland published first the census of the city alone, in which he gave the number of "Roman Catholics," (for he was polite enough not to call them Papists,) at 3997. This was avowedly given as the number within the royalty only: but Julius published it as the number given for both city and suburbs; and triumphantly boasted, that instead of between 3 and 4000, there were near 15,000 Catholics in Glasgow and its vicinity. This was answered, in the Newspapers, by one of the Committee, under whose direction the census had been taken, who stated, that after the enumeration of the suburbs had been completed, the total number in both city and suburbs was found to be 8245. This was far from satisfying Julius; for he soon after published a letter in the Glasgow Courier, in which he asserted the number to be 20,000; and referred to the Rev. Mr Scott, by name, whom, he said, he had often heard, both in public and private, declare this to be the number; and, moreover, referred to lists of names in Mr Scott's possession, as a proof of the fact. The reverend gentleman, however, authorized the editor to contradict this assertion, which was done in the Courier, for May 11th, and to declare, that if ever he used the expression 20,000, in reference to persons of his communion, he must have included Lanarkshire, Renfrewshire, Dumbartonshire, Stirlingshire, and Linlithgowshire; and that the list of names in his possession, of persons belonging to all these counties, never exceeded from 2 to 3000. Julius was silent, for he had not the grace to acknowledge his error, though exposed by his own priest.

But, contrary to usual practice, the writer of the statement in my last Number, I think, estimates the number of his communion in England and Wales sufficiently low, in 1813, at 300,000; and as there were 900 chapels, there must have been an average of only 333 souls, or about 200 grown persons to each, according to Mr Cleland's Tables of the population here, which exhibit about one person under 12 years to every three and a fraction. There must, therefore, have been little occasion for building more chapels; and yet we know that several large ones have been built since the above date, among which are those in Glasgow, and Moorfields, London; which two would contain the 50th part of the adult Popish population of England and Wales, according to the above statement.

After all that I have written against the Church of Rome, I find there are but few of the children of that holy communion, who are willing to stand forward in her defence. If she were the only true church, or even the mother and mistress of all churches, for she gives herself out under both characters, it might be expected, that some of her beneficed and well qualified sons would endeavour to defend her from the attacks of an arch heretic of the nineteenth century. She is plainly and explicitly by him held up to the world as the mother of abominations; and yet her consecrated sons, who have the greatest interest in throwing a veil over her bloated countenance and in representing her as all fair, without one spot or blemish, are quietly sitting still, without so much as making an attempt to wipe off the stain that is every week thrown upon the character of their holy mother. A priest was once interrogated on this subject, and asked why he did not write an answer to THE PROTESTANT? he replied, with great humility, that he did not consider that gentleman (who has the misfortune to be only a layman), as his equal; and that, therefore, it would not be honourable in him to enter the lists with him; but, if any clergyman were to write against the "Catholic faith," he would perhaps write a reply. It so happened, that soon after, a minister of the established church preached in this city, and afterwards published, an admirable discourse, which struck at the very foundation of the Romish faith, by proving it to be the right and the duty of all to read the word of God. I refer to a sermon by the Rev. Dr Hodgson of Blantyre, of which the Popish priest did not think it becoming his rank or dignity, at least not convenient, to take any public notice. Now I do wish, with all my heart, that some of our clergymen would take up the controversy upon a broader scale; not because I wish to lay it down; but that our Popish priests might have no apology for their silence. They, it seems, in the true spirit of knight-errantry, will fight with none but knights like themselves. Forty years ago there was not a Protestant minister in Scotland, Episcopal or Presbyterian, whose heart was not interested in the subject, and who did not make it his business, by preaching or writing, or both, to expose to his people the wickedness of Popery and the danger that would attend its increase; but now, when Popery is making a more imposing appearance than it did forty years ago; and when nothing less will satisfy the subjects of the Pope, than admission into our houses of Parliament, and admissibility to the throne itself, most of our clergy show, by their silence, that they feel no great interest in the subject. This is not because they are more Popishly inclined than their predecessors. It is not because they are less hostile to what is idolatrous, and superstitious, and subversive of our civil and religious liberties. It is because they have a vague imagination that Popery is not so bad as it was; at least, that Papists are not such deceivers and persecutors as they were two hundred years ago. But let them expose the errors and the wickedness of Rome, as their fathers did; and if any Popish priest shall make a reply, they will find the very same spirit of lying, and misrepresentation, and the same persecuting malevolence, as were exhibited in the practice of Papists when they had power in their hands. Seeing the priests will not write against me, because I am not their equal, I must be content to contend with mere laymen like myself. I have a suspicion, indeed, that my Galloway "Friend to Fair Dealing" is a priest, though I am not certain of the fact; and therefore I am not entitled to boast of the honour of having a consecrated antagonist. My London lay opponent is disavowed by his own ghostly fathers, some of whom forbid their people to read his writings; because, to use a vulgar expression, he blabs out, from time to time, the real principles and the real spirit of Popery, in language too plain to be misunderstood; and thus makes disclosures which are extremely prejudicial to the cause of "emancipation." He has indeed written nothing against THE PROTESTANT since the month of December; and as I have promised him the honour of a chapter to himself, when I have done with every thing else, I must again pass him over, and attend to the communications of meaner men, of which I have received only two from popish correspondents since my last notice. The first is, verbatim et literatim, as follows:

I dare say the writer of the above learned epistle, has long ago concluded in his own mind, that I really was not able to answer it, seeing I have allowed nearly five months to elapse without taking any notice of it. He must have derived great pleasure from the idea of having written a letter which THE PROTESTANT could not answer; and as I have no wish to deprive him of the happiness which he enjoys, I shall leave it unanswered, and proceed to insert a letter from my old Edinburgh Correspondent, W. D. I give it also verbatim, but not literatim, as I do not choose to impose upon myself or my compositors the hardship of copying any more of such orthographical eccentricities. Justice, however, requires me to say, that W. D. is not quite so eccentric as the "liover of truth." From the rank which his letter will be esteemed to hold, as a literary composition, I might, perhaps, be excused from inserting it; but it is my wish to give my opponents every fair opportunity of being heard in their own defence, and therefore I insert it at length, though it contains a good deal of irrelevant matter, especially mutilated extracts from the writings of Luther, which have no relation to the present subjects of controversy.

LETTER II. TO THE PROTESTANT.

Edinburgh, 15th July, 1820.

SIR,—In writing a second epistle, I deem it reasonable to adopt a subject of some importance, in order, if possible, to throw some light upon a point which it appears you have treated with a good deal of abuse and falsehood, in that ever memorable work, entitled, THE PROTESTANT, in the LXXXVII. No. page 369. Speaking of the degrees of sin, we are led to believe that those very crimes, the thought of which ought to make a Christian shudder with horror, are only venial in the eyes of poor stupid Papists. After the seven deadly sins, comes the six sins against the Holy Ghost, to wit: despair of salvation—presumption of God's mercy—to impugn the known truth—envy at another's spiritual good—obstinacy in sin—final impenitence; after those, follow the four sins that cry to heaven for vengeance; these are, wilful murder—sin of Sodom—oppression of the poor—to defraud servants of their wages; these ten species of sin are, as I believe, greater sins than those which are denominated deadly sins; or to speak more proper, the six sins against the Holy Ghost are more heinous than the seven deadly sins, and the four sins which cry to heaven for vengeance, are more grievous than the other thirteen; but you have the kindness to tell us that they are only venial, because they are not classed along with the deadly sins: really, Sir, I believe you were the first man that ever discovered this mystery; yet suppose you made this foolish statement, I humbly trust that none of your readers will ever see these sins in the same light as you hold them forth. But this is only one statement which shows the venomous spirit with which you treat the Roman Catholic religion, out of thousands of other ridiculous nonsense with which you amuse your readers. Had I as much time and leisure, I would devote some of my very limited talents to show that you mistake Catholics as much as any reformer that went before you; nor can I say that you are excusable, because you have of late quoted some of the principal Catholic Works that are common among us; but miserable must the state of that religion be, that is obliged to throw out such abuse and slander, lies, and misrepresentations of every description, to keep its ground. But Papists need not be surprised at such dealing, for it seems to be a peculiar principle of all the reformers, together with their successors, since the beginning of Protestantism, to make use of the same kind of scurrilous abusive language; if such practice be a sin, I am afraid, Sir, that you will have a heavy account against you at the last day. You tell us plainly, that every sin deserves God's wrath and curse; pray Sir, what part of the Bible do you find this doctrine? Look your New Testament, Sir, and you will find there is a sin unto death, and a sin not unto death. If you would take the trouble of reading, with some attention, the 5th, the 7th, and 12th chapters of St Matthew's Gospel, you will find the degree of sin and the punishment due to them, laid down very plainly. By your late exposition of the doctrine of sin and transubstantiation, I am inclined to think that you have studied the Scriptures much the same as the renowned Martin Luther. I shall give you a few of his words concerning the interpretation of the Scripture:—"If," says the Reverend Doctor, "If God foresaw that Judas would be a traitor, Judas of necessity became a traitor, neither was it in the power of Judas, or of any other man, to do otherwise, or to change his will." De Servo Arb. tom. 2. fol. 460. 2.—"This is the highest degree of faith, to believe God to be just, though by his own will he lays us under the necessity of being damned, and in such a manner too, as if he took delight in tormenting the miserable," fol. 434. 1.—"Man's will is in the nature of a horse, if God sits upon it, it tends and goes as God would have it go; if the devil rides it, it tends and goes as the devil would have it; nor can it choose which of the riders it will run to, or seek, but the riders themselves strive who shall gain and possess it." De Servo Arb. tom. 2. fol. 342. 2.—"A person that is baptized cannot, though he would, lose his salvation by any sins how grievous soever, unless he refuses to believe. For no sin can damn him but unbelief alone." Cap. Bap. Tom. 2. fol. 74. 1.—"Let this be your rule, where the Scripture commands the doing a good work, understand it in this sense, that it forbids thee to do a good work because thou canst not do it." Tom. 3. fol. 171. 2.—This is no doubt a most excellent rule to interpret the sacred Scriptures, and I suppose Dr Martin was the first inventor of it. You seem to think by a letter you got from a "Friend to Fair-dealing," and Mr Andrews likewise, and all others, I suppose, that has said any thing against your own opinion, wishes to divert you off your plan, and turn your attention to something else, for THE PROTESTANT has a plan laid down which he intends to follow without interruption; pray Sir, when did you form this plan? At the beginning of your publication you promised to follow them (the Papists) through all their windings and turnings, but lo! when THE VINDICATOR came forth, behold THE PROTESTANT has got a plan which he must follow; for my own part, and I dare say I may say in the name of others, I would not wish, by any means, to take you off your plan; take up any point of Catholic faith, and I shall be ready to contest it with you to the last, if you keep within the bounds of reason. I am really surprised, Sir, that you would make use of such fabulous nonsensical stories as you generally do. Only look back to the beginning of the subject of Purgatory, and look at the fable about Purgatory Bridge being broken; really, Sir, if this story be true, I am very sorry for it, and as I am informed that you are a man of charity, I trust you will contribute your mite to have the bridge repaired again; or if it were rather dear, perhaps a good steam boat would answer the purpose equally well, if the renowned Wallace or the celebrated Rob Roy could be conveyed over, it would be doing a good and charitable turn for poor papists, to get them over dry shod; perhaps you will think my remark foolish, but truly, I can think of none better to answer the admirable statement. Now, Sir, I wish to have an earnest word with you, and then I will close; in your remarks upon my last letter, you mentioned so far, as that you "expected some good of this person," (myself). I most cordially thank you Sir, and I hope you will not be disappointed; but you have not as yet brought me sufficient proof, that the Church of Rome was guilty of all these bloody tricks of which you accuse her; nor have you ever told me who invented the doctrines she holds, or when she ceased from being true and genuine; this, Sir, I am afraid you cannot answer; you seem to question, if ever I saw the writings of the fathers which I quoted in my last, or if I could even read them; indeed, Sir, I never did see their writings, and I am sure I could not read them, although I did see them, and I question if you could read them either, that is to say, the manuscripts which they wrote with their own hands; I might question you the same, when you quote the Bible or the Ten Commandments, I might ask if you ever saw the parchment upon which the Prophets and Patriarchs wrote them, and even suppose you saw them, how could you demonstrate that they wrote them? You believe the Ten Commandments to be given to Moses upon two tables of stone by Almighty God himself, but did you ever see these tables, or did you see God write them? I suppose not, but tell me, are they less true, suppose you nor I never saw them; I have seen what is said to be wrote by them, in print, and I believe any thing of that kind when I have good authority for it: but yet I do not put any writings whatever on a level with the Bible, I believe every word of it, from the first of Genesis to the end of the Revelations, to be the infallible word of God; you was good enough to give me your good advice to return to the Church of Scotland; but why to the Church of Scotland more than any other? More than the church to which you belong yourself? If you be in the right, the Church of Scotland must be wrong, for if there be a word of truth in the Holy Scriptures, there can only be one true church on earth among the thousands that are spread among us; for it is merely impossible that Almighty God should reveal one religion to one people, and a contrary one to another: that is a mystery I shall never be able to swallow, suppose I hear it very often from men of good education, and even from the pulpits. I hope, Sir, if you give any notice to what I have said, that you will be so good as to give me your advice which church to adopt as my guide, in which I am to serve my Maker here on earth, as the most certain foundation, and likewise your reasons for advising me to follow one more than another. It appears that you discovered in my last, that I did not possess a quiet conscience in the Church of Rome; I cannot understand how you could discover this to be the case, for I only said, that "if you can prove the Church of Rome to be in an error in any one point of faith, I shall leave her as soon as I see any proof," and you may rely upon it I shall keep my word, but I cannot say that I have seen that proof as yet, nor do I expect to see it, but if I shall, I will keep my promise good. I presume that I discovered an error in one of your numbers sometime ago, in giving us some of the regulations of a certain Society in Ireland, about praying for the dead; there was a passage quoted from St John, which I suppose was misquoted by the composers of the Rules, it was as follows:— "let us not love in word nor in tongue, but in deed and in truth;" these words was not given from the right chapter and verse, indeed, but you made a note in the margin to contradict this passage, saying, "in vain shall the reader look for such a passage in the common English Bible," look your New Testament, Sir, which is of equal authority, and you will find it in the 3d chapter, and 18th verse, of the first Epistle of St John the Divine. If you publish this letter, I wish to correct a word which was wrong in my last, speaking of predestination in the 70th No. of PROT. instead of "why are we in the esteem," read "why are we denied the esteem." I am sorry want of room prevents me from saying any more at present.—Farewell. WM. D.

No. CXI.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 26TH, 1820.

I HAD not room, in the last Number, for any remarks on the communication of W. D.; but, in the present, I hope to be able to answer every thing that requires particular notice. Though he be only a recent convert from the Church of Scotland, as he told us in his former letter, he can misquote and misrepresent as expertly as if he had been born a Papist. In my 80th Number, page 344, I inserted a Popish advertisement, with this motto, "Let us love not in word or in tongue, but in deed and in truth, 1 John 10 ch. 18 v." and inserted as a note, "The reader will look in vain for such a chapter and verse in the common English Bible;" that is, he will look in vain for the 18th verse of the 10th chapter of 1 John. But W. D. gives as my words, "in vain shall we look for such a passage in the common English Bible." He says, I "made a note in the margin to contradict this passage;" and he gravely tells me where to find it, supposing I did not know that there were such words in the New Testament. Now I appeal to W. D. himself, whether this be not barefaced imposition? and if he has the effrontery to misquote my own words to my own face, what dependence can we have upon the accuracy of his quotations from so scarce a book as the works of Luther? This book, I am persuaded, he never saw. The few extracts which he gives must have been taken from some Popish writer, who had taken them from some other, so that they may have come through twenty hands since they were taken from the original; and no dependence can be placed upon the veracity of any one of the reporters. In my 2d Number I showed how Amicus Veritatis had garbled the words of the same Reformer, so as completely to misrepresent his meaning; and I have since found, that what Amicus Veritatis gave as a discovery of his own, was a mere copy from other books. His very words are to be found in a book published in England, about ten years ago;* and I find the very same misquotation of Luther's words in a book published in the reign of James I. Yes, the very "adveniat ancilla," with a period instead of a comma, and the entire omission of that part of the sentence which explains the author's meaning, may be seen not only in the above modern publication, but also in the work of one Francis Walsingham, printed 1609, in which the garbled half sentence is given in English, as the entire and fully expressed doctrine of the Reformer. Perhaps fifty later Popish authors have taken it upon the authority of the said Walsingham; and so the lie has passed from one to another, till it fell to the lot of THE PROTESTANT to detect it, by reference to the authentic publication of Luther, in the library of our University. The same detection may, indeed, have been made by other authors whose writings I have not seen.

But we need not be surprised that such writers as W. D. should misquote and misrepresent the words of other people, for he actually does the same injustice to his own, in order that he may disengage himself from a dilemma into which he had fallen, by an expression in his former letter. He says, at the conclusion of his second:—"It appears that you discovered, in my last, that I did not possess a quiet conscience in the Church of Rome. I cannot understand how you could discover this to be the case, for I only said, if you can prove the Church of Rome to be in error in any point, I shall leave her as soon as I see any proof."—Here he breaks off in the middle of a sentence of his own, and leaves out that part of it on which my remark was founded, which was this:—"for I am but a late convert from the Church of Scotland, in which I was educated from my youth, and if I thought it possible to obtain salvation in any other, (i. e. than the Church of Rome) I would not be another day in her communion," &c. It was upon his words, which I have here printed in Italics, that I founded the remark, that W. D. was heartily tired of the communion of his church, seeing he would not remain in her another day, if it were possible to obtain salvation in any other. If any man were to say, I would not lodge another day in this house, if it were possible to obtain another to accommodate my family, who would not infer that he was heartily tired of his present residence?

There are several things in my correspondent's letter too trifling to require an answer; such as, when did I form the plan of my Work? It is of more importance to attend to his promise; or what, perhaps, he means as a threat, in these words, "Take up any point of Catholic faith, and I shall be ready to contest it with you to the last, if you keep within the bounds of reason." Now I must give my correspondent a piece of information which will surprise him:—It never was my intention to contest with him, or any body else, any point of "catholic faith;" that is, any doctrine which the universal church of Christ,—the whole body of real Christians, in all ages, have derived from the word of God. This is what is properly called catholic faith; and so far from contesting, it is my purpose to maintain it to the last. It requires no small degree of effrontery in the vassals of Rome, to call themselves Catholics, and their sect the Catholic Church: yet, through mere indifference, this has been conceded to them by most Protestants, in writing and conversation, for half a century. This has given them a vast advantage in their endeavours to corrupt ignorant persons, with whom names have often more weight than things. It is one of their tricks to turn up what is called the Apostles' Creed, which is acknowledged to be a composition of great antiquity, to quote the words, "holy catholic church," in which Protestants profess to believe; and triumphantly to appeal to the language of our own profession, as an admission that the Church of Rome is the true Church. Ignorant people, who never hear the word catholic applied to any church but that of Rome, are very apt to stumble and be deceived by this inconsistency in the language of Protestants, and the advantage which Papists take of it. I hope this most teazing and tormenting work of mine, to give it no worse name, will have this among other important effects, to restore the legitimate word Papist to its place in our vocabulary. It was used by Popish writers themselves, without scruple, a hundred and fifty years ago; and it would be so still, if they did not wish to conceal from Protestants the real nature of their dependence upon the Pope.

I am aware, however, that W. D. means the faith of Rome; but then, what becomes of his promise, or threat, to contest every point with me? He speaks as if I had not yet entered upon the controversy; as if he were waiting till I should begin, that he might begin his defence. Now he certainly knows, that I have taken up, and at least endeavoured to refute, many a point of Romish faith. Under the heads of Transubstantiation, and Purgatory, the Supremacy of Peter, and of the Pope, &c. &c. I have endeavoured to expose some fundamental articles of the faith of Rome, as no better than the invention of the devil. Why is it that he has not entered upon the contest, as he says he is ready to do? He makes a condition, indeed, by which, perhaps, he will justify himself; that is, if I "keep within the bounds of reason;" but he must prove that I have exceeded these bounds, before he can lawfully declare off. This he has not done, nor even attempted to do. I insist, therefore, upon his fulfilling his engagement, to "contest every point with me to the last;" and he must do something more than merely assert that I misrepresent the faith of his church; and that misrepresenting has been the practice of all the Reformers. I know that it has been the practice of all Papists to say so; but if it really were so, nothing could be easier than to prove it. It is sometimes difficult to expose a quibble or a sophism, in intelligible language; but a misrepresentation may be exposed in a moment, by any person who understands the subject of it. If, for instance, it were a misrepresentation to say that a Papist worships, as his God, that which his eyes and other senses tell him is but a piece of bread, in the form of a wafer, it could instantly be corrected by giving the real doctrine of the church as laid down by her authorized standards; and so with regard to any other point: but neither W. D. nor any other writer has yet shown, by a single example, that I have so misrepresented the faith of Rome. I hold it then as good as admitted that I have given a true representation of it.

He objects to my statement and remarks upon the different degrees of sin, as taught in the Douay Catechism; but does little more than state an objection. He adduces neither argument nor fact to prove that I had mistaken the meaning of the Catechism, in which we have a list of seven sins which are called deadly, and two classes of other sins which are distinguished from those that are deadly. What could I infer from this, but that those which are distinguished from deadly sins are not deadly ones? W. D. tells me that it is not so understood by him and his brethren; but then I must tell him that he does not understand the meaning of words. I might as well say that when Papists are spoken of as distinguished from Protestants, it is not understood that the one class of persons is different from the other. He tells us, indeed, that the sins which are distinguished from the deadly, are more heinous and more grievous than the deadly ones. I did not know before that there was any thing worse than deadly; any thing beyond the eternal death which sin deserves. I have seen no such doctrine in any of the authorized standards of his Church; and must suppose it is merely a private opinion of W. D., which is of no authority whatever.

I do certainly maintain that every sin is deadly in its own nature, and by the righteous judgment of God. The smallest deviation from the divine law is disobedience as really as the greatest. Yet I believe there is no sin so deadly as that the mercy of God cannot pardon it, or that the blood of Christ cannot cleanse from it. Without pretending to speak peremptorily on a difficult subject, I am inclined to think, that our Lord's words, with regard to the sin against the Holy Ghost, had a special reference to the malignant rejection of the Saviour, by the Jews, after they had seen his miracles, and witnessed the effects of the descent of the Holy Spirit after his resurrection. Be this as it may, we are warranted from the whole tenor of the gospel to say, that no sin which any man has committed shall not be forgiven, if he shall come to Christ for forgiveness. Final impenitence is a deadly sin, in every sense of the expression, though the Church of Rome has not put it into that list; for he that is guilty of it, shuts himself up, absolutely and for ever, out of the reach of mercy. W. D. cites the words of the apostle John, (1 Epist. v. 17,) "There is a sin unto death, and a sin not unto death," to defend the Popish distinction between venial and mortal sins. If the apostle had said there is a sin that does not deserve death, or is not in its nature deadly, he would have given countenance to the Popish doctrine; but this was impossible, for it would have been contrary to the whole tenor of the word of God, which cannot contradict itself. What the apostle says, is true of every sin for which a sinner obtains repentance,—it is not unto death; but sin unrepented of, is unto death; and as such, is not to be prayed for, according to the words of the same apostle, in the immediately preceding verse. Final impenitence, or impenitence to death, is, I suppose, the only thing which fellow-creatures are warranted to call sin unto death: and the apostle's injunction not to pray for it, is a strong testimony against the Popish doctrine of purgatory and prayers for the dead, which perhaps he may have had in his eye, for that was one of the errors that appeared in the church at a very early period. Though impenitence, in the case of any individual, should not be final, it effectually bars forgiveness while it continues; and we have no warrant to pray for the pardon of the sins of an unbeliever, or impenitent person, but in the way of his being first brought to faith and repentance. I hope W. D. will not take it amiss, that I recommend to him the serious consideration of these things. He may rest assured that he is more likely to profit by the contemplation of every sin, as deserving God's wrath and curse, than by endeavouring to impose upon the words of an inspired apostle a meaning that would countenance the error, that some sins are so trifling as not to deserve punishment in the next, as well as in the present world.

I advised W. D. to return to the Church of Scotland, because, by his own account, he had left it under an erroneous impression of the doctrine held by that Church. I did not hold up the Church of Scotland as the only true church, or as the best of all possible churches, as Papists foolishly hold up theirs; but I maintain it as a principle of equity and common sense, that if a man leaves any church from a mistake with regard to any of its principles, he ought to return and confess his mistake, as soon as it is pointed out to him, unless he had found a better, which, it is very evident W. D. has not done.

My correspondent, by an indefinite use of the word church, bewilders himself, as all other Papists do. They hold it as a first principle, that the universal church of Christ is a visible organized body; and that it must be under one visible head, such as the Pope. But nothing can be more unlike the pattern exhibited in the New Testament. When apostles speak of the church of Christ, in the singular number, they mean the whole company of believers, gathered together as one body in Christ, who is their only Head, Lord, and Lawgiver. In this sense, I admit that there can be only one true church; but then it is not a church exclusively on the earth; the greater part of it is in heaven. When the word church is used in reference to the associations of Christians in this world, so far from its being true that there can be only one true church on earth, there may be a thousand of them,—all true churches, and all living by faith in their divine Head, as separate members, but all belonging to the general body, and united to him of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named. Thus we read, in the New Testament, of the church in Jerusalem, the church in Antioch, the seven churches in Asia, and the churches in Galatia, of which the number is not mentioned. It never occurred to inspired writers, when speaking of organized bodies of Christians, that there was only one true church in the world. This folly was reserved for the Pope of Rome and his blinded adherents in later times; and it is worthy of remark, that the apostle Paul, when addressing the Christians in Rome, does not call them a church. Addressing those in Corinth, once and again, he speaks to them in their collective capacity, as "the church of God which is at Corinth." In like manner, several other churches are addressed; but his epistle to the Romans is addressed "to all that be in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints," (chap. i. v. 7,) as if they had been so many unconnected individuals; and then, from the 16th chapter, we are led to infer that there were at least three churches in that city. In v. 3—5, speaking of Priscilla and Aquila, it is said, there was a church in their house. In the 14th verse salutations are sent to Asyncritus, and others, "and the brethren which are with them;" and in the 15th verse, Philologus, and two or three more are mentioned, "and all the saints which are with them." These small bodies of Christians, meeting in different places, perhaps compelled to meet in private houses, not being allowed greater publicity, would no doubt have a bond of union among themselves, so as to acknowledge, and have fellowship with one another, as they had opportunity; but it is a fact, that they are nowhere in Scripture called the Church of Rome. Yet, without the shadow of a foundation in the New Testament, a monster has arisen under this title, boasting itself to be the only true church on earth, and the mother and mistress of all churches.

If I could get my correspondent to understand what a visible organized church is, he would see that it does not necessarily follow, from the circumstance of one church being right, that another must be wrong. Every church is in the right that holds the faith once delivered to the saints; and every church is wrong that corrupts or denies this faith, of which the church of Rome has been notoriously, and above all others, guilty, for fifteen hundred years: and as for differences in government, discipline, and forms of worship among Protestant churches, though it would be foolish to say they are all alike agreeable to the word of God, yet the difference between the most opposite extremes is not equal in importance to many doctrinal differences in the Church of Rome. I admit, that it is "impossible that God should reveal one religion to one people, and a contrary one to another;" and when W. D. says that he hears this "very often from men of good education, and even from the pulpits," I must tell him, in plain English, that I do not believe it. Unless he is content to sit down under the odious imputation which this implies, he will tell me from what pulpits he heard such a sentiment expressed, and who were the speakers.

Though there is much to be deplored in the divisions which exist among Protestants, their separation into different communions is a proof of their honesty and sincerity; but the pretended union of doctrine in the Church of Rome proves her insincerity and falsehood. The former are so ingenuous and candid, that they cannot profess to be all of one mind, when they are not; hence their separation into different communities, each holding what they understand and believe to be the truth; in general, agreeing in the profession of those fundamental truths by which sinners are saved, and therefore acknowledged by one another as true churches; and differing chiefly with regard to government and modes of worship, which do not so affect the vitals of Christianity as to justify the members of one communion in withholding the appellation of Christian from another.

The Dominicans and Franciscans, the Jansenists and the Jesuits, and many others, were as directly opposed to one another, as any Protestant sects can possibly be, not on matters of form and discipline merely, but upon the most fundamental points of doctrine; yet the holy and infallible "Head of Catholic Unity" acknowledged them all as branches of his family, and bestowed upon them extensive privileges. The Franciscans stoutly maintained that the Virgin Mary was born immaculate, while the Dominicans asserted that she came into the world under original sin, though its effects were soon removed. Thus the two great parties were not agreed about the original character of one principal object of their worship; and by their quarrel, the peace of Europe was disturbed for many a day. In later times the Jesuits and the Dominicans had a furious contest, on the subjects of fate and free will; the latter "contending as stoutly, and at as great length in favour of God's eternal unconditional decrees, and the absence of all moral ability on the part of man, as the rankest predestinarian, at whose heresy" W. D. and other modern Papists "affect to sneer." Other subjects of dispute between the Jesuits and other orders were, "the extent of the jurisdiction and power of the Pope,—the Jesuits maintaining his infallibility, the others opposing it; the extent and prerogatives of the Church; the natural powers of man, and God's eternal decrees; the nature, efficacy, and necessity of divine grace; the doctrines of morality, and rules of practice," &c. See a well written pamphlet, just published, at Cork, entitled, Six Letters to the Right Honourable Charles Grant, &c. By SIMPLICIUS.

"Before I conclude," says this able writer, "this notice of the parties which have met and fought in the very bosom of that Church which alone possesses unity, I would slightly allude to the Jansenists, the most upright and useful body of its day as connected with Rome. Their contentions with the Jesuits, on the old topic of grace and free will, continued from 1642 to 1705. The press aided both parties, producing at one time, "The torch of St Augustine," and at another, "Snuffers for St Augustine's torch," and finally, "A gag for the Jansenists;" which gag, through the Jesuitical influence at Rome, was so effectually applied by the bull "unigenitus," as to effect the demolition of the most pure and practical body of Christians (notwithstanding some superstitions) that belonged to the Church of Rome, since it became Papal."

So much for the unity of the holy and infallible church. Different sects within its bosom teach the most opposite doctrines; and they hate one another with a perfect hatred. Nothing can exceed the abhorrence with which the Jesuits speak of Jansenists, to this very day, of which see an example in the Orthodox Journal for July, 1820. The Editor takes the part of the Jesuits; the more moderate and respectable of his brethren in England he calls Jansenists, and as such he abuses them, as if they were no better than the most detestable heretics.

No. CXII.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 2D, 1820.

NOT being able to finish my remarks on W. D.'s letter in my last Number, I am obliged to continue the subject in the present one. The reader will have seen that my correspondent charges me pretty freely with lying, slander, and misrepresentation; and he thinks the Protestant religion must be in a miserable state, seeing its advocates have recourse to such means of defence. If it were worth while to retort upon this writer, it would be easy to show, that the accusations which he brings against Protestants, and against THE PROTESTANT in particular, more truly belong to himself and to his sect. In the very letter on which I am remarking, he misquotes my words, misrepresents my meaning, and falsely asserts that I had written a note to contradict a passage in the New Testament. (See the latter part of his letter, No. 110, and the first paragraph of No. 111.) This is a glaring instance of his being guilty of the very thing of which he accuses me; but he has not pointed out a single instance of the kind on my part. He admits that I have of late "quoted some of the principal Catholic works that are common among" them; but he does not say that I have misquoted a single word, or misrepresented the meaning of a single sentence. In his charges of slander, lying, and misrepresentation, he fixes upon nothing definite; he adduces no instance to support his general accusation, unless it be the story of purgatory bridge, which he calls a fable, as it really is, but I did not give it as a fact, but as a fable of priestly invention; and many such lies the priests have invented in order to raise money. The story of the bridge is not more absurd and ridiculous than the fable of purgatory itself, which, no doubt, W. D. believes with all his heart; and doing this, he ought to have no difficulty in swallowing the story of the bridge.

I cannot but reflect with great satisfaction on such a communication from such a correspondent. He has been searching every one of the preceding pages, with the eye and the mind of an adversary, in order to find something against me, and he has discovered nothing that he can refer to, as an example of departure from the straight rule of truth and sincerity; and therefore he has recourse to a mere general charge of the venomous spirit with which I treat his religion, and the thousands of other ridiculous nonsense with which I amuse my readers. I could desire no greater testimony in my favour, than the silence of an adversary as to any specific charge, while his hostility leads him to deal in general and undefined accusations.

He has read many a plain and scriptural exposure of the errors of his church, on the subjects of transubstantiation, sacrifice of the mass, auricular confession, purgatory, &c., and to all this he does not reply a single word. His holy mother must sit down under all the accusations which I have brought against her; and he has nothing to say in her behalf; except to assail her antagonist with scolding and hard words; and to assert that he has not yet seen any proof that she is in error in any one point of faith. It would have been more to the purpose, had he attempted to show that the things which I have exposed are not errors, but truths founded upon the divine word.

This he has not thought proper to do; and it may be presumed, that few beside himself will be satisfied with his bare assertion, that he has not yet seen what any man who does not shut his eyes may see.

W. D. seems, at first view, to be in earnest when he requests my advice, which church to adopt as his guide, in which he may serve his Maker here on earth, as the most certain foundation, and likewise my reasons for advising him to follow one more than another. I have already advised him to return to the Church of Scotland, and have given my reason for doing so; but it seems very evident from the tenor of his letter, that he does not really want any advice on the subject. He has made up his mind already. He not only has not seen any proof that his church is in error, but he tells us plainly that he does not expect to see it. He has shut his eyes, and he is determined to keep them shut. He has adopted that fundamental principle of Popery, "I believe as the church believes." This leaves no room for inquiry, or the exercise of private judgment. W. D. therefore, cannot be really in earnest in asking advice what church to adopt as his guide, seeing he has already adopted an infallible one. But he would gladly get me to engage in a discussion of the merits and demerits of different Protestant churches; and thus draw me away from the weekly exposure of the deformity of that of Rome, which it appears he can neither defend nor conceal. He has thrown out a bait, once and again, to hook me away from my purpose. In his first letter, by an attack upon the Shorter Catechism; and in his second, by extracts, real or pretended, from the works of Luther, he throws out a sort of challenge to engage in a discussion of the doctrine of the divine decrees, which I am sure is beyond both his depth and mine; and is, I suppose, chosen by him on this very account, knowing that if we were to begin, we would "find no end, in wandering mazes lost."

But whether he be really desirous of advice or not, I shall take the liberty of telling him, and my other readers of his communion, that they ought not to adopt any church as their guide. Every Christian church itself is subject to a guide that is above it. This is the word of God contained in the Holy Scriptures, which is the only infallible guide of churches collectively, and of Christians individually; and I request them to consider farther, that it will be of little avail for persons to belong to any church, unless they belong to the Saviour, and be united to him as his members, which is the blessed condition of all who believe his gospel and submit to his authority, and of no others, though they should belong to the purest church in the world. To belong to Christ, in the sense of being his members, it is necessary to accept of salvation, as the gift of free grace, upon the footing of his righteousness alone, to the entire exclusion of self-righteousness, as well as the merits of any saint, or of all the saints put together. To belong to Christ, it is also necessary to be born again by the influence of the Holy Spirit, to become a new creature, and to live a new life; that is, a life of devotion and obedience to the will of God.

To such submission to the righteousness of God, and such obedience to the will of God, the principal Protestant churches present no obstruction; at least, nothing to hinder any individual from living by faith in Christ alone as his Saviour and Intercessor, and from practising all the duties of a holy life. Some churches may afford greater helps than others for promoting a life of faith and obedience; but I know of none that holds the true Protestant faith, in which a Christian would be authoritatively prevented from living the life of a Christian. But it is otherwise in the Church of Rome. The errors which she teaches by authority, strike at the root of the true faith and of holy practice. It is impossible for a member of this church to profess the faith of the gospel in its divine simplicity and purity, without incurring the punishment of heresy. Yet to profess the faith of Christ, is as really a duty binding upon a Christian as to believe in him. "As with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, so with the mouth confession is made to salvation," Rom. x. 10. Now suppose a member of the Church of Rome to confess Christ, and say that he trusts in him alone for salvation from first to last, without regard to his own works and deservings; that he has not, and never has had any merit to plead in the sight of God; and that all the merit of the saints in heaven could not serve the purpose of his salvation, or contribute to it in the smallest degree, he would be in danger, if within reach of the Inquisition, of being burnt to death for his heresy. Thus the very first principle of the Christian life meets with positive, powerful obstruction in the Church of Rome; and the confession of the truth, which is the first duty of one who believes it, is authoritatively interdicted.

Should a man set his heart to worship God alone, in the name of the one Mediator, he would meet with a thousand obstacles in the Church of Rome. The priests would be incessantly thrusting themselves between him and the object of his worship, and diverting his mind from every devout contemplation. Should he express gratitude to God for the sanctifying grace of the Holy Spirit, the priest would command him to think of the virtues of his holy water. Should he confide in the intercession of Christ in heaven, as sufficient to maintain his cause before God, the priest would command him, under pain of anathema, to apply to the Virgin Mary, and fifty other intercessors, before he should venture to go to the Saviour himself. Should he express humble confidence in approaching the throne of divine mercy, with confession of his sins, and the hope of forgiveness, the priest would let him know, that he must confess his sins to him, and look to him for absolution. Should he endeavour to regulate his life according to the precepts of the divine law, his ghostly guide would enjoin upon him a course of austerities, and pilgrimages, and fastings, on certain days of the week, and at certain times of the year, for which there is no precept in the word of God, but attention to which would effectually divert his mind from the divine commandments. And if he should think of worshipping God as a Spirit, in spirit and in truth, he would be distracted by the exhibition of images of Christ, and of the Virgin Mary, and other saints, presented as helps to his devotion, though he knew them to be no better than vain idols.

I shall make one other supposition, which might be realized at any time in the Church of Rome. Suppose one of her members, deeply affected by Christ's sufferings and death, and professing to view this as a complete atonement for sin, should express his gratitude to God for this all-perfect sacrifice, and his confidence in that Saviour, whom the heavens have received, whom therefore he does not see with his bodily eyes, or expect ever to see in this world, agreeably to the words of the apostle Peter, "whom having not seen ye love, in whom though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory;"—suppose, I say, one making these professions, and about to express his gratitude to God accordingly, a priest steps forward, and tells him that there was nothing particular in the sufferings and death of Christ, but what he exhibits every day in the sacrifice of the mass; and that he is mistaken in supposing that Christ is not now to be seen in this world, for he takes out of a box a consecrated wafer, and assures him that that is the very Christ that was born of the Virgin, that was crucified, rose from the dead, and sat down at the right hand of God. Who, on receiving such information from his priest, whom he is taught to consider his divinely-appointed instructor in the faith, would not feel his devotion effectually marred, by such a representation of Christ and his atoning sacrifice? Yet, without the least exaggeration, this is the true import of what the Church of Rome teaches; and a genuine Papist will give up every article of divine revelation, sooner than he will part with the dogma, that the consecrated wafer is the real body and blood, soul and divinity of Jesus Christ; and that the mass is a real propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead. Where this is constantly maintained, as it is in the Church of Rome, there must be an insurmountable obstacle to every act of divine worship, that can be called a reasonable service.

W. D. expresses a wish to be informed in what church he may serve his Maker here on earth, as the most certain foundation. From what I have said above, I hope every enlightened reader will perceive, whether W. D. does so or not, that he cannot serve his Maker in the Church of Rome; that supposing him to receive the truth of the gospel in purity, he would not be permitted to honour his Maker by publicly professing it; because that church has authoritatively condemned the gospel of the grace of God, which brings salvation to the guilty, solely upon the footing of Christ's perfect obedience and atoning sacrifice; has set up the merits of saints and the mass sacrifice to be trusted in; has commanded all her members, under pain of anathema, to regard the mass as the very sacrifice of Christ, and to believe that the bread and wine in the mass are the very Christ himself, and to worship them as such. Obedience to the Church of Rome, in this article alone, is absolutely incompatible with that undivided worship which the Almighty claims for himself, and with that trust in Christ alone for salvation, without which no sinner can serve his Maker here on earth, or hope for happiness in the world to come. Whether, therefore, other churches serve God or not, I tell my correspondent plainly, it is impossible for him to serve his Maker in the Church of Rome, without renouncing her fundamental doctrines, which would virtually be renouncing the church, and becoming Protestant.

The sum of the matter is this:—The Church of Rome establishes iniquity by law. She makes it imperative upon her members to believe error and to practise idolatry. To obey her is to disobey God. Protestant churches condemn such blasphemous tenets, and such idolatrous practices. They make it imperative upon no man to believe error, or to worship a creature, but recommend the word of God to all. In them, therefore, men may serve their Maker; in the Church of Rome they cannot. I shall be told again, that Papists disavow all idolatry, and that they curse all idol worshippers; but they do not deny the fact, that they render divine worship to the consecrated host, which every man who trusts his senses knows to be nothing but a bit of bread. I must therefore repeat my reply to the often repeated disavowal; if this be not idolatry, there never was such a thing in the world, and the words "idol worshipper" have no meaning.

I am afraid my readers will think I have wasted more time and paper in my reply to W. D. than his letter is entitled to; and indeed I have gone beyond what I at first intended; but as it is my wish to meet fully and fairly every objection to the Protestant religion that is of any importance, or that has a plausible appearance, I could not avoid going into detail upon some points on which Papists lay great stress, and by which they attempt to justify their obstinate adherence to such an antichristian communion. In order to set the matter as broadly before their eyes as possible, I have made some repetitions, which the intelligent reader will excuse, for the sake of those who require line upon line.

I shall conclude the present Number with an extract from the Life of our countryman, Mr Craig, who was some time colleague of John Knox in the ministry, in Edinburgh, which will illustrate what I have said in this Number with regard to the impossibility of making a profession of the truth, and serving God in the Church of Rome. I quote from the Christian Instructor, for July 1811.

"Mr Craig, in early life, had some scruples about certain articles of the Romish faith, which made him suspected of heresy; but these were removed by conversation with the famous Cardinal Pole, who was one of the most popular Romish ecclesiastics of the day. Mr Craig, captivated by his affability, and admiring him for his learning and good moral conduct, so entirely yielded himself to his arguments and instructions, that he became, in his own opinion, and in the opinion of all others, a confirmed Papist. He was a friar of the order of St Dominick. He was recommended by the Cardinal to the convent of that order in Bononia (now Bologne), where he so distinguished himself, that he was appointed Rector of the Great School in that city, by which he became connected with the University, which was then one of the most considerable in Europe.

"Being one day, in the year 1557, turning over some books in the library of the Inquisition, he observed amongst them a copy of Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion. He never had read that book, though the first edition of it was printed in the year 1536. Perhaps he had hitherto been afraid to read it, lest it should revive in his mind those scruples from which he had been relieved by Cardinal Pole. But his curiosity now prompted him to look into it, perhaps thinking that he was so well established in the Popish religion, as to be secure against any change. He first noticed that the diction was elegant Latin. This attracted him to read some parts, and these he found so interesting, that he resolved to take home the book, and to give the whole of it a serious perusal. Every paragraph, as he went on in his reading, and compared it with the sacred Scriptures, flashed conviction on his mind. He beheld the errors of the Church of Rome exposed, and the sure grounds pointed out, on which the doctrines of the Reformers were founded. It is sufficient to say, that, by the time he had finished his serious reading, he was become, through the blessing of God, a sincere and well-enlightened convert from Popery.

"But he was presently at a loss how to regulate his after-conduct, so as to satisfy his conscience on the one hand, and on the other to avoid the danger of persecution. He knew no Protestant in Bononia to whom he could open his mind. But there was an old friar, with whom he had loved to converse, and who was greatly respected for his sanctity, and his humble behaviour. In this good man, he thought he could place some confidence. He therefore engaged him in a long and serious conversation, in the course of which the doctrines of the Reformers were mentioned. But Mr Craig spoke of them so favourably, and with so much feeling, that the friar immediately suspected he had changed his principles, and charged him with it. He could not deny the charge; and then, to his utter astonishment, the friar, instead of upbraiding him, said, 'Brother, it is now many years since I embraced these opinions, but I have kept the belief of them secret in my own breast; and my advice to you is to do the same, for you know that the times are perilous.' If Mr Craig had followed the advice given him by the old man, he would have avoided the persecution which he afterwards met with. But he was a sincere and zealous convert, and felt a strong desire that others should be brought, as he had been, to the knowledge of the truth.

"Mr Row, in his manuscript history, which was written a long time before the publication of Spottiswood's History, tells us, that the following words of our blessed Saviour were powerful in Mr Craig's mind, (Mat. x. 32, 33.) 'Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I also confess before my Father who is in heaven; and whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father who is in heaven.' He understood these words in a more extensive meaning than the friar seems to have done. He considered them as connected with a similar declaration, (Mark viii. 38.) 'Whoever shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of Man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father, with the holy angels.' He therefore thought himself bound, not only to profess himself a Christian in general, but also, to whatever danger he might thereby be exposed, explicitly to confess, and to assert in his character of a public teacher, every doctrine and precept which he believed to be contained in the gospel of our Saviour. He urged his new principles in his conferences with the friars, and seems also to have stated them favourably in his sermons. The Romish zealots in the convent were highly offended. They failed in bringing him back to his former persuasion; and at last loudly complained of him as an obstinate heretic. He was thereupon seized and cast into prison. But as he had many friends in Bononia who loved him, it was thought most expedient that he should be sent to the Inquisition at Rome, where he would meet with a more impartial judgment. Accordingly, Nov. 18th, 1558, he was conveyed as a prisoner to Rome; and Archbishop Spottiswood tells us, that at Rome he lay in great misery, in the prison of the Inquisition, nine months. In all the rigorous examinations to which he was subjected, he was enabled to be constant in his profession. At last, August 18th, 1559, he was brought before his judges, to hear sentence pronounced upon him. The sentence was, that the next day, viz. August 19th, he should be publicly burnt as a heretic. Mr Row informs us that there were some other persons condemned to suffer along with him.

"While he and his companions, expecting to be executed the next day, were spending the night in prayer, in godly conference, and in singing of psalms, the door of the prison was suddenly opened, and a man whom they did not know, entered, and told them that they were free. They were astonished, and at first dreaded that some snare was laid to increase their sufferings. But the man told them that the Pope had died that night, and that all the prisons in Rome were laid open. It was indeed the case, for Paul IV. had died that night. Mr Row says, it was customary at the death of a Pope to liberate all prisoners. Such as were confined for debt were not recalled; but such as had been guilty of heresy, or of offences committed against the church, were quickly pursued, and forcibly brought back."

Mr Craig, however, escaped, and by a series of singular interpositions of Providence, he at last got safe to his native country; and though not an originator, he was singularly useful in helping forward the happy Reformation, of which we at this day are enjoying the benefit. Not to speak of the crown of righteousness which such a faithful servant of Christ, and a martyr in purpose, though saved from a violent death, is now honoured to wear, how noble does he appear even in the esteem of his fellow-men, in comparison with the poor cowardly friar, who, though convinced of the truth, was afraid to confess it, and who had not the courage "to serve his Maker here on earth!"

No. CXIII.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 9TH, 1820.

I FEEL strongly inclined to favour my readers with one or two Numbers more of light and miscellaneous reading, before I enter upon the discussion of any of the more grave subjects which I have proposed for consideration. I did not know till of late, that a smart controversy took place about a dozen of years ago, in the North of England, in consequence of a charge delivered to the clergy of the diocese of Durham, by the truly venerable bishop of that see, entitled "The grounds on which the Church of England separated from the Church of Rome." This charge, though intended chiefly for the instruction and warning of the clergy under his lordship's immediate inspection, happened to touch upon some points, on which Papists always feel extremely sore. Some of them, priests I presume, from their pedantic show of learning, began to attack, or rather to nibble at this said charge, though it does not appear that they could have any higher object in view, than the little fame that they hoped to acquire among their fellow Papists, by entering the lists with a person of his lordship's rank and character. Their puny efforts to commend the Popish, and malign the Protestant faith, were powerfully opposed by different writers, whose names are not given. The pieces on both sides were collected, and they form two neat volumes.

In one of the Protestant pieces, I find the following very striking observations, which are given as the words of a divine of the Church of England, of a former century:—"The grand enemy of mankind hath, by various ways and means, all along, contrived and endeavoured to defeat the designs of heaven for the good and happiness of men; and, as the divine wisdom hath, in several ages of the world, manifested itself for the encouraging and promoting of true righteousness and holiness; so hath the devil always been at work, to bring forward, in opposition, what he could find most proper, for the hindering of the good effects of God's kindness towards us. When the fulness of time came, by the appearance of the Son of God in the world, he was, in a great measure, dethroned; his kingdom was overthrown; and the last and most effectual means were used, for the recovery of men out of his snare and power. When, therefore, he perceived, that, by all the grievous persecutions he raised against the church, it spread only so much the faster; that, at last, the whole heathen world fell down before the cross of Christ; when he was expelled with shame out of his temples, and from his altars, when his oracles were silenced, and the religion of Jesus prevailed every where;—he then betook himself to his old serpentine arts of dissimulation. Since he could no longer oppose Christ's kingdom by open war, he resolved to turn Christian, and to set up for Christ's deputy and substitute here on earth; to fight against Christianity under Christ's banner; and by adulterating and corrupting the Christian doctrine, to spoil it of all its efficacy; and to introduce his old heathen rites, and idolatrous ceremonies, as unwritten traditions from Christ himself, or his apostles;—and so under his name, and pretended authority, to exercise all that cruelty, oppression, and fraud, which is so pleasant to his own infernal nature; hoping to burn, destroy, and root out, all true Christians from the face of the earth, under colour of propagating the Catholic faith, and enlarging Christ's kingdom in the world.

"When Christendom had long groaned under this miserable tyranny, it pleased God, in many places of Europe, but especially here in England, to set on foot a Reformation of religion; which was happily and peaceably accomplished among us, by the favour and countenance of public authority, and the wise counsel and advice of our reverend bishops and other ministers. To nip this in the bud, the devil raised that sharp persecution in Queen Mary's days, in which our first Reformers gloriously sealed what they had done with their blood. But this proving altogether ineffectual, that he might the better frustrate the ends of our Reformation, himself would turn Reformer too."

The author proceeds to show how the devil effected his purpose, by exciting the extravagance of certain sects in England; but his diabolical efforts were not confined to that kingdom. They were at least equally successful in other places, especially on the continent, and almost under the eye of the great German Reformer, where certain zealots did more injury to the cause of reformation, by their ridiculous caricature of it, than the Pope, with all his army of priests was able to do. This, as our author justly observes, was the work of the devil in his new character of a Reformer.

For centuries before the Reformation, and ever since, till within these few years, the devil found means to keep the great part of what is called Christendom, in gross ignorance. He succeeded so far, as to establish it as a maxim that "ignorance is the mother of devotion;" and his blinded adherents, I mean the devoted vassals of the Pope of Rome, never seem to have thought, that education would be of any use to the common people. They rather considered it as a dangerous thing; and used every effort in their power to prevent them from acquiring any more knowledge of religion, than they themselves were pleased to communicate. Of late years, however, the subject of extending the benefits of education has occupied so much of the public attention; it has appeared, to all classes of the community, a matter of so much importance to teach the poor the art of reading; and the establishment of schools for the purpose, particularly in Ireland, has received so much public support, and has in fact become so popular, that it would not do to appear to oppose the work of education any longer. The devil, therefore, must now have recourse to some other shift; and as of old he professed to become Christian, with the view of destroying Christianity; and Reformer, with the view of discrediting the Reformation, so now, in order to obstruct and hinder the work of education, he has determined to become Schoolmaster.

The fact of this is clearly proved by the noise that the Pope of Rome, and the popish Archbishop of Tuam, have lately made about the establishment of schools, in order to instruct the innocent youth of their communion. There was not a whisper of any thing of the kind while the people of Ireland were sitting in gross darkness, and while no effort was made to impart to them the light of knowledge. But since the establishment of the Hibernian and other Societies; and since it became very probable that all the youth in Ireland would soon be taught to read the word of God, then the Pope and his ghostly agents appear like men awaked out of sleep; they are all at once upon the alert; they will have schools of their own; and they are determined that the youth of their communion shall not be allowed to acquire the art of reading from any but teachers of their own appointment, and of their own faith.

Some persons may suppose that this is nothing but a commendable emulation, excited by their Protestant neighbours; and a tacit acknowledgment that they have been guilty of culpable inattention to the education of their people; but it is in fact neither the one nor the other. The "cloven foot" is not so artfully concealed as it has often been in other cases; for the education commanded by the Pope, and provided by his clergy, for the poor in Ireland, is avowedly such an education as shall exclude the reading of the word of God, and withdraw the children from the schools in which they are in danger of being taught to read it: and whatever sort of men the priests may appoint to superintend such schools, I have no hesitation in putting them on a footing with other inventions of the devil, intended to oppose the truth, and to perpetuate error.

It appears from the Reports of different societies, that many of the schools in Ireland are disturbed, from time to time, by the impertinent interference of popish priests, who insult the teachers, and terrify the children, and even drive out of the school such as they conceive to belong to their communion. I shall give here a recent instance of this, with a most reverend archbishop's approbation of the fact; and then I shall show what sort of education the priests have prepared for the poor children, of whom they claim the exclusive oversight.

Letter from the Secretaries of the Dublin Sunday School Union, to the Most Rev. Dr Troy, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin.

No. 16, Upper Sackville-street, 7th Sept., 1819.

My Lord,

It is with very great pain we feel ourselves obliged to call your Lordship's attention to a transaction which occurred on Sunday the 2nd ulto.—the circumstances attending which are shortly as follows:

One of the objects aimed at by the Society of which we have the honour of being Secretaries, is to establish Sunday Schools throughout the city, in such situations as may seem to be most in need of them; and among other similar institutions, our Committee were enabled, by the kindness of friends, to begin a small Sunday School on the 28th of March last, in Sampson's lane, off Moore street. Since that period this school has been carried on with considerable diligence, and with some prospect of success; the only endeavour of the teachers being to make their pupils able to read the Sacred Scriptures, and to understand the meaning of what they read. But on the day already mentioned, the Rev. Mr Salmon, of Liffey-street Chapel, entered the School, took the books from the hands of several of the children, and in an authoritative manner, ordered all that were Catholics peremptorily to leave the place; he in effect forcibly turned the children out of the School, and accompanied his conduct with such observations, as showed that his hostility to such institutions was of the most decided description.

Convinced, as we all are, of the feelings that such a procedure must excite, not only in the breast of your lordship, but of every well-wisher to the good morals and peace of society, we consider it an imperative duty laid upon us, to state to you the occurrence explicitly as it happened. We are constrained to do so, not only from the circumstance of its affording your lordship an opportunity of expressing your sentiments on the subject, but as the gentleman of whom we complain stated that he was a curate in your lordship's diocese, and that he was determined in future to oppose all Sunday Schools. For himself, we can only regret the mistaken views which could lead him to such a determination; but for our own sakes, we have most respectfully to solicit, that your lordship will take such precautionary measures, as will prevent him on any future occasion from molesting our Schools.

It will always be with extreme reluctance that our Committee will appeal to the constituted authorities of the country for protection, but if the restraints of professional character, of civil decorum, or of superior ecclesiastical jurisdiction, should be found insufficient to hinder this individual, or any other, from rudely disturbing these peaceful seminaries of knowledge, which we have under our care, your lordship must perceive that such an appeal is unavoidable.

Our Committee will hold a meeting at No. 16, Upper Sackville-street, on Tuesday evening next, the 14th instant, for the purpose of receiving your lordship's answer on the subject, and in the mean time, we are, with great respect, my Lord, your lordship's very obedient and humble servants,

Most Rev. Dr Troy, &c. &c.

P. S. In addition to the above, it should also be stated, that the attendance of the children was perfectly free and voluntary, not only on their own part, but that of their parents; as may be confirmed by their parents' declarations, both before this transaction and since. Indeed, many of the children were specially given in charge to the teachers, by their parents and other guardians. No inquiry as to particular religious profession was ever made by the teachers; nor, until the Rev. Mr Salmon divided the School in the unpleasant manner we mention, did they know to what distinctive communion their scholars belonged.

Letter from the Most Rev. Dr Troy, to the Secretaries of the Sunday School Union.

3, Cavendish-Row, Dublin, 13th Sept., 1819.

Gentlemen,

The Catholic Church sanctions no other English version of the Sacred Scriptures but the Doway edition, translated from the Latin Vulgate of St Jerome, in the fourth century; and which, when accompanied with appropriate notes and comments, is permitted to be read by the learned and the lettered: she does not, however, approve of the Holy Bible being degraded to the level of a common school book, or capriciously explained by unauthorized commentators. Histories of the Bible, historical and moral extracts from it, and Catechisms, are generally used in Catholic schools.

The present learned bishops of Lincoln and Peterborough, and other eminent divines of the Established Church in England and Ireland, have proved the inexpediency and danger to religion, from reading the Bible without note or comment; and of submitting it to the interpretation of every reader's private judgment, which experience has proved to be a prolific hive, from which have issued countless swarms of sectaries, distracting Christendom, each clamorously appealing to the Bible, the Bible, and however disunited amongst themselves, all arrayed in hostility to the Catholic Parent Church, which they most uncharitably continue to misrepresent and calumniate.

Christianity was preached before the gospels were written and published; were the Bible alone sufficient for the knowledge of religion, the ministry of the word would be superfluous and the sacred ministry itself rendered useless.

The Catholic Church does therefore prohibit the youth of her communion to frequent schools in these kingdoms, where a different version of the Scriptures from that of Doway is used, or where unauthorized persons assume a right to expound the divine oracles; in which saint Peter says in his 2nd Epistle, That there are some things hard to be understood, which the unlearned and unstable wrest to their own perdition, and that no prophecy of the Scripture is made by private interpretation.

Conformably, therefore, to those maxims, and to the uniform discipline of the Catholic Church, Rev. Mr Salmon went to your School, to withdraw the Catholic children from it, at the very time when religious and moral instructions were given—particularly to children, in Liffey-street parish Chapel. He cannot on this account be justly accused of opposition to the constituted authorities, which allow the free exercise of the Catholic religion, and the authority of its ministers to instruct the ignorant of their communion.

Protestants and Catholics may zealously concur in promoting a general education of the poor, and still maintain the faith and discipline of their respective churches. If this be not permitted, no system of general education can succeed; why then are Catholic poor children invited to schools where their catechism is not taught, and a prohibited version of the Bible without note or comment is used, and explained by incompetent unauthorized persons?

As to the particular conduct of Rev. Mr Salmon, I should be sorry indeed that he would act on any occasion in a manner unbecoming the meekness of a clergyman, or the manners of a gentleman. I this moment receive his inclosed explanatory letter, and have the honour to be with great respect, and in the spirit of perfect charity, Gentlemen, your very humble servant,

(Signed,) J. T. TROY.

W. Smith, Jun. & M. Pollock. Esqrs. &c.

I shall now proceed to show what sort of an education it is which the priests have provided for the youth of their communion, whom they are now willing to instruct in the art of reading. Archbishop Troy says, that "Histories of the Bible, historical and moral extracts from it, and Catechisms, are generally used in Catholic schools." Now I happen to have in my possession a great number of these catechisms, and also some of their histories of the Bible, with historical and moral extracts from it, and I do not hesitate to say, that all of them are just what we might expect from the devil, professing to be Christian. The Christian vocabulary is used to a certain extent; language that savours of the love of God is introduced; but the tendency of the whole is to alienate the mind from the knowledge of God as he is revealed to us in the scriptures, and to lead the deluded worshipper to dependence on himself, or on some other creature.

I shall, at present, confine myself to the celebrated school book, edited by W. E. Andrews, which Dr Milner, Vicar Apostolic of the midland district, England, declares to be "the most complete and valuable work of its kind in our language, and eminently entitled to the patronage of the Catholic public;" and the right reverend prelate promises to recommend it in those places of education over which he has any authority or influence. Nay, as I showed in my first volume, this work is praised by a correspondent of the author, as a much better book than the Bible, because from it one will acquire a better knowledge of religion at one reading, than he will learn from the Bible in a whole life. I shall now favour the reader with a sample of the doctrine which is taught by this, which some of our English Papists consider the best of all books.

"The souls of some, who have not been very good during their life-time, and yet have had pardon of their sins, will go into a prison, called purgatory, for a while;" page 67, 4th ed. The reader will observe, that the pardon of their sins here spoken of, is that which a priest can grant for money; and having obtained this, they need not be very anxious about the future, though they have not been very good persons; as they will only go to prison "for a while."

To a child, the author thus addresses himself: "By Baptism which you have received, you are washed from original sin, by the application of the merits of the blood of Jesus Christ; delivered from the universal curse of mankind incurred by sin, and freed from the power of the devil. You have been made a child of God; the disciple of Jesus Christ our Saviour. You have acquired God for your father, Jesus Christ for your master, your instructor, your example, and for the rule of your life; the holy church for your mother and guardian; the angels for your protectors, the saints for your intercessors. You have been made the temple of God, who dwells in you by his grace. The heir of his eternal kingdom, from the title and hope of which you were fallen for ever; and you are brought back into the secure way that leads to it, being made a member of Jesus Christ and his church, out of which all those who obstinately remain cannot be saved, and wherein you are now illuminated with the light of the faith of Jesus Christ, instructed by his doctrine, nourished by his precious body and blood, assisted by his grace, and furnished with all the necessary means for your salvation," page 116. All these blessed things are said to belong to the young Papist, not as having received the Holy Spirit, for in that case the statement would be partly true, but merely because he has received a sprinkling of holy water from the hand of a priest. I do not know any thing that can have a more pernicious effect upon the youthful mind than this.

In perfect consistence with the well known character of Popery, this best of all school books teaches, page 177, that a lie is not a mortal sin, when it is not in a matter of consequence. It is admited, indeed, that "a lie is always a sin, because it is always against the truth, known to be such by him that speaks;" and that "the habit of lying, although lightly, is not a light thing, nor of small consequence." There is here an attempt to guard the error, because it would not be creditable to teach the venial nature of a lie without some such qualifying expressions; but when it is plainly taught that a lie in any sense is not a mortal sin, every Christian must hold it as a doctrine of the devil, who was a liar from the beginning, and who, since he has become schoolmaster, will, no doubt, endeavour to persuade the Popish youth to believe in the purity of his own character, and the innocence of his own practice.

In the account which this writer gives of the feasts and fasts of the church, there is such a mass of superstition and will-worship, that it is impossible for a person to perceive any traces of real Christianity. The virgin Mary and the saints appear to be every thing; and the Saviour, in comparison, appears as nothing. The virgin Mary is declared to be "the Mother of purity itself;" and speaking of her child-birth, when she brought forth Jesus, it is called that "to which, out of her great humility, she submitted."

Such is the instruction provided for our Popish youth, in what is called by a bishop of their church, the most valuable work of its kind in our language. I appeal now to the Christian reader, whether I have not made good the assertion with which I set out, that the devil himself has become schoolmaster.

No. CXIV.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16TH, 1820.

IN consequence of the very extensive circulation of my Work in Ireland, I have lately acquired some more valuable correspondents belonging to that country; and from them a great deal of information, which will be interesting to my readers. Without farther preface, I shall proceed to give the substance of a letter which I received about two months ago.

"SIR,—I have just read, with much pleasure and interest, your first volume of THE PROTESTANT.* It only came into my hands last week, or I should have communicated with you sooner. I have long desired to see such a publication as yours, and I trust it will get into circulation in this benighted country.—I could not read your publication without desiring to give you any information that I think may be useful to you in conducting a Work that is calculated to excite so much attention. My first communication shall be to give you a fuller account of Dr Lanigan's business than you seem to possess; (see No. XXXIX., page 130, in which this reverend Doctor is introduced as giving five reasons why a promise may be broken), as it is one of the extraordinary instances of the character of modern Popery, where it has power, that it discovers the high sense of the rights of honour, conscience and citizenship, for which Vindicator would make it stand remarkable. I must preface my story, in order to give it to you at large.

"In the beginning of 1808, there appeared an infamous paragraph in one of the Dublin papers, saying, that Mr R., of Kilkenny, preached a violent Orange sermon in the church there, on the Sunday preceding; and some strong expressions were quoted, as if used by him. It was a day on which some soldiers of an Orange lodge went to church in some procession, which made Mr R. preach a sermon determinately opposite to what was said in the paragraph, in which he besought the congregation to live, as far as possible, at peace with all men. Mr R. got his attorney to write to the printer, to say that he purposed to prosecute him for the libel. The printer gave up a priest of that town, as the writer of the paragraph. Mr R. consulted with a friend on the occasion, wishing to preserve peace as much as he could. It was agreed that this friend should call on the priest, inform him that they had his letter, ask him to make a private apology, and contradict, by another anonymous paragraph, what he had written on the ground of misinformation. He accordingly went with another friend, spoke to him as mildly as he could, and mentioned the only thing he required. He listened with surprise for some time, without answering, affected great astonishment at such a charge, and denied it flatly. When told that the information was positive, he dropt down on one knee, put his hand to his heart, and protested before God, by his priesthood, and by the mass which he had just celebrated, that he never sent such a paragraph to the printer. Greatly shocked by such a mode of asseveration, the gentleman who was in possession of the letter, produced it, and left him to read it. He went from him to Dr Lanigan, his bishop, for he was one of Lanigan's curates, mentioned to him the circumstance, without fully repeating his protest, but told him that he had made a solemn appeal to heaven. Dr Lanigan seemed very indignant; said in a pompous way, that he would not suffer such a man to remain longer in the town than it was possible to get him removed, and that he would show him his displeasure in a most marked manner. In a little time he did remove him, but it was from a curacy of £25 a year, with scarce any perquisites, to a situation in the country of five times the value. So much for Popish honour and conscience. Jesuitism need not be revived by a Bull, or by colleges; it exists in full power and action.

"Immediately after this, Dr Milner, having said and unsaid to Mr Ponsonby on the veto business; having published and contradicted, and published and contradicted again; found it necessary not to commit himself any more by writing, but come over to Ireland, to stop, by personal communication with the bishops, &c. the growing inclination to grant the veto. Already the primate and his diocese, by public resolutions, had granted it. This diocese was proceeding to follow him, the resolutions were drawn up, which Dr Lanigan promised to sign. Dr Milner had the same week invited a number of bishops or legates to meet him at Cork, at the consecration of a splendid new chapel, which was an excellent opportunity and excuse for meeting. After all the abominations of the consecration, which lasted several hours, with all the forms, charms, and spells, by which superstition is fascinated and fed, they had a private convocation. Dr Milner declared his abhorrence of the intended concession, which originated with himself, and was kept up as long as he thought it could impose; but now it must be put down by all means. The bishops and legates hastened home; all their agents were set at work; and immediately that which was ready to be cheerfully granted, was denounced as a greater abomination than the penal laws in the fullest letter of the old statutes. Milner set off to Kilkenny. Dr Lanigan, who was not at Cork, had his eyes opened immediately, as if by the very clergy and inhabitants that one week before publicly voted for the resolutions, and ordered them to be prepared for signature: so quickly does darkness become light; and light darkness in popish minds! The two chairmen of the meeting were independent men, Major B. a man of large fortune, the other Mr. L. a banker in the town. These men refused to retract their signature; and Major B. hurt at Dr Lanigan's message, put in the advertisement which provoked the five reasons for breaking a promise, and they required all the reasons of all the angelic doctors of the calendar. The bishop was determined to punish the chairmen and oblige them to retract. The priest already mentioned, had proved himself a fit instrument for such work. He went round the country, sent in the farmers to run upon, and break L.'s bank, they came in thousands, the Protestant noblemen and gentlemen of the country came forward to assist L. brought in their national paper, published an advertisement to say that they would take his notes for all rents, &c. and threatening tenants who should join in such a conspiracy; but Popery in this country is not so easily overcome. The people crowded in,—they threatened the banker's life, to consume his houses, destroy his cattle, and had actually houghed some of them. He held out for a week;—at length terrified, he sent one of the most respectable gentlemen of the place to the bishop, with his written recantation; craved pardon for his offence in daring to follow his conscience in opposition to a bishop's mandate, and requested the bishop to come and disperse the mob. The bishop came, and before the city, standing in a place where he could be seen, he raised his hand, and simply said, "My friends, begone," and the people instantly went off with a shout; and in the evening had an immense bonfire to celebrate the triumph of Popery over all the rights of conscience, citizenship, and protection of a British subject.

"The triumph did not end here. Major B. still was obstinate. His military pride would not allow him to yield so soon. But he must be subdued. While such a Mordecai was at the gate, the power of the bishop would not be supreme. The same priest was set to work. He denounced the Major under the name of a fox, whom he called the people to hunt out of the country. The Major made great threats; —said he would go and live in England, and rear his children Protestants; but he knew not the power of the spells of Popery. They are not to be broken by the resolutions of pride. The priest created such a spirit against him in the country, that he, at length, getting terrified, or rather overpowered by superstition, yielded; and, in order to reconcile himself, appointed with a farmer, who had a daughter about to be married, to ask him to the wedding, that he might meet the priest, and make friends. He did so: the Major met him, and they were reconciled. The Major has been since the champion of antivetoism; and sat in the chair when certain resolutions were carried, that the printer prosecuted for them, was sentenced to two years' imprisonment, and to pay a large fine.

"Such was Popery, in 1808, and such it is now. In Glasgow those things could not take place; but they may where the Papists are 19 to 1. Of all those things I was an eye witness. I saw Popery in this day what it was in the days of Henry IV. In case you should mention any of these circumstances in your publication, you have hundreds of witnesses on the spot to prove them. I am, &c."

As the above are not matters of private anecdote, it is not necessary that I give the name of the writer. My Kilkenny readers may satisfy themselves of their truth; and any person who has a correspondent in that quarter, may do the same. These few facts are worth fifty arguments, to show the true character of Popery. The mystery is, that men entitled to the privileges of free-born British subjects, should submit to such intolerable tyranny; especially that a people so acute, and so high-minded as the Irish, should submit to it. We have here presented, in a striking light, the power which the priests have over the bodies, and minds, and the property of the people; and, if the object of their dictation were the election of a member of Parliament, what freeholder would dare to refuse his vote to any candidate whom a bishop should set up, though he knew him to be a man who would use his influence to bring the kingdom under subjection to the see and the court of Rome?

The following narrative of a recent conversion from Popery, by means of reading the New Testament, was received lately by a gentleman of this city, from a friend in Ireland, who says, "you may rely on the account being true." "I send you a full account of the Harts, and the miraculous leadings of Providence in the course of their lives.—This venerable old man is now aged ninety, a strong man, of delightful countenance, sound judgment, and in good circumstances. He was religious in his way. His wife and he thought, as God was blessing them in temporals, they should earn their everlasting salvation; and so to work they went. And as they were both just; liable to no penance by station; so then they concluded they had wrought out their salvation to all intents and purposes, overlooking the Lord in the matter. But over and above, they must do something for their friends, or to bequeath to whoever had most need. Called at the eleventh hour, I sat up almost all night to hear his account, and, O the depths! &c. This man had a large family of sons and daughters. Bartly, the oldest, was of a weak constitution; so he was educated for a priest. He obstinately refused the priesthood, which much displeased his father; but he gave him £30 to buy yarn, which sum did not last above two years. He then gave him £10 for hardware. Bartly from his youth was esteemed a little saint, and was up to all the orders and superstitions of Popery, which caused the father in a measure to overlook his disappointments. But to crown all, he married one of the lowest of the people, without his consent and without portion. They were soon in the depths of poverty. He lived two years in a hut, in a wild mountain; and none of his friends heard of him. At length poverty drove him to his father's house, where he was very coolly received. The father, however, gave him a small division of land; but he was so overloaded with superstition, that he got under seven orders, by which he fasted on one bad meal, for three days in a week, for a year, and, at some seasons, for twenty-four hours. He would travel from ten to twenty miles to perform a station. In these stations, they leave their skin and flesh upon the stones. The first station is fifteen miles off; they must travel bare-footed to the place, and then ascend the rocks, though a very ready passage otherwise, and at every marked place down upon their bare knees, till the top is gained; and though their feet and knees are much bruised, yet this is but an amusement to what follows.

"Upon the top of the mountain there is a round mount, of the circumference of about a hundred perches, of rough stone and gravel. Round this upon their bare knees they must go, until they are exhausted; and the descent, upon their return, is much more severe than the ascent; and for a great part of the way, they must creep on their hands and feet. O, said Bartly, if you had been there the day after me, you would have seen my flesh and blood upon the stones. But, said another brother, I saw him at B—l, where he had a great distance to go on his knees; and lest his whole weight would not be sufficient, he clasped his hand upon the crown of his head, to press himself with greater weight upon the stones. (The poor man, it seems, had not studied the laws of gravity.) Another brother declared, he was twelve months before he recovered the pains of his knees. He did penance at Lough Derg, and many other stations after this, and yet obtained no peace of mind, and he often cried bitterly. In this state of mind he continued, until happening to read the lives of the saints (a most superstitious book), O, said he, I have done nothing! So he concluded he would leave wife and family, and starve himself to death. He got a coarse sack, and stitched it up to his chin, determining to wear it all his days instead of a shirt. In this state he continued many days. Distress was pressing hard upon him on the one hand, and agitation of mind on the other, for he neglected all business. But he determined to sell the little place that his father had given him, and commence pedlar again. Accordingly he sold it for £7. He and the family travelled until they entered the barony of Tyrnagh. Upon his arrival there, he heard of a Mr Carlan (a man who was designed for a priest, but recanted, of whom you might have heard much), and a very bad report he every where heard of him;—that he was termed swaddler, and had done very much harm. Thinks Bartly, if I could see him, I would soon confound his heresy, &c. He rambled on till he came to where Carlan was; and he saw an Irish Testament with one of his scholars, and thought if he had £100, he would give it to be able to read it. He soon got into argument with Carlan; and after finding, that he could read tolerably well, thinks he, if this book be true, I am wrong. From this he dates his conversion; and, by reading and conversation, the Lord has not only opened his mind, but made him useful to others. The fear of man pressed hard on him, and he dreaded his friends' hearing of the change; so he built a cabin in T———le, about 20 miles from his friends. The wonderful news reached the old father; and the old man told me, it would have been joyful news, in comparison of this, if he had heard that his son had stolen a cow, and been hanged for it. But he still hoped it might be false. At length, says the youngest brother, John, I will go and hear the truth of all. At first, he made a furious charge upon Bartly, which he sustained with great patience; and begged he would sit down and stay all night. Bartly took the Irish Testament. The novelty of it attracted the brother's attention, and he staid the second night; and by the middle of the week, he was as confirmed a Protestant as Bartly himself; and so they continued together fourteen days. By this time, the Lord had so strengthened Bartly, that neither fear nor shame prevented him from declaring the glad tidings of salvation to his fellow-sinners. He ventured even to go to his father; and leaving his brother in his place, he arrived at his father's at night; and a trying scene ensued. There were none within but the old couple; and as soon as the father knew it was Bartly, he leapt up and seized a cudgel, and made a dreadful blow at Bartly, who evaded the blow, and with uplifted hands, prayed him to desist; but the old man repeated his blows, till the poor old woman grasped him, declaring, that she thought some of the blows would have killed his son; and thus she got him a little pacified. He was upon the whole a sober patient man; and when he became a little cool, he began to ask Bartly some questions. He took his Testament, and began to read and explain the way of salvation, showing how God could be just, and the justifier of the ungodly, exclusive of their own merits; and brought the doctrine so closely home, that the old people themselves were fully convinced. They related these matters with praise and joy; and told me also that the other son, Con. was not at home that night; but he being of a solid judgment, and naturally inquisitive after knowledge, when he had the nature of the gospel explained to him by Bartly, embraced the truth; and he is of infinite use in Bartly's absence, being engaged in every public place in defending the truth, and from his peaceable temper and sound judgment, there is attention paid to him, even by the enemies of the truth."

It will occur to the intelligent reader, that there is something uncommon in the conversion of this family. They yield to the power of truth more readily than is usual by decided enemies, whether popish or heathen. This, though uncommon, is by no means incredible. Conversion from sin to holiness is entirely of God; and though, in general, the strong principle of error, which has naturally possession of the human heart, does not yield without a protracted struggle, it yields under the influence of the Divine Spirit, as certainly in a moment as in a year. The story, however, is so respectably authenticated, that I have no doubt of its truth in every particular.

By the kindness of other correspondents, I have been put in possession of a great number of Popish tracts and books of devotion, lately printed in Dublin and Cork, which show, that, in point of doctrine, Popery in Ireland retains all the grossness of the darkest ages; and that the idolatry of saint-worship is inculcated as explicitly as ever it was in Italy or Spain. The following are the titles of some of the books which I refer to:—"Hell opened to Christians;" 1815; with most horrible cuts representing the torments of the damned. "Stations and Devotions on the Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ crucified," Cork, 1814. "The Indulgences of the Cord of St Francis," Dublin, 1797. "Rules of the Confraternity of the Sacred Heart of Jesus," Cork, 1815. "A Short Treatise of the antiquity, &c. of the most famous and ancient Confraternity of our Blessed Lady of Mount Carmel; commonly called the Scapular," Dublin, no date. "Abridgment of Christian Doctrine," &c. called the Catechism of the four Archbishops. "A Net for the Fishers of Men," Dublin, 1799. "Meditations and Prayers, adapted to the Stations of the holy Way of the Cross," Dublin, 1815. "The Path to Paradise: being the Catholic's Companion to the most Adorable Sacrament of the Altar," Dublin, 1820. "Bona Mors; or the Art of Dying Happily in the congregation of Jesus Christ crucified, and of his condoling Mother." "The Life and Death of the most glorious Virgin Mary," Dublin, 1814. "Some Reflections upon the Prerogatives, Power, and Protection of St Joseph, spouse of the blessed and ever immaculate Virgin Mary," Dublin, 1810. The last mentioned represents Joseph as an object of worship, trust, and confidence; in heaven, next to his wife; and gives a number of examples of persons applying to him in their distress, and receiving relief. It contains several hymns to his honour; and forms of prayer addressed to him, of which take the following as a specimen:

—"O holy Joseph, Virgin spouse of the Virgin mother of God; most glorious advocate of all such as are in danger, or in their last agony; and most faithful protector of all the servants of Mary, your dearest spouse. I, N. N. in the presence of Jesus and Mary, do from this moment choose you for my lord and master, for my powerful patron and advocate, for the obtaining a most happy death: and I firmly resolve and purpose never to forsake you, and never to say or do, or ever suffer any under my charge to say or do, any thing against your honour; receive me therefore for your perpetual servant, and recommend me to the constant protection of Mary, your dearest spouse, and to the everlasting mercies of Jesus my Saviour." And a great deal more to the same purpose.

Besides the gross impiety that pervades all these works, they are in point of style and taste deplorably low. They exhibit a beastly prostration of intellect, which compels one to think of Papists as if they were some degrees lower in the scale of being than their Protestant neighbours. Their most popular books are full of the most intolerable nonsense, as well as the most shocking blasphemy. Not to mention those whose titles I have given, I have before me a sermon preached by the present Pope, when he was bishop of Imola, in 1797, which is puffed up by the editor of the Orthodox Journal, in his number for last month, as a piece of extraordinary merit. As a fair specimen of the whole, I shall present the reader with the first sentence:—"The eternal displayed in time his omnipotence outside himself, and instantly appeared all created things." I have often said that the God of Papists is not the God of the Bible; and the present head of the Romish church confirms the assertion by letting us know, that his God is such a one as himself, who has an inside and an outside.

No. CXV.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23D, 1820.

I AM now about to enter upon a subject which I cannot look upon without some degree of anxiety, and even dismay, as it will scarcely be possible to do justice to it, without exciting, in the minds of my readers, feelings of abhorrence and disgust. I mean the constrained celibacy of the Romish priests. It is, however, a prominent part of the system of Popery, and one which has, as much as any other, laid the system open to the contempt and detestation of the world; and such a Work as that which I have undertaken, would be incomplete without a discussion of it, and an exposure of the monstrous wickedness which it has occasioned.

He who created man, declared concerning him, while yet in a state of innocency, "It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him." Marriage was accordingly instituted in paradise, before sin entered into the world; and must, therefore, be considered as perfectly consistent with the most entire devotion to the service of God. After sin had entered, neither the man nor the woman was so capable of serving him as before; neither of them, indeed, could serve him at all, till renewed by faith in the promised Saviour, and sanctified by the grace of the Holy Spirit; but being so renewed, they were as capable of serving him while living together as man and wife, as if they had divorced each other, and a great deal more so. This union we find approved and blessed by God from the very beginning. How, indeed, could it be otherwise, seeing it was appointed by himself, for the preservation of the species, until the Messiah should come of the seed of the woman; and thereafter, until all the spiritual seed of the Messiah should be born into his family, which supposes their being first born into the world?

Christ himself honoured the union, by sanctioning the formation of it, on one occasion, by his presence; which we may be sure he would not have done, had there been any thing unlawful, or necessarily unholy in it; his inspired apostle, in the plainest language, asserts the lawfulness of every man having his own wife, and every woman her own husband; and the laws of Christ laid down with regard to the duties of man and wife, clearly imply the lawfulness of the connection.

I know it will be replied, that this is not the question. The Church of Rome, I shall be told, does not deny the lawfulness of marriage in general; but only that of the priests. But I ask, who are those priests on whose behalf such a distinction is made? If they are men, it is lawful for every man to have his own wife; and if they are not men, but fiends in human form, let them say so, and the world will know in what light to regard them.

It is not my intention to spend many Numbers on this subject. I feel like one treading on polluted ground, whose senses are assailed by offensive objects, and fetid effluvia; and shall endeavour to get over it as quickly as possible. I proceed, therefore, immediately, to lay down the doctrine of Rome upon this subject, and to expose its error and wickedness.

According to Bishop Hay, there are five things requisite in every one who is going to enter upon the priesthood; the last of which is, that "he be resolved to dedicate himself to the service of God, by perpetual chastity and celibacy." "Quest. Does the church oblige all those in sacred orders to live single and chaste? Ans. This she requires from them in the strictest manner, so as to decree the severest penalties against those among them who violate this law; having sometimes ordered them to be deposed, sometimes to be excommunicated, sometimes to be imprisoned in monasteries, to spend their whole lives in penance. And the great council of Trent pronounces an anathema upon any one who shall dare to affirm, that, notwithstanding this prohibition of the church, it is lawful for any of them to marry, or that such marriage would be lawful in the sight of God."—Sess. xxiv. can. 9.

"Quest. On what principles does the church proceed, in so strictly prohibiting marriage to her clergy? Ans. Upon the following grounds laid down in the Holy Scripture: (1.) Because a life of purity and chastity is more excellent, more perfect, and more acceptable to God than the married state." In support of this strange proposition the author cites the words of Paul, 1 Cor. vii. 25, 27, 38. But the doctrine is founded upon a most unwarrantable assumption,—that the married state is not, and cannot be a state of purity and chastity. His words must signify this at least, else why place these virtues in contrast with the state of marriage? Had he put them in contrast with their opposite vices, he would have expressed a mere truism, which nobody would have disputed. But where does he find, that marriage is the opposite of purity and chastity? Certainly not in the Word of God; for there it is divinely ordained as the means of promoting and maintaining them; as the reader may see in the very chapter which the bishop refers to as above.

But what has this to do with the celibacy of the clergy as a distinct order? Paul was not addressing clergymen, but the church of God which was in Corinth; and the whole chapter seems to be an answer to a letter which they had addressed to him, requesting his advice on the subject of marriage. This appears from the first verse. Now if the apostle had meant what the bishop would have him to mean, it would not be a prohibition of the clergy from marrying, for he asserts the right of himself to take a wife if he chose, and the practice of other apostles who had wives, in the 9th chap. verse 5th; but it would be a prohibition of all Christians from marrying, which would be contrary to the general tenor of the Bible, and the avowed purpose of God with regard to his church.

Now the fact is, the apostle's answer to the letter which the Christians in Corinth had sent to him, was not meant as a general dissuasive from marriage. It does not contain the slightest hint that celibacy was more pleasing to God than matrimony; but merely suggests some prudential considerations, suited to the time, and to the circumstances of those who had applied to him for advice and instruction. In giving his advice to the unmarried, he tells them that he does so in consideration of the "present distress," verse 26. In the distressing circumstances in which they were placed, and the sufferings which he foresaw they would be called to endure, he advised such as could conveniently remain single, rather to do so, than to involve themselves in the additional cares of a family. At the same time he left every individual to judge for himself, whether marrying or remaining single would be most conducive to his own comfort and purity; and if he found it to be the former, his advice was, by all means let him marry; in doing so he sinneth not, which would not be true, were marriage less pleasing to God than celibacy. No man with a pure mind would ever think of honourable marriage as a state of impurity. Bishop Hay's words are a libel upon all the virtuous husbands and wives in the world; and it is only because the minds and consciences of Romish priests are defiled by their own impure imaginations, and wicked practices, that they look upon that union which God has ordained, as less holy than the restrictions which they affect to impose upon themselves; though it is well known that there is more of affectation than reality, in their professed abhorrence of impurity, and admiration of chastity.

Our right reverend prelate proceeds in his argument as follows:—"This is also manifest from the special reward promised by our Saviour, and bestowed in heaven upon those who lead a chaste life: our Saviour says, "Amen, I say unto you, there is no man that hath left house, or parents, or wife, for the kingdom of heaven's sake, who shall not receive much more in this present time, and in the world to come, life everlasting," Luke xviii. 29. Let the reader remember, that this passage is adduced to support the doctrine, that it is more pleasing to God for a man not to have a wife, than to have one. And I ask every one who can read and understand the terms, whether they do not equally prove, that it is more pleasing to God to be without a house, than to have one; and to be without parents, than to have them? It would, indeed, tend very much to enhance the dignity of the Popish priesthood, if they could prove that they are personally, what was said of Melchisedec officially, that they are without father and mother, and that, like the image which fell from Jupiter, in the temple of Diana, they had dropt from the clouds. I hope they will thank me for this hint, which, if duly improved and followed up, may tend to excite greater veneration for their persons, than any imagination which could have entered into their own heads.

Christ's words in the passage cited, refer to circumstances in which the service of God may render it necessary for a man to forsake his nearest and dearest relatives, and even to lay down his life; but the question occurs again, What has this to do with the celibacy of the clergy? and the answer must be, Nothing at all.

Again, speaking of those who continue unmarried, the bishop proceeds:—"The singular privileges which shall be bestowed on them in heaven, are described by St John, where he tells us, that they have the name of the Lamb, and the name of his Father, written in their foreheads, to distinguish them in a special manner from all the other saints; that they sing a new song before the throne of God, which no other can sing but themselves; and that they follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, always attending his sacred person, as his chaste and beloved spouses:" and describing those to whom such honours belong, "These are they," says he, "who were not defiled with women, for they are virgins," Rev. xiv. 1, 3, 4. And so, if we will take a Popish bishop's word for it, the "hundred and forty and four thousand," who surround the throne of the Lamb upon mount Sion, having his Father's name written in their foreheads, and who sing a new song, which none can learn but themselves, are to be considered merely as so many men and women who, in this world, chose to live unmarried. They are called the redeemed from the earth, to distinguish them from those who were not so redeemed; and therefore, according to the doctrine of this prelate, married persons can have no part in that redemption.

Such a mean and contracted idea of the church triumphant, could not possibly have place in the mind of any but such as believe the Head of the church to be created by a priest, and exhibited to their view in the form of a wafer. The worshippers of a wafer god may readily believe their idol to have 144,000 spouses, and thus their religion appears to be nearly the same with Hindooism and Mahomedanism. But the plural number is never used in Scripture, when speaking of the spouse of Christ. It is the one company of redeemed sinners; that is, his church, which he purchased with his own blood, and which he sanctifies and cleanses by the washing of water through the Word, that is his spouse. This is the spouse that he will present to himself, a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but holy and without blame before him in love, Eph. v. 26, 27; and so far is marriage from being a state that is not pleasing to God, that it is actually honoured by the Holy Spirit, in this very passage, by being used as a similitude, to represent the union between Christ and his church; as it is in many other passages of the Bible.

The bishop seems to have considered the "hundred and forty four thousand," as a company consisting only of priests and nuns, and such as they, who had lived in celibacy. These, he says, have their Father's name written in their foreheads; and he distinguishes them in a special manner from all the other saints. Now, if the above is to be taken literally as the specific number of persons, so highly favoured, what is to become of all the rest? The number must have been made up many ages ago; and it is vain for nuns and priests of the present day to expect admission into that company. The disciples of his reverence will perhaps reply, that out of the many millions who have lived in celibacy, since Popery became the prevailing religion in Europe, and who shall so live till the end of the world, there will not be found more than 144,000 who have actually kept the monastic vow. This I am by no means disposed to controvert; but then, what becomes of the much-vaunted superior purity and chastity of the monastic state of celibacy?

But the bishop was too wise to commit himself, and the character of his holy order, by such an argument as the above; and not knowing, perhaps, any better, he makes use of no argument at all to support his view of the passage; and he takes care not to give the entire unmutilated words of the verses to which he refers, well knowing, that if he had done so, any child who could read, would have seen that they had no relation whatever to the doctrine which he was labouring to establish.

The "hundred and forty four thousand," I take to be a mystical number, meant to represent the church of Christ in a state of glory and perfection. It is mentioned as one feature in the character of these blessed persons, "These are they which were not defiled with women; for they are virgins." The bishop will have this to signify, they were not married persons; whereas, every one acquainted with the phraseology of the Bible, understands it to mean, they were stedfast in the faith of Christ, and devotion to him alone as their Lord and Saviour, and would not consent to give his glory to another. They are therefore distinguished from those who yielded themselves up to the whore who sitteth upon many waters, with whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication. This meretricious personage is no other than the Church of Rome, which usurped dominion over the nations, which are called many waters; and the wickedness of the kings, or kingdoms of the earth, consisted in yielding themselves up to all her idolatries, and other abominations, (see Rev. xvii. throughout.) In hundreds of passages in the Old Testament, deviation from the worship of the true God is compared to conjugal infidelity. Idolatry is called adultery and fornication; and the apostle, adopting the Hebrew mode of expression, as he does in many other places, represents those who, in times of great temptation and suffering, during the period of antichrist's reign, should refuse to commit idolatry, or submit to her superstitious rites, as pure persons, as without spot before God; that is, they were uncontaminated by the prevailing apostacy and idol-worship; they maintained their fidelity to their own God to the end of their lives; and many of them suffered the loss of life on that very account. Thus the great company whom the apostle saw before the throne of God, so far from being the monks and nuns of the Romish Church, were those who never submitted to, but protested against the abominable idolatries of that most corrupt communion.

The conclusion which Bishop Hay draws from the foregoing premises, which I have given in his own words, with quotation marks, is as follows:—"Seeing, therefore, that the office of the priesthood requires the most angelical purity, and the most sublime sanctity in those who are admitted to it, therefore the church has judged proper to oblige all who enter into that office, to embrace the more perfect state of chastity." Here again he assumes it as admitted, that marriage and chastity are things opposed to one another; than which nothing can be more opposite to the truth: but if it were true, it would not apply to priests only, but to all Christians without distinction; for there is nothing, in point of holiness, required of persons who hold office in the church, which is not required of every member. It was not to the priests, but to the whole congregation of Israel, that the Lord said, "Be ye holy, for I the Lord your God am holy:" and the apostle Peter takes up the words, and addresses them as a divine command, not to clergymen merely, but to the whole body of the Christians, who were scattered through the provinces of the Lesser Asia, 1 Pet. i. 16. And another apostle tells us plainly, that "without holiness, no man (he does not say, no priest) shall see the Lord," Heb. xii. 14. The thing is certainly true of every priest; but not more true with regard to him than any other man; and if such holiness be inconsistent with the married state, then it is unlawful for any Christian to marry, and the human species must become extinct as soon as Christianity becomes universal; for then there will be no more heathens, or unbelievers, or heretics, to preserve the race in existence in a lawful way.

I shall forbear answering the bishop's second reason, not because it is unanswerable; but because I do not know how to do it in proper language. His third reason is founded on what the apostle advises the Corinthians to do, in their circumstances of peculiar distress; but which was never meant as a general rule; and if it were, it could not be made to bear upon the clergy in particular. His fourth reason may be touched without the necessity of being polluted; and therefore, I shall give it entire: "(4.) The duties of their state, as pastors of the flock of Jesus Christ, make the married state in a manner incompatible with their vocation; for they are chosen by Jesus Christ, and separated from the rest of mankind, for the service of the gospel of God, Rom. i. 1, that they 'may go and bring forth fruit,' in the conversion of souls to God, and 'that their fruit may remain,' John xv. 16. They are dedicated, by their vocation, to this holy service of God, and his gospel; and are obliged to give their whole attention to the good of their people's souls; to instruct them; to administer the sacraments to them; to comfort them in their distress; to assist them in their sickness, and especially when death approaches; and, for this purpose, to answer their calls at all times, by night or by day, even though at the risk of their own life, when the good of their people's souls requires it. Now, it is evidently incompatible with the cares of a wife and family, to discharge all these duties properly; and therefore St Paul says, 'No man, being a soldier of God, entangleth himself with worldly business, that he may please him to whom he hath engaged himself,' 2 Tim. ii. 4. Now, the church, well knowing that no kind of worldly business entangleth a man so much from the duties of the pastoral charge, as the cares of a wife and family; therefore, on this account also, expressly requires of her pastors to abstain from a state so inconsistent with that charge."

The church is here described as "well knowing" something; but the accompanying remark shows her deplorable ignorance of the very subject under discussion. There is not one of the things mentioned as the duty of a faithful minister, at least not one that his Master imposes upon him, in which, so far from being hindered, he would not be assisted by an affectionate Christian wife. He who is single, must have some worldly care, were it only the cooking of his dinner, the making of his bed, and the washing and mending of his linens; but he who has a wife can devolve all these, and the care of his children too, and fifty other things, upon her; not that she will be able to do all with her own hands; but she can see that all be done, so as to leave her husband absolutely without carefulness about this world, and all things in it, and leave him, if he be so disposed, to devote himself entirely to the spiritual duties of his office. I am not speaking of a mere possibility; I am speaking of what I know to exist; and hundreds of ministers will say, Amen, to what I have here written. Popish priests cannot be judges of this question; for they know nothing of the matter. But the Holy Spirit, by his inspired apostles, has decided it, not by prohibiting ministers of the gospel from marrying; but by describing the character which their wives ought to sustain; which clearly implies, that it was lawful, and not unprofitable for them to have wives.

The bishop's fifth reason is a virtual concession of the point; for he asserts, what is true, that the apostles did not enjoin celibacy upon the bishops of the primitive church. "In the apostles' time," says he, "when the church began, there was a necessity for taking married people into the priesthood, because for want of hands, there was no room for choice; and, therefore, the apostles did not make any express law against doing so; yet we find the strongest injunctions in their sacred writings, that all who were admitted into that holy state should live chaste and continent lives; thus St Paul affirms, that 'a bishop must be—sober, just, holy, continent,' Tit. i. 8; and writing to Timothy on the virtues proper for his state as a pastor, he says, 'be thou an example to the faithful, in word, in conversation, in charity, in faith, in chastity,' 1 Tim. iv. 12; and again, 'I charge thee before God, and Christ Jesus, and the elect angels—keep thyself chaste,' 1 Tim. v. 21, 23; and giving a catalogue of the virtues belonging to the ministry of Christ, he says, 'In all things let us exhibit ourselves as the ministers of God in much patience—in chastity,' 2 Cor. vi. 4, 6. In consequence of this, we find, from the earliest monuments of antiquity, that, even when married people were admitted into the sacred ministry, they generally abstained from all cohabitation with their wives after that; till in process of time, when the number of the faithful increased, so that there was no difficulty of getting plenty of young people trained up to the service of the church, the law was made, for all the above reasons, obliging all who entered into sacred orders, to observe a perpetual chastity,"—vol. 2. chap. 26.

Here it is plainly admitted, that whoever made this iniquitous law, Christ and his apostles had no hand in it. We shall trace its origin, and history, and deplorable consequences, in a future Number. In the meantime, I shall conclude with remarking, that his reverence, in citing the words of Paul to Timothy and Titus, respecting the qualifications of a bishop, takes special care to omit the words, (which must have stared him in the face, while he was passing them over) "the husband of one wife,—having faithful children," &c. He knew that most of those for whom he wrote had not the Bible, and that they would take his word for what was contained in it.

No. CXVI.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 30TH, 1820.

AT the conclusion of my last Number, I gave the words of Bishop Hay in which he admits, that "in the apostles' time, when the church began," married men were received into the priesthood. He farther admits, that the apostles did not make any express law against it. Then what is the use of all his reasons for clerical celibacy, which he affects to find in the New Testament? By his own admission the writers of that blessed book ordained no such thing. They imposed no such burden upon either pastors or people. An honest controversialist would therefore have at once acknowledged, that the doctrine which he was maintaining was not to be found in the Bible; but only in the later writings of certain fathers, and in the acts of certain councils. But such was not Bishop Hay. He gave his Work the title of "The Sincere Christian Instructed in the Faith of Christ from the Written Word;" and therefore, to keep up the appearance of fulfilling the promise in his title page, he was obliged to make references to, or quotations from the Bible, though they had no relation whatever to the subject under discussion.

This is one of the ways by which the Word of God is notoriously abused and perverted by the writers of the Romish Church; and by this means, when they cannot altogether keep the Bible out of the hands of the people, they succeed in making it void, or rendering it of no effect. This is done when the words of the inspired writers are quoted and applied to a purpose for which they were not originally intended; and when words are detached from their connection, and made to express the very opposite of what the writer meant to express, and what he will be found to express, when the whole passage is read in connection. Thus, as the reader will see in my last Number, Bishop Hay quotes from the apostolic writings, many passages which strongly enjoin the virtue of chastity on the bishops or pastors of churches. But he makes use of the word chastity as a thing that is inconsistent with, and opposed to the marriage relation; whereas the apostles use the word and enjoin the virtue, not only as consistent with marriage, but as a virtue which marriage is eminently calculated to maintain; and for the very purpose of maintaining which, marriage is expressly enjoined. Thus the bishop quotes the apostle's words against the apostle's meaning. To do so even to an uninspired author would be the greatest insult: but this is an insult offered to the Holy Spirit, by whom the apostles were inspired.

The reason which our author gives for admitting married men to office in the primitive churches, is the necessity of the case; because, "for want of hands there was no room for choice." But I ask, how did he come to know this? Were there not twelve unmarried young men in all Judea, whom Jesus could have taken and qualified to be apostles? We know that Peter was a married man, for one of Christ's first miracles was to cure his wife's mother of a fever, Mat. viii. 14. That others of the apostles, and particularly those who are called the Lord's brethren, were married men, is also certain from 1 Cor. ix. 5. Philip, one of the seven deacons, afterwards called an evangelist, had a family of daughters, Acts xxi. 9; and he did not call them nieces, as our Roman priests do their spurious female offspring, and sometimes their young mistresses. The Rhemish translators, indeed, in their note on the passage in which Peter's wife is mentioned, are pleased to tell us, that he did not cohabit with her after he became an apostle. If so, he began his apostleship with a breach of faith, and that too under the eye of his divine Master, which is not to be supposed without gross impiety. Besides, this is not very consistent with one of their own legends. There is among the Popish saints, one Petronilla, who is said to have been Peter's daughter, and who must have been born many years after her father was an apostle, because in the reign of the emperor Domitian she was asked in marriage by one Flaccus; and had she been born before her father was called to the apostleship, she would then have been about sixty years of age. This argument, though of no value in itself, ought to be of great weight with all Papists. The testimony of the apostle Paul, however, is of more value; and he, writing to the Corinthians, more than twenty years after Christ's ascension, speaks of Cephas then leading about his wife, as well as other apostles.

It is dishonouring to Christ to say that there was any necessity imposed upon him, in ordering the affairs of his kingdom; that from want of materials for doing what was right, he was obliged to do wrong: yet this is the amount of Bishop Hay's argument. Christ had all power in heaven and in earth committed to him; and could have converted and qualified all the unmarried persons in the Roman empire, to be evangelists, if he had seen this proper; or had it been unlawful to employ married men in the work of the ministry. But he did employ married men in the honourable work of preaching the gospel; and if it was lawful then, it is lawful still; for there has been no later authority that could lawfully set aside his appointment.

In this, however, the Church of Rome proves herself to be the very antichrist. A prominent feature of her character is, "Forbidding to marry," 1 Tim. iv. 3; and there is no other church in the world to which the words are so truly applicable. The Rhemists, in their note upon the passage, endeavour to fix the charge upon some ancient heretics, but this cannot serve their purpose; for seeing they do the very thing themselves, it is no justification to say that ancient heretics did the same. The grave doctors seem to have felt extremely sore when touched upon this point; and not having much to say that could be called argument, they had, as usual, recourse to scolding. They ask, "Is it not now intolerable impudency of the Protestants, who, for a small similitude of words in the ears of the simple, apply this text to the fasts of the church, and the chastity of priests and religious?" So, it seems, forbidding to marry, is not forbidding to marry; between the two, there is only a small similitude of words in the ears of the simple; and he is an intolerably impudent man who shall say otherwise!

The same doctors wish to be understood as paying great respect to marriage, though they maintain it is a state not good enough for their priests. "The holy church," say they, "is so far from condemning wedlock, that she honoureth it much more than the Protestants, accounting it a holy sacrament; which they do not, but use it only to lust as the heathen do, and not to religion." And they translate the first clause of Ephesians v. 32;—"This is a great sacrament." Now there is here, no doubt, an affection of great respect for the state of marriage, or rather the ceremony by which the contract of marriage is formed, which may properly enough be called a sacrament; for the proper meaning of the word is, an oath, or sacred pledge. But in the commonly received, or ecclesiastical meaning of the word sacrament, marriage has no more to do with it than any other action of a man's life, or any other event in his history; and it is rather an absurd way of honouring an institution to call it what it is not.

But to return to Bishop Hay:—"We find," says he, "from the earliest monuments of antiquity, that even when married people were admitted into the sacred ministry, they generally abstained from all cohabitation with their wives after that."—The most proper answer to this is a flat contradiction. The "earliest monuments of antiquity" are in the Bible; and there, there is not a word of what the bishop alleges; and if the allegation were true, it would prove nothing but that such entrants into the "sacred ministry," were guilty of great wickedness in forsaking their wives, or putting them away without any just cause. Heretics of different names did, indeed, at a very early period, revile the married state, calling it the invention of the devil. And some of the fathers, who were no better than great senseless children, speak of celibacy as a more holy state than marriage; but the bare unsupported speculations of such men ought to have no weight whatever with persons who have access to the word of God, and their senses exercised to discern good and evil.

But as it may be worth while to show, that "the earliest monuments of antiquity," after closing the canon of Scripture, are against the bishop's assertion, I shall present the reader with the following short summary: "Sanctioned by the example of the apostles, it is certain, that a vast many of the more distinguished primitive bishops and saints were engaged in the holy state of wedlock. St Chrysostom, showing at large the expediency of marriage, intimates that several holy men were married. To mention a few eminent ones who were so, will be sufficient for my present purpose. The father of St Gregory, bishop of Nazianzem, in Cappadocia, who was bishop of the same see, was married during his episcopacy. The saint tells us that his mother, Nonna, was not only no impediment to her husband, in his ministry, but of great service to him."—"St Gregory Nyssen, brother of St Basil the Great, who lived in the fourth century, was married to Theosebia, and never forsook her. St Basil's father, a bishop, and, by Alban Butler, denominated a saint, was married to Emilia, and had by her ten children; nine of whom survived him, and were all eminent for virtue. The reverend biographer tells us, in his life of St Basil, on the authority of St Gregory Nazianzen, that those among them who were married, and lived in the world, were no way inferior in piety to those who served God in holy virginity. Nicephorus speaks highly of St Basil's married brother, St Gregory Nyssen. Socrates tells us incidentally, that Spiridion, the distinguished bishop of Cyprus, was married; and likewise Eulalius, bishop of Cæsarea. And Dionysius in Eusebius (Hist. 6. 42.) relates that Chœremon, bishop of a city called Nile, fled to the mountain Arabius, with his wife, during one of the persecutions. It would be easy to swell the number of instances of this sort by the addition of those numerous similar ones which Vicelius supplies; but this would evidently be superfluous: inasmuch as the main point to be established is not whether many prominent individuals of the Christian hierarchy were married, after the example of the apostles, but whether, in early, and comparatively pure times; whether, when the instructions of the evangelists and apostles were of permanent authority; whether, before the pastors of the Christian church became rather generally disposed to emulate heresiarchs, and conciliate heathens; and whether, before temporal concerns had become intimately blended with ecclesiastical government, the generality of the clergy were married or not. And that they were so, throughout the Christian world, at least till the beginning of the seventh century, notwithstanding the almost incessant endeavours of the Popes, and the successive dissuasions of the philosophical fathers, to prevent their marriage, is, I maintain, incontrovertible.

"The only attempt which appears to have been made, antecedently to the fourth century, to induce the clergy by the exercise of episcopal authority, to practise celibacy, was that of Pynetus, bishop of Crete, about the year 170. But that attempt was seasonably discountenanced and frustrated by the pious primitive Dionysius, bishop of Corinth; who advised the former, in an epistle which he wrote to him on that subject, 'not to impose the heavy burden of continence upon his brethren, but to have regard to the infirmity of many.' 'Socrates and Nicephorus give us to understand that, in their respective ages, sacerdotal matrimony was common all over the east. And the twelfth canon of the Quinisext council informs us, that in Africa, Lybia, and other regions which belonged to the western, or Latin division of the Christian world, many most religious men who presided over the Church (and whose examples were, no doubt, followed by the generality of the clergy) lived in the matrimonial state. It is true, that the bishops of that council disapproved of, and prohibited that practice: the fact, however, is that alone about which I am at present concerned.'—'St Jerome says, that it was customary for deacons to marry before ordination, in order that marriage might not prove an obstacle to their advancement to the higher orders. And, in another place, he acknowledges, that married men were more frequently elected bishops than those who were single. The learned historian, Zonaras, who lived in the twelfth century, commenting on the fifth of the apostolic canons, speaks thus: 'This canon reminds us of the fact of even bishops having wives: for even bishops were not then prohibited from engaging in lawful connection with women.' And the learned Balsamon, who became patriarch of Antioch about the end of the same century, commenting upon the same canon, says, 'Before the sixth synod, which was held in the palace of Trullo, it was lawful for bishops to have wives, even after obtaining the episcopal dignity.'"—Letters on Constrained Celibacy, Let. IX.

The writer above quoted, proceeds to show that clerical matrimony was sanctioned by a number of councils. He does not only refer to his authorities; but he gives the very words in the original languages for the satisfaction of his learned readers. I do not know who the writer is; but he is evidently a man of great industry and research; and he writes like one who has no hostile feeling towards the church of Rome as a whole; but on the one point to which he has directed his attention, he certainly does exhibit her as the mother of abominations.

"The monk Augustin," says the author of the letters, Let. XVI. "acting on the instructions of Gregory the Great, was the first who attempted to enforce celibacy among the British clergy: and in order to facilitate his attempt, which was made in the year 600, he began, under the expressed permission of the Pope, with limiting it to the higher orders; although Leo had extended it to sub-deacons in all other parts of Europe, about one hundred and sixty years before. His attempt, however, proved abortive. In the year 975, Dunstan, another of the Pope's agents, followed his example; but his endeavours were equally unavailing: and, moreover, occasioned great disturbances. In the year 1102, Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, a primate, at least as devoted to the will of the Pope as any of his predecessors had been, induced the prelates, who composed the then council of London, to require imperatively the total abstinence of the clergy from their wives; but the consequences of this rigorous requisition were soon found to be shocking in the extreme, as I shall notice hereafter. Shocking, however, as they were, they had no effect whatsoever in dissuading the obsequious creatures of the Pope, from prosecuting their endeavours to substitute his tyrannical obligations in the place of evangelical liberty: for by the council which was assembled in London, in the year 1108, a decree was issued, purporting, that those priests who had not complied with the prohibition of the council of 1102, should either relinquish their wives, or forbear to say mass. The law of celibacy was further enforced by Pope Innocent II. in the year 1138; and at the same time (you will blush, my friend, on the recollection of the fact) those priests who had abandoned their wives, with whom they had become, as our Lord tells us, one flesh, indissolubly connected, in a mysterious manner, as himself to his true church, were tolerated in keeping concubines; and thus was the law of God, as declared by Moses, and by our blessed Saviour, outraged in a two-fold manner. But still, as we learn from Bale, who wrote in the 15th century, many learned and respectable clergymen persevered in their bounden fidelity to their wives. The sons of the married clergy, who officiated in the churches of England, were so numerous, about forty years before, that Pope Paschal II. in a letter to Anselm, giving them a dispensation to admit them to holy orders, assigned as his motive for doing so, that they constituted the greater and better part of the clergy."

The Pope, however, prevailed at last, as he did in almost every other scheme which he tried for the advancement of his own power, and the enslaving of the human race. He found that the clergy were never sufficiently devoted to his service; never enough detached from the ties of kindred and country, while they were allowed to form conjugal connections, and enjoy the endearments of a family. When he had prevailed upon them to relinquish all these, they became like men who had no particular interest in one country more than another. They were then the fit agents of his holiness, for promoting the honour and the interest of the see of Rome, in all parts of the world. Hundreds of thousands of them were saddled upon the nations of Europe, having scarcely any common interest with the people of these nations; and whose daily business it was to oppress and impoverish them, under the pretext of promoting the glory of God, and of the holy catholic church. It was not enough that men, in what is called holy orders, were compelled to separate themselves from domestic society; but hundreds of thousands of young women were doomed also to forego the society of parents, sisters, and brothers, and to spend their days in seclusion and celibacy, contrary to the design of their creation, and the express command of God. An inspired apostle teaches;—"I will that the younger women marry, bear children," &c. 1 Tim. v. 14. but partly by compulsion, and partly by allurement, vast multitudes of young women, in Popish countries, are shut up from the world, and obliged to take a vow that they will never marry, while many of them may be scarcely of an age to make a voluntary choice, whether they would prefer a single life or not. And the holy church is incessantly teaching, that celibacy is better, and more pleasing to God than marriage; that, in short, the state has great merit before God; that those who abstain from marriage become the favourites and the spouses of Christ: and thus the church becomes accessary to the everlasting perdition of those who perish through the belief of her lie.

The writer of the Letters on Celibacy, promised to show the shocking consequences that followed the imposition thus imposed upon both sexes; and he fulfils his promise in the most ample manner. I cannot, however, allow myself to follow him, or to quote his disgusting details, though the worst of them are given in Latin, without a translation. There is enough indeed in English, to fill every delicate mind with horror, even, at this day, when, in every newspaper, scenes of licentiousness are laid open to persons of all classes and ages. Certain facts, however, must be mentioned, to show that I am not proceeding upon the ground of vague general accusation.

"The practical libidinousness of the unmarried clergy was, every where, enormous and unbridled. Such was the dread which the people of Switzerland entertained of these reputed representatives of the Holy Ghost, that, as we are informed by Sleiden, they required them, in some of the cantons, to keep concubines, in order to prevent them violating their daughters and wives. (Com. l. 3.) The same reason induced the senate of Rome, as we learn from Thuanus, to petition the Pope for the continuation of the brothels, which he had intended to suppress. (His. l. 39. chap. 3.) Gualtier Mapes complained that the priests found means to excite in silly women a fear of damnation if they denied their persons to them." There is a host of authorities, almost entirely of the Church of Rome, and great dignitaries too, who concur in complaining of the unbounded licentiousness of the clergy; and they at last became so hardened in wickedness as to teach, that the greatest crimes were only venial sins, or scarcely any sins at all. "The obsequious divines Coster and Campeggio, held that priests were more criminal in marrying, than in keeping many harlots. (Cost. de cœl. sacerd. prop. 9.) And, perhaps, to allay the scruples of some libidinous confessors, adultery was authoritatively ranked among the lesser sins."

"In the remonstrance which certain divines of Germany presented to the Pope, accompanied by letters from the Emperor Ferdinand, and Albert Duke of Bavaria, soliciting permission for the clergy to marry, these divines assert, that 'among fifty catholic priests, hardly one will be found who is not a notorious fornicator.' They observe its having been maintained, by Cardinal Panormitan, that it would conduce to the salvation of souls, to permit the clergy to marry; and consider it a great absurdity (it was indeed much worse than an absurdity) not to admit married clerks; and yet to tolerate fornicators. (P. Sarp. Hist. Concil. Trent., p. 678.) This remonstrance is said to have made such a strong impression on the Pope, that he resolved to assemble pious and learned men at Rome, from all parts of Europe, to discuss the question, but was dissuaded from doing so by Cardinal Simonetta, for reasons of state." (ibid.) Letters, &c. Let. xx. It is easy to imagine what the reasons of state were. The priesthood had become so generally, nay, I may say, universally profligate, that to attempt to confine them to matrimony, might have endangered the stability of the papal throne. Fleury relates of Rasfold, Bishop of Munster, "that having received briefs from the pope, requiring him to banish concubines, and having published these orders in his diocese, he was mutinously opposed by all his canons. Disgusted with their scandalous lives, he, at length, voluntarily quitted his bishopric."—(Letters, &c. p. 302.) "The learned Aventinus, who lived in the early part of the 16th century, speaking of the clergy, in his life of Gregory VII. says, the greatest part of them, under the honourable name of chastity, committed every where, with impunity, fornication, incest, and adultery. Of the law of celibacy, he says, that law was by no means displeasing to certain clergymen, who, instead of one wife, sexcentas jam mulierculas licebat inire." Ibid. p. 268.

It was as early as the pontificate of Gregory the Great, that six thousand heads of murdered infants, the fruits of illicit sexual intercourse, were found in a fish pond: a discovery which, as Balæus informs us, induced Gregory to revoke the law of celibacy; which was however revived about forty-five years after, by Martin I. See Letters, &c. page 278. Now if such horrible effects resulted from the celibacy of priests and nuns, as early as the 7th century, what must not have taken place during the many dark ages that followed, among the thousands of what were called religious houses; but which were in fact brothels of the worst character, upon a large scale? In them was acted such scenes, that Cardinal Damiano published a complaint, in a book which he entitled "Gomorrah," because, I suppose, the wickedness of these religious persons reminded him of that of the five cities which God destroyed by fire and brimstone from heaven.

No. CXVII.

SATURDAY, October 7, 1820.

Among the causes that facilitated the Reformation in both England and Scotland, the profligacy of the clergy was none of the least considerable. The satirical poems of Chaucer in the former kingdom, and those of Sir David Lindsay and others in the latter, must have had a powerful effect upon the public mind. Rude as the bulk of the people may have been in point of knowledge, they could not but see the absurdity and the wickedness of men professing to be too holy to live in a state of marriage, while they were well known to keep their concubines, and to indulge themselves in all manner of licentiousness. That such was their conduct there is the concurrent testimony of all historians, even of their own faith, though modern Papists will deny it; and their Scotch oracle, Bishop Hay, labours to persuade his readers, that "nothing is more unjust than the conduct of mankind on this head," that is, the conduct of mankind in asserting that there are many of the clergy who transgress the law of celibacy, notwithstanding their great obligations to observe it. He admits that there have been "some;" that there have been "a few," who have transgressed; and he speaks as if this were no more than what may be expected "while men are men." He compares it to a Judas among the twelve apostles; a Nicholas among the seven deacons; an Ananias and Sapphira among the first Christians; an incestuous person among the disciples in Corinth. "No wonder, then," says he, "that among such great numbers as enter into the ministry of the church, some should be found who are a scandal to their character. But surely nothing can be more unjust and unreasonable, than to condemn that state of itself, because some of its members do not live up to the sanctity of it, or to attribute to the whole, what is only the fault of a few; yet such is the judgment of the world." After enlarging a little on the injustice of thus accusing the holy priesthood, in general, the author comforts his brethren with the following words: "But we need not be surprised at this, because our blessed Master himself says to his apostles, and in them to all their successors, 'If the world hate you, know ye that it hated me before you. If you had been of the world, the world would love its own; but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hates you.' John xv. 18, 19." Vol. ii. p. 141.

These words the bishop considers as addressed to the successors of the apostles, as well as to the apostles themselves. They are addressed therefore to every priest of the Romish church without exception; for they are all successors of the apostles. The grossest wickedness in their practice does not infer the forfeiture of this character, unless they shall be deprived by canonical authority; and there are few crimes that will incur this sentence except matrimony and heresy. All the world knows that heresy is one of the greatest crimes, and one for which many priests have been deprived of their holy orders, and burnt to death; and as for matrimony, this author tells us, that the church has decreed the severest penalties against such priests as shall be guilty of it, "having sometimes ordered them to be deposed, sometimes to be excommunicated, sometimes to be imprisoned in monasteries, to spend their whole life in penance." (See No. CXV.) Add to all this, the great curse which the Council of Trent pronounces against them, and it will appear, that matrimony in a priest is a crime of the first magnitude; but the holy fathers of the church may practise fornication, and even adultery, to any extent, without the least risk of being deprived of their holy orders, or degraded from being successors of the apostles; and when this fact is mentioned, for a fact it is, and when examples are given in detail, the bishop falls a wailing about the injustice that is done to men of his own order, and with unparalleled impudence, he applies for their comfort, the words which Christ addresses to his really holy and persecuted disciples.

Bishop Hay's representation, that lewd priests were only few in number, is a barefaced imposition upon his readers; for he could not but know the truth of the matter. But suppose, for argument's sake, that they were as few in proportion as a Judas among the twelve apostles, or one incestuous person in the church in Corinth, there is no injustice or unreasonableness in charging the wickedness of it upon the whole body, seeing it is tolerated by the whole. Judas separated himself from the company of the apostles. Ananias and Sapphira were by divine interposition separated from the church the moment their crime was discovered. Nothing was known against Nicholas when he was appointed to the deacon's office; and if it be true that he was the father of the sect of Nicholaitans, which is not absolutely certain, we know that the Head of the church condemned their deeds, and censured the churches that gave them any countenance; (see Rev. ii.) so that any church that suffered them to remain among them, would justly be charged with their crimes: and the church in Corinth is actually charged by the apostle Paul with the guilt of the incestuous person until they put him away; and in doing so, they cleared themselves of the matter. But the Church of Rome has never cleared itself of the guilt of suffering an abandoned and lascivious priesthood, and therefore the whole are justly chargeable with it.

Nay, it can be shown that concubinage was publicly allowed to the Romish priests for a small commutation or fine. On this subject a host of authorities might be produced. Among others, the work entitled, "Taxes of the Apostolic Chancery," is a standing evidence that a priest was allowed to keep a concubine for the easy annual charge of half-a-guinea. I gave extracts from this book in an early part of my work; and though Amicus Veritatis was pleased to deny its authenticity, he has not attempted to oppose to it any higher authority than his own word, which, without his real name, is of no value; and I shall not presume to say what it would be worth even with his name. I shall here, however, give a name of real value and weight in the Church of Rome, and repeat some of the words which I gave in page 22:—"Shameful to relate! they gave permission to priests to have concubines, and to live with their harlots, who have children by them, upon paying an annual tribute. And, in some places, they oblige priests to pay this tax, saying, that they may keep a concubine if they please. There is a printed book which has been publicly sold for a considerable time, entitled, The Taxes of the Apostolic Chancery, from which one may learn more enormities and crimes than from all the books of the summists. And of these crimes there are some which persons may have liberty to commit for money, while absolution from all of them, after they have been committed, may be bought. I refrain from repeating the words, which are enough to strike one with horror." Claudius Espenceus Com. ad cap. i. Epist. ad Titum, digress. ii.

This Claude D'Espence was a divine of great note in the Romish Church, and one whose word it would not be expedient for Papists to call in question. Let us see then how they evade the force of his testimony. The Catholic Vindicator, on whom Pax and Amicus Veritatis devolved the defence of their church, quotes from my work, and replies as follows:

—"I have proved, (he continues) in the words of a celebrated divine of the Romish church, that of the greatest crimes there were some that persons might have liberty to commit for money, while absolution from all of them, after they had been committed, might be bought. Such were my words and those of D'Espence, as repeated by me. But it so happened, that in the page in which I first quoted D'Espence's words, some inches farther down, I mentioned the name of Dupin. This afforded the Vindicator a loop-hole for escape, of which he took advantage in the following manner: "This celebrated Romish divine is no other than Dupin, whose works were condemned by the Sorbonne in 1693."—And then he gives one of my quotations from Dupin, relating to another part of the subject. See Cath. Vind. No. 1. Col. 7. If the reader will take the trouble of comparing this with the passage of THE PROTESTANT above referred to, and also with the 2d page of No. 1. in which I repeated part of the words, with D'Espence's name without Dupin being within sight, which latter is the passage which the Vindicator quotes, he will see, that it was not possible to substitute the one name for the other from mere mistake; but that the Vindicator must have done it purposely to deceive his readers. He dreaded the impression that was likely to be made by the authority of an unimpeachable witness, with regard to the abandoned lives of the Popish clergy, and therefore he ascribes the assertion of the fact to an author whom he considers unworthy of credit, because, it seems, his works had been condemned by the Sorbonne. It does not appear how this could affect his credibility with regard to matters of fact, which are asserted by other historians; but it was quite enough to serve the Vindicator's purpose with his Popish readers. This piece of deceit in the Vindicator's first Number, showed me what I had to expect in the sequel of his work; and my expectations were not disappointed. I could not, however, find a proper opportunity of introducing the subject till now.

Considering the above, and what is contained in my last Number, sufficient to establish the fact of the profligacy of the Popish clergy in general, I shall now proceed to give a more particular account of them, as they appear in the histories of our own country. Dr. Henry, in his history of Britain, cent. xv. makes the following curious statement: "At the king's command, the University of Oxford drew up a catalogue of those abuses in the church that needed reformation, to be laid before the Council of Constance. This catalogue consists of forty-six articles, and (although it was composed by clergymen) gives a most odious picture of the manner of the clergy at this period, particularly of their avarice and debauchery. Of each of these it will be sufficient to give one example. In the 27th article it is said 'It is notorious, that when a Pagan or a Jew, abandoning his former errors, desires to be purified in the holy fount of baptism, all his temporal goods are confiscated to the church; which, it is believed, prevents many Jews from being baptized. It would be pious and meritorious in the council to remedy this abuse. For when Philip baptized the Eunuch, he did not seize his chariot, or other goods he had about him at his baptism.' The 38th article represents, 'That the carnal and debauched lives of the clergy in our days, and their public fornications, which are never punished, (except perhaps with a small fine in private,) set an evil example before others; it would therefore be a holy thing, and contribute to the reformation of the church, if priests, of every rank and order, who were public fornicators, were obliged to abstain from saying mass for a limited time.'"

The above Report, drawn up by clergymen of the University of Oxford, plainly asserts the fact of the general profligacy of their brethren; and that they considered the offenders as brethren, is evident from the very slight punishment which they proposed to inflict upon clergymen who were "public fornicators;" namely, that they should be "obliged to abstain from saying mass for a limited time." Whereas had any one of them presumed to marry a wife, he would have been deposed, excommunicated, and perhaps imprisoned in a convent for life, to do penance for his crime. "Archbishop Bourchier," (says the same historian,) "in a commission he granted to his commissary-general to attempt some reformation, says that many of the clergy, both secular and regular, were ignorant illiterate blockheads, or rather idiots; and that they were as profligate as they were ignorant, neglecting their cures, strolling about the country with bad women in their company, spending the revenues of their benefices in feasting and drinking, in fornication and adultery."

This worthy primate died in 1486, and was succeeded by John Morton, bishop of Ely, who appeared extremely desirous of reforming the clergy. Complaints of their enormous wickedness were made from all quarters; and even the preachers at St. Paul's Cross were bold enough to declaim against their vices in the hearing of the laity. Archbishop Morton, in the abundance of his zeal, published a pastoral letter, calling upon his clergy to reform themselves. "In this letter," says Dr. Henry, "the good primate doth not trouble his clergy with recommending a single virtue, or reproving a single vice; but he charges them, with great solemnity, not to wear short liripoops of silk, nor gowns open before, nor swords, nor daggers, nor embroidered girdles; to be very careful of their tonsure, and to keep their hair always so short that the world may see their ears; and he threatens them with very severe censures if they do not obey these injunctions." Such was all the reformation that at first appeared to the primate of all England, as necessary among the clergy under his command.

By and by, however, he came to a better understanding of matters; for, in a letter to the abbot of St. Albans, which has been published, he charges him and his monks with the most odious vices, of which, he says, they were notoriously guilty. One of his crimes was that he had turned all the modest women out of the two nunneries of Pray and Sapwell, and filled them with prostitutes; that they were esteemed no better than brothels, and that he and his monks publicly frequented them as such. Such was the character and condition of these holy seminaries in the reign of Henry VII., and down to the period of the Reformation. For many more particulars, see Henry's History, cent. xv.

On the breaking out of the Reformation, Henry VIII. ordered a visitation of certain monasteries in order to their suppression. The following was the result, as given by Dr. Henry, cent. xvi., who refers to Strype, chap. 34, 35. "The visitors having received their commissions and instructions, were despatched into different parts of the kingdom at the same time, that the monks might have as little warning of their approach as possible. They executed their commissions with zeal and diligence, and made some curious discoveries almost in every house, not much to the honour of its inhabitants. In making these discoveries, they were greatly indebted to the violent factions which reigned among the monks and nuns, who informed against one another, and against their superiors. Accounts of their proceedings were transmitted by the visitors to the vicar-general, and contained sufficient materials to render the monastics completely infamous, and the objects of universal detestation, for their gross absurd superstition and idolatry, their infernal cruelty, their shameful impositions on the credulity of the people, their abandoned unnatural incontinency, their drunkenness, gluttony, and other vices. Some of the old abbots and friars did not attempt to conceal their amours, which they knew to be impossible. The holy father, the prior of Maiden-Bradely, assured the visitors, that he had only married six of his sons and one of his daughters out of the goods of the priory as yet; but that several more of his children were grown up, and would soon be marriageable. He produced a dispensation from the Pope, permitting him to keep a mistress; and he acquainted them that he took none but young maidens to be his mistresses, the handsomest he could procure; and when he was disposed to change, he got them husbands. But the page of history must not be stained with the abominations contained in the report of these visitors. It may be sufficient to lay before the reader, a short description of their contents in the preamble to the Act of Parliament which they produced: 'Forasmuch as manifest sin, vicious, carnal, and abominable living, is daily used and committed in abbeys, priories, and other religious houses, of monks, canons, and nuns; and albeit, many continual visitations have been heretofore had by the space of two hundred years and more, for an honest, charitable reformation of such unthrifty, carnal, and abominable living; yet nevertheless, little or none amendment is hitherto had, but their vicious living shamefully increaseth and augmenteth.' &c. It is but justice to notice, that though the corruption of the monastics in England at this time was very general, it was not universal: some in almost every monastery were regular in their conduct, and at their own desire were set at liberty. A few convents were found to be well governed and unexceptionable: and for the preservation of these the visitors pleaded with great earnestness."

In Scotland the state of matters was no better than in England, whatever worse. "Inferior benefices were put up to sale, or bestowed on the illiterate and unworthy minions of courtiers; on dice-players, strolling bards, and the bastards of bishops." M'Crie's Life of Knox, 1st ed. p. 15. "Again, (says the same author, page 16.) the lives of the clergy, exempted from secular jurisdiction, and corrupted by wealth and idleness, were become a scandal to religion, and an outrage to decency. While they professed chastity, and prohibited, under the severest penalties, any of the ecclesiastical order from contracting lawful wedlock, the bishops set the example of the most shameless profligacy before the inferior clergy; avowedly kept their harlots; provided their natural sons with benefices; and gave their daughters in marriage to the sons of the nobility and principal gentry; many of whom were so mean as to contaminate the blood of their families by such base alliances, for the sake of the rich dowries which they brought." The author adds in a note, "We need not appeal to the testimony of the Reformers, or to satirical poems published at the time, in proof of the extreme profligacy of the Popish clergy. The truth is registered in the acts of Parliament, in the decrees of their own councils, (Wilkins, Concil. tom. 4. p. 46—60; Keith's Hist. pref. 11.) in the records of legitimation, (Lord Hailes' Notes on Ancient Scottish Poems, p. 249, 250.) and in the confession of their own writers, &c." In another note, Dr. M. gives the following on the authority of Pitscottie: "They would thole no Priest to marry, but they would punish, and burn him to the dead; but if he had used then ten thousand whores he had not been burnt." Hist. p. 150, 152.

As an instance of what Dr. M'Crie mentions, of bishops marrying their natural children into noble families, I need only refer to the case of Cardinal Beaton, who, having burnt Wishart to death for heresy, seemed to have the whole kingdom at his feet. He had settled with the Earl of Crawford the preliminaries of marriage between that earl's eldest son and one of his natural daughters, named Margaret, with whom he gave a very large fortune; and had just celebrated the marriage, when, on his return to his castle at St. Andrews, he was murdered, as is recorded in all the histories of that time.

If Romish priests at present in England and Scotland are not more virtuous, they are under the necessity of being more circumspect, and more private in the practice of their vices. But in those parts of Ireland which have been least favoured with the light of the Reformation, we are informed by one of themselves, that the lives of the clergy are nearly as profligate as ever. "That the lives of the Roman Catholic clergy, at this day, in Ireland," says the Rev. Charles Bourke, "as well as on the Continent, are not much more correct than those of the clergy at the time of the Reformation, when Luther inveighed against them, is a melancholy truth which cannot be denied." Again, "The mistresses and children of reverend gentlemen can be shown, whenever they may choose to put it to the trial.—They themselves know that I can prove this assertion incontestably." See Popish Episcopal Tyranny Exposed, preface and page 45.

Hence it is, I suppose, that Popish writers continue so pertinaciously to accuse the reformers of unchastity. They know how vulnerable the character of their own clergy is on this point; and, in order to divert the attention of their opponents, and put them on the defensive, they become the assailants and accusers. In almost all their writings it is asserted as an undoubted matter of fact, that Luther both taught and practised this vice; though it is a fact, that among the many thousands of enemies which he had during his life, there were none that could produce the smallest evidence of any thing worse than that he married a religious woman; that is, a woman, who, like himself, was under a vow of chastity. Similar accusations were brought against other leaders of the Reformation, with an equal disregard of truth; and it is not more than two years since a reverend father had the effrontery to assert in the pulpit of the Popish chapel here, that Knox plundered the cathedral of St. Andrews of its sacred vessels, and used them in drunken revelry with his concubines. Knox was a married man, and after the death of one wife he took another. This is the worst that his enemies can prove against him; and yet it is under this that the above monstrous charge is made, because Papists will not allow that ladies whom priests marry can be their lawful wives, and therefore they apply the above opprobrious epithet.

I need not here discuss the lawfulness of breaking the monastic vow; but I have no hesitation in saying, that so far as it is a vow of chastity, it would, in the case of most persons, stand more chance of being observed in the state of marriage, than in the state of celibacy. This is plainly the doctrine laid down by the apostle, 1 Cor. vii. 2. As the first reformers saw it their duty to marry, so in the reformation that has lately begun in Germany, under Von Wessenberg, this privilege is allowed to the priests, which is striking at the foundation of the Papal power in that quarter. This is the principal crime that the Pope lays to the charge of the modern reformer, which is done in the following words, in a document signed by Cardinal Gonsalvi: "The nunciature of Lucerne lost no time in transmitting to your curia, as it was in duty bound to do, the strongest representations against such enormous and grave abuses, and especially against the greatest of all, namely, that of giving the power of marriage to persons dedicated to God by a vow of perpetual chastity." Reformation of the Catholic Church in Germany, &c. No. CXVIII.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14TH, 1820.

It would be easy to fill a dozen Numbers more with details of the horrible effects of clerical celibacy in the Church of Rome. The general licentiousness which it occasioned was not confined to the lower orders of the priesthood. All ranks were tainted up to the very head; and the head of the church himself was often worst of all. One can scarcely open the Lives of the Popes from the sixth century to the sixteenth, but he will find the most disgusting accounts of their debaucheries, and of the oppressions which they practised in order to provide fortunes for their natural children, whom they introduced to the world as nephews and nieces. But the world does not need to be informed on this subject; and I believe my readers will think they have had enough of matter so nauseous.

There is one thing more connected with this subject, to which I will advert in few words, and then proceed to something else: it is the inconsistency of calling matrimony a sacrament, and denying it to the clergy. In all other cases the priesthood insist upon having at least their own share of the good things of the church. The ordinances of divine appointment which are called sacraments, are given to the church as benefits; and they are signs of greater blessings than appear to the eye. The Church of Rome has made several foolish additions to their number: but she holds them all as good things, and profitable to be observed. She indeed uses stronger language than any judicious Protestant will do. "A sacrament," says Bishop Hay, "is an outward sensible action, or sacred sign, ordained by Jesus Christ, as a sure and certain means to bring grace to our souls." The subject is too serious for a pun, else I would defy the Church of Rome to prove that all their sacraments are *sensible actions: at least, not that one that sets all the senses at defiance. I will not, however, refuse this character to marriage; and if it be indeed a sacrament, and a sure and certain means to bring grace to the soul, I am sure it must be the most sensible thing the priests ever did, to take wives, and live like honest men. And perhaps it is because they neglect this sacrament, that all the other six have failed of their sure and certain effect with regard to many of them, as is but too evident from their graceless lives.

It is not my usual practice to begin a Number with the end of a subject, but sometimes, as in this instance, I find it expedient. †

Before entering upon another general head of discussion, I shall give place to a correspondent or two. The following is from my Galloway "Friend to fair dealing," whom I suspected to be a priest, and perhaps this is the principal reason why he is so very angry. If the reader will take the trouble of turning to my XCV. Number, he will see that I inserted only a part of a former letter from this gentleman, and my reasons for doing so. This is the avowed cause of his displeasure, although it is difficult to understand why he should have taken it so much amiss. I suppose he is the first that ever supposed that a periodical writer is obliged to print all that every man chooses to address to him, whether it be to the purpose or not.

"Sir,—I had not an opportunity of seeing your method of noticing my last letter to you till very lately. You have, I see, taken the method of all those who wishing to throw things unfavourable to their system into the back ground, represent only those features of the picture which are most for their advantage. It was a mean, cowardly artifice in you, not to give the public a full view of the arguments of your opponent, by presenting them with a faithful complete copy of his letter, and allowing them, without any fear of the consequences, to judge for themselves. I am aware, however, that some things were contained in that production, which it did not suit your purpose to give to public view. I must tell you, however, that I will permit no man to make free with altering my letters, or with giving a summary of their contents, but myself; more especially one whose interest it is that they should appear in a mutilated and distorted form. When you shall have given the public a bona fide transcript of my letter, I will proceed to reply to your answers to my queries, to refute some of your calumnious, ill-natured, ill-mannered, misrepresentations of Popery, and put some more queries to you. If you refuse to do that piece of justice, I will write no more to you on the subject, but after having made the public acquainted with the reasons of my silence, I will treat your arguments and production in the way they ought to have been all along treated; and which, in less than half a century, they will be treated with contempt.

"A Friend to Fair Dealing."

Now, in the first place, I wish this gentleman to understand, that I do not look upon even his correspondence as of so much value, that I will do an unreasonable thing to induce him to continue it; and that I consider his not writing to me any more as a matter of no very great importance. As I have the sole responsibility, I must be the sole judge of what is fit to appear in my pages. I have always felt reluctant to make my readers pay for extraneous and irrelevant matter; and, to avoid this, when at one time I was led into such matter, I gave the quantity of a whole Number gratis. (See No. L.) But I cannot afford to do the same with all that others may write. I suppose the feelings of my correspondent are not very acute on this score, as he has made me pay three postages of nine-pence half-penny each, which

---

* I am not sure if this word is used in the sense of wise, or judicious, or having good sense, south of the Tweed.

† Since writing the above, I have received the following communications, which I throw into a note here. The two anecdotes are not over decent, but they are such as one must expect to meet with, in reading on such a subject. My correspondent, who resides in Ireland, has given me the names of living authorities for both:—"A Roman Catholic gentleman, in the north of Munster, somewhat advanced in years, married a young and handsome wife, of the same communion. Naturally of a jealous disposition, and convinced of the corrupt principles and practices of his clergy, he would never permit the priest of the parish, or the friar who assisted him, to hear his wife's confession locked up together in a private room, according to the usual custom. But once a month, when the confession was to be heard, the priest attended for the purpose; and was obliged to shrive and absolve the lady in the lawn before the hall door, whilst the watchful husband sat in one of the windows of his drawing room, the rigid guardian of his wife's chastity, and his own honour." The following is of a more disgusting character:—"A full fed father Luke, in the county of Cavan, some years ago, had in vain attempted to seduce the affections of one of his fair parishioners. Soon after his repulse, he was consulted by the girl's father, on the disposal of her in marriage to a young man in a neighbouring county. The priest consented with reluctance, and the young people were made happy. Some months after he visited his young friend, and finding a convenient opportunity, he told her with horror in his looks, that she was pregnant of a monster. The woman was terrified, and such was her superstitious confidence in her guide, notwithstanding his former attempts upon her, that she believed his assertion; and it was not till he had made an infamous proposal, as a remedy for the evil, that she told the matter to her husband, who cudgelled the brute out of his house."

The following is from another correspondent:—

Extract from the translation of Sleidane's Commentaries translated by Jhon Dans, 1560, imprinted at London by Jhon Daye, for Abraham Veal and Nicholas England, 1560, 25th of September, L. III. fol. xxxv. xxxvi. "In many of theyr Townes it is the maner, that whan they receyue a newe minister of the churche, they bidde him take a lemane, lest he attempt to defyle honest women, whiche custome althoughe it be laughed at of many, yet was wittelye diuised as the tyme serued, and in so greate darkeness of doctrine depraued."—Bohun's Trans. of Sledan.

a little discretion would have taught him ought to have been paid by himself. Indeed all my Popish correspondents, whose letters came through the post office, are in the like fault, except one Glasgow one, whose discretion cost him only a penny. This is not a matter which I think worth complaining of as a hardship, but it is worth mentioning as a trait in the character of our Papists, and it stands in bold contrast with that of Protestants, for though their letters to me have been twenty, perhaps fifty times more in number, few of them cost me any thing.

This Friend to fair dealing gravely and authoritatively tells me, that he will permit no man, but himself, to do so and so with his letters; and I hereby assure him, that I will permit no man to dictate to me what I shall do with a letter, addressed to me, and for which I have paid ten times its value. I admit, at the same time, that he would have had cause to find fault, if I had given as his words, what were not his, or if I had given only detached scraps of his letter, separated from their connection, so as to misrepresent or conceal his meaning. But nothing of this kind have I done with his writing, or that of any other opponent. What I gave was a bona fide extract, containing an entire whole within itself, without the least dependence, for the understanding of its meaning, upon any other sentence in the sheet; so that I did not "alter" a single word, or even syllable, as he would insinuate when he says he will permit no man to do so but himself. He will not, he says, even permit any other man to give a summary of the contents of his letters; but how he is able to prevent this, I cannot divine, unless he shall keep them all carefully locked up in his secretaire.

This precious letter of his appears in his own esteem to be so weighty, that it did not suit my purpose to give it to public view. That is, I suppose, his arguments were so powerful, that I could not answer them, and feeling conscious of this, I had recourse to the "mean and cowardly artifice" of keeping them out of sight. I am perfectly willing thus to give his accusation in the plainest and broadest form; and I cheerfully meet it, by challenging him to publish his entire production to the world. It may be contained in a half sheet, about the size of one of my Numbers, and may be sold at the same price. If he has not retained a copy, I will deliver an exact transcript of the original to any printer whom he may authorize to receive it.

This undertaking of course ought to be at his own risk; but lest he should have before his eyes the melancholy fate of the Catholic Vindicator, whose numbers might have been bought for twopence per pound weight, as one of the retailers of it told in his public shop; I hereby promise to give it all the publicity that an advertisement in my Work can give. I make this offer from a real desire that the public may see what he considers so formidable, and for my own justification in declining to insert the whole letter,—every clause of which it would be easy to answer; but in answering it, I would be led many degrees away from my controversy with the Church of Rome, in order to give the history, and discuss the merits of the Glasgow Church Bill; and other matters equally irrelevant, for which see a more particular account in my summary of the letter in my XCV. Number.

If it shall be asked, why not gratify him at once by printing it entire? I answer again, that I did not at first think it right to tax the purses and the patience of my readers, by presenting them with such a great mass of useless words; and though my determination on this point might have been altered by a respectful request, I am not disposed to be influenced to change my opinion, or my procedure, by an "ill-natured" and "ill-mannered" threat. Besides, it appears that this "friend to fair dealing" sees my Work only occasionally. My extract and remarks on his former letter, were published on the 6th of May: and, in September, he writes, that he had not seen them till very lately, from which I infer that he is not a subscriber. He has no right, therefore, to demand insertion of his letter, and to make others pay for what he does not pay for himself. And, farther, it appears that he has not read the whole of my work, else he would find that I have answered, at least in part, what he calls upon me to answer again.

After all, I suspect that my correspondent has merely made a pretext for the purpose of securing what he will conceive to be an honourable retreat, and so to get quit of a controversy which he dreads entering farther into, seeing he cannot get me to enter the lists with him on subjects quite unconnected with the Popish errors which I am exposing. Why does he not reply to what I have written on transubstantiation, and purgatory, and auricular confession, and the worship of creatures, and those other points which affect the vitals of the system? The reason is, he does not choose to commit himself, in a country so enlightened as Scotland, by avowing the real doctrine of Rome on such points, and he dares not deny them, else he might suffer the censure of his superiors, and even canonical deprivation, if he be, as I suppose, a priest. Like other writers of his communion, therefore, he catches at some casual expressions, which are of about as much importance in relation to the controversy, as the vane of a kirk steeple is to the doctrine of the church; and because he cannot prevail upon me to waste my time, and exhaust the patience of my readers, by discussing such trifles, he cries out about my meanness and cowardice; and ventures gravely to predict, that in less than half a century, my arguments will be treated with contempt. I thank him for giving me so long a lease of the good opinion with which I have the honour to be regarded by the public; and I wish he may live to renew the grant, in case it shall turn out that he is not a true prophet.

Now, if he were to honour me with another letter, the last sentence will furnish him with matter for a very long one. He would probably ask a dozen questions about the nature of leases, and upon what premises I made the conclusion that he had granted me one for fifty years? what was the criterion of public opinion? from what circumstance I inferred the probability of his living fifty years? and how was a false prophet to be known from a true one? This will appear very ridiculous; but it is precisely the manner in which this correspondent writes away from the subject, and attempts to draw me away from it.

I insert the following letter, not because I intend to enter at present upon the subject of "Catholic emancipation," but because it proves that certain facts and features of the character of Popery, which I have been honoured to bring to view, have altered the opinion of some, and I believe not a few, on that very important subject.

"TO THE PROTESTANT.

"Glasgow, Sept. 11th, 1820.

"Sir,—I am a protestant dissenter, and a hearty friend to religious liberty, as I understand it. I have been for thirty years a friend also to Catholic emancipation in Ireland, and sincerely hoped it would be attained. However, from the recent conduct of the heads of the Popish church, I begin to doubt if this object be desirable. The Popish clergy are now exhibiting themselves in an attitude the most hostile to religious liberty. Common sense would say that no person has a right to molest or interrupt another in the exercise of religion, and in obeying his conscience. But if a person's conscience shall dictate to him that he is to violate the person, or property, or civil good name of others; or to debar them from the peaceable exercise of their industry, or of their religion, and if he shall call this religion —in a word, if he do to others, in those matters, what he would reckon an outrage if done to himself or his friends, he must be restrained. He, and his conscience, and his religion, must be all shut up in some bedlam or prison, or put into safe custody of some sort, which will prevent violent aggressions on others, and tumults in society.

"If Popery be indeed what it is represented to be by the titular Archbishop of Dublin, in his letter inserted in No. CXIII. of the Protestant, it is obviously a religion which requires restraint, and cannot safely be allowed to go at large.—On Sunday, August 2d, 1819, a school in Samson's Lane, Moore Street, Dublin, was peaceably employed in the usual exercises of teaching, and learning to read the Bible, when a Popish priest entered, interrupted the business, forced the books out of the hands of several of the children, and forced the children out of the school.—Now surely this conduct of this priest was highly outrageous. He had a right, which no person could justly forbid, to persuade parents not to send their children to such schools. No person had any right to hinder him from visiting all the parents who submitted to his authority, at their homes, and there charging them not to suffer their children to attend such schools, or to recall them instantly. In such visitations, none might prohibit him from using all his influence with parents and children, in support of such charges and commands. Nay he might publicly denounce in his own chapel, all such schools, and curse, if he pleased, three times a day all such schools, teachers, scholars, and all who should give them any countenance. But to go into another man's school-house, to interrupt the exercises, to seize the books, and to force away the pupils, was conduct to be restrained by the police.

"If this conduct is permitted with impunity, then, as often as a Popish priest thinks any of the young folks of his congregation are attending a parish church, or a dissenting meeting, he has a right to enter, to interrupt the public exercises, to force the Bibles, prayer-books, and hymn-books, out of the people's hands, and to drive such as he calls Catholics out of the place. If he cannot do this single-handed, he has a right to employ help. Nay, if such conduct is permitted, it will be equally right to make similar invasions on Popish chapels, as often as professed Protestants are suspected of being present. Every man must see how insufferable and destructive of peace such conduct would be.—Yet, in the judgment of the Archbishop of Dublin, (from his residence the most important Popish authority in Ireland,) the conduct of this priest was right, and exhibited a true practical view of Popery.

"He writes:—'Conformably to these maxims, and to the uniform discipline of the Catholic Church, Rev. Mr. S. went to your school to withdraw the Catholic children from it, at the very time when religious and moral instruction were given, particularly to children, in Liffey Street parish chapel. He cannot, on this account, be justly accused of opposition to the constituted authorities, which allow the free exercise of the Catholic religion, and the authority of its ministers to instruct the ignorant of their communion.'

"If such conduct be conformable to the 'uniform' discipline of the Popish church, and if liberty to act so be what Popish priests and others are urging after as the free exercise of their religion, it is obvious that this free exercise is totally inconsistent with the civil peace of society. When, allured by the novel charms of the organ, and of chanting in an unknown language; and by the glare of sacerdotal paraphernalia and trappings, many of the Presbyterians, and others of Glasgow, attended the Popish chapel in Clyde Street; how would Mr. S. and his adherents have felt if all the other pastors in the city had bolted in, interrupted the service, and driven away every one his own adherents, or attempted to drive them away. This would justly have been reckoned persecution; but it would have been a piece of conduct quite parallel to that which the Archbishop of Popery in Dublin calls the free exercise of the Catholic religion. Papists have a right, before men, to inculcate certain of their principles, by all means of moral suasion and religious motives; but such a right must be used by them 'salvo jure cujusque,' reserving to all others a similar right. They have a right to consider their own tenets true, and the only true tenets; but they must leave, and magistrates must leave to others the right to think them false. These principles the Archbishop does not recognise. He blames Protestants for inviting Catholic children to their schools; but he would glory in proselyting others, children or adults. He would not treat others as he would be treated, but would urge on others the paramount authority of his church.—Yours, AN IRISHMAN."

W. D. has favoured me with another letter, a great deal longer than either of his former ones; and has put me to the expense of double postage. I request him to publish it in a separate pamphlet, and I shall answer it when I come to treat the question, How we know the Bible to be the word of God, independently of the authority of the Church of Rome? In my reply to his last, I called upon him to inform me from what pulpits he had heard the doctrine asserted, that God revealed one religion to one country, and a contrary one to another, which he said he had "often heard from men of good education, even from the pulpits;" and the following is his answer:—"Well, Sir, I shall do more than you require, to convince you of what I said. If you take the trouble to go into the Presbyterian church of Scotland, you may depend upon it that the reverend minister will tell you, that his is one of the true religion; next be pleased to step into the Episcopal church of England, and you may rely upon it you will hear the same," &c. &c. In this manner W. D. makes a tour of a number of sects; and because every one maintains the truth of its own distinguishing peculiarity, he asserts that he hears from their pulpits, that God has revealed one religion to one people, and a contrary one to another! A man who can shuffle in this manner, has no right to expect that I shall hereafter respect his communications as I have done.

No. CXIX.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21ST, 1820.

THE following letter is written in a better spirit than most of those which I have received from adherents of the Church of Rome. It has, besides, the advantage of having a defined object; and that object is one of the principal points of the controversy. Therefore, though it be very long, as the writer himself acknowledges, I shall give it entire:—

"TO THE PROTESTANT.

"4th July, 1820.

"Sir,—Being a reader of your papers, and at present a member of that church against which they are directed, I have at times thought of laying before you some of the defences usually made by Catholics, in reply to their Protestant opponents, with my occasional remarks; in order that I might request the favour of your opinion upon them, as they might not be within the plan which you have adopted, but which you may perhaps have no objections to notice for the instruction of one, who, according to your belief, is not at present in the right road: yet, he is one who is not inclined to remain with any particular church, if he see sufficient grounds for forsaking it.

"Therefore, seeing you have lately commenced a subject, upon which, according to your correspondent J. C. the 'whole Popish system is built,' viz. 'on that supposed supremacy bestowed exclusively on Peter,' I have now ventured to trouble you with a few observations on this foundation of the papal system, with the hope, that if you think them worth your notice, you will with your convenience spare a page or two, for a few remarks thereon.

"In the first place, then, Christ promised to build his church upon a rock. Commenting on this, you say that this rock on which Christ promised to build his church, was not Peter, but himself:—on the other hand, St. Peter is, by Catholics and even by learned Protestants, said to be this rock; for that Christ, as a reward to Simon for the ardour of his love, strength of his faith, and the ready confession of his divinity, said to him, 'Thou art Peter, (that is, thou art a rock;) and upon this rock I will build my church.' 'And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven,' &c. Here, under the metaphor of the keys, Catholics say, that Christ declares his making Peter the chief governor of his church; in the same way, as when the keys of a city are delivered to a man, he is made ruler or governor of that city. When on the subject of the rock, in giving your definition of the Greek noun Petros, you say it signifies 'a stone,' viz. 'such a stone as we can handle, move, or turn over;' and that Christ, in giving him that name, meant to signify his mobility or fickleness. Now, from what I can see from the Greek Lexicons, which are commonly used in our Protestant schools, it seems to me that Petros could as easily be rendered English, a rock, as a stone, and much easier than that of 'a loose moveable stone,' as your Number has it. So that I must still consider Peter to be the rock on which the church was to be built, until I see a reasonable account why this name was conferred upon him. As for your saying that it was to signify his versatility, it seems to me rather paradoxical; for 'when names were given to men as recorded in Scripture, whether compounded or not with the names of animals or inanimate things, it was done in allusion to the natures and qualities of these animals or things.' (PROTESTANT, No. XCIX.) This I consider to be perfectly applicable; so that Christ, in giving to Simon the name of Peter or rock, thereby signified the firmness of his faith, and the eminent station he was to hold.

"In No. C. you say, 'it is the avowed doctrine of St. Augustine, one of Rome's greatest oracles, that Christ did not promise to build his church upon Peter, but upon himself, the rock which Peter had confessed.' In opposition to the quotation you make from St. Augustine, I will lay one before you, from that Divine's Psalm against the Donatists: in it he says, 'reckon up the prelates in the very see of Peter, and in that order of fathers, see which has succeeded him. This is the rock over which the proud gates of hell prevail not.' These words carry with them a very different meaning from what you give as the avowed doctrine of this father. And one of his cotemporaries, in writing on this subject, uses words that plainer cannot be, to show the belief of the age in which they lived. 'Christ predicts, that not Simon, but Peter shall be his name; by the word opportunely signifying, that on him, as on a firm rock, he was about to build his church.' St. Cyril of Alex. L. II. in Joan. c. 12th. Thus far the opinion of the fathers of the beginning of the fifth century, to which you refer; let us, however, see what those of a still older date say upon this subject, as their testimony must have still greater weight. In the third century we find Origen saying, 'consider what was said by the Lord, to that great foundation of the church, and that most firm rock, on which Christ built his church, O thou of little faith, why didst thou doubt? Matt. xiv. 31.' Hom. V. in Exod. About the same time St. Cyprian writes, 'For the Lord in the first place gave to Peter, on whom he built his church,' &c. Ep. lxxiii. Again, 'Peter whom the Lord chose the first, and on whom he built his church,' &c. Ep. lxxi. In the fourth century St. Gregory of Nazianzen writes, 'You see how Peter, among the disciples of Christ, all great, and all worthy of choice, is called a rock, and receives, on the profession of his faith, the foundations of the church; while John is particularly beloved, and rests on the breast of Christ; and the other disciples bear this preference without repining.' Orat. XXVI. 'The memory of Peter, the head of the apostles, is celebrated, and with him, that of the other members of the church. But the church of God is firmly built on him. For he, according to the prerogative granted to him by the Lord, is that firm and solid rock upon which the Saviour built his church.' St. Gregory of Nyssa, Orat. II. Add to these St. Chrysostom, St. Epiphanius, St. Basil, &c. who all use words equally strong with those above noticed.

"In addition to these venerable names, I will now bring forward one or two respectable Protestant writers in favour of this subject; for example, Whitaker writes,* 'We do not deny Peter to have been the foundation and the governor of the church, neither shall we at all hesitate (if required) to acknowledge its having been promised to him in the words,' &c. Whit. Cont. 4. q. 2. ch. 2d. In another place he says, 'Who doth not confess that Peter is the rock and foundation of the church?' Contra Dureum, L. V. Sect. 4th. To Whitaker's declarations join those of a celebrated dignitary of the English church in the present age; viz. the celebrated Dr. Marsh; a writer whose Anti-Catholic principles are well known. Yet he, in his 'Comparative View of the Churches of England and Rome,' p. 213, (in which work he wishes to show that the conduct of the Church of Rome is in general repugnant to the inspired Word of God,) has candidly shown that the words 'Thou art Peter, and on this rock I will build my church,' must mean 'Thou art rock by name, and shalt be rock indeed; for on thee,' &c. When noticing those who hold a contrary opinion, he says, they 'have taken such unsuccessful pains to show, that our Saviour, under the word rock, did not understand St. Peter.'

"It was my intention that this letter should have been principally occupied by the subject of the supremacy; but that of the rock has filled more of my paper than I expected, so that I must confine myself chiefly to what you advance in regard to St. Augustine.

"You say 'It must be admitted this Divine was not a thorough-bred Papist. It was some ages after his time, that the man of sin came to maturity, or that the Pope was declared Universal Bishop. Augustine was not fully initiated in the doctrine of Peter's supremacy.' —PROTEST. No. C. With regard to these points, I am at present of a different opinion. In the first place, I find Pope Victor so early as the second century exercising his power as Universal Bishop, when he threatened to excommunicate the Bishops of Asia Minor, for keeping Easter at an undue time; and none of them charged him with usurping a power which did not belong to him.—Euseb. L. V. Hist. Eccles. c. 24. In the third century St. Cyprian, Ep. 67, wrote to Pope Stephen, desiring him to despatch his letters into the province and to the people of Arles, by which they might be authorized to depose Marcianus the Bishop of Arles, and substitute another in his place. In the fourth century, Pope Julius cited St. Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria, the second patriarch of the church, to his council at Rome, to answer the accusations of his adversaries; he accordingly did appear and was there cleared.—Vide St. Athan. Apol. ag. the Arians. The same Pope, about the same time, restored, by his authority, to their respective sees, whence they have been deposed by the Eusebians, St. Paul, Bishop of Constantinople, St. Lucius of Adrianople, Marcellus of Ancyra, and Ascelpas of Gaza, in Palestine; and this he did, says Sozomenus, 'because, by reason of the dignity of his see, the care of all belonged to him.'—L. III. c. 8. And about the time of St. Augustine, Pope Celestine deputed St. Cyril, patriarch of Alexandria, to proceed as his delegate to the excommunication of Nestorius, patriarch of Constantinople.—Tom. III. Concil. Labbe, p. 349. From these historical facts, we see the Pope acknowledged Universal Bishop for ages before St. Augustine; and if I had room, the proofs could easily be carried up to the beginning of the seventh century, at which time some Protestants pretend the Pope received his supremacy from Phocas, Emperor of Constantinople, who began his reign anno 602.

"Now for a few words, whether or not St. Augustine was 'fully initiated' in the doctrine of the supremacy? You say he was not; but, from the following extracts, I am inclined to think he was. In his work, De Donat. Dysidis, he says, 'If we are to consider the series of Episcopal successions, with how much greater certainty we number from Peter, to whom, as representing the whole church, Christ said, On this rock I will build my church. To Peter succeeded Linus,' &c. In another place, 'For who can be ignorant that the most blessed Peter is the first of the apostles?' In Evang. Joan. 'Peter among the apostles, the first, the most ardent in his love of Christ, often answered for the rest.' Serm. xiii. And again, 'The apostle Peter, on account of the primacy of his apostleship, represented the church; as to himself by nature he was one man, by grace a Christian; but, by a more abundant grace, the first apostle.'—In Evang. Joan. To reconcile these extracts from the works of St. Augustine, with what you say in regard to that father, I am quite unable; for here, by the expressions he makes use of, he seems most 'fully initiated' in the belief of the supremacy. In the most explicit terms, he repeatedly calls him the first of the apostles; and in the last quotation, he uses words, that plainer cannot be, to show his belief in the superiority of Peter, viz. that by reason of his primacy he represented the church. The supremacy of St. Peter, and his successors, is not only clearly laid down by Eusebius, S. S. Leo, Cyrils, Gregories, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Jerom, &c. about the time of St. Augustine, but also by Origen and St. Cyprian of the third century, Tertullian and Irenæus of the second; all of whom agree in styling Peter the head and pillar of the church, and the bishops of Rome his successors.

"The purity of the church, for the first five centuries, is acknowledged by the most learned Protestants, which is the reason that I have given in this letter so many of the testimonies of the writers of those times. The famous Jewel, in his answer to Harding, writes: 'St. Augustine, and the other godly fathers, rightly yielded reverence to the see of Rome, for the purity of religion there preserved a long time without spot. The godly fathers of those times, seeking to the Church of Rome then for purity of religion, most famous above all others,' p. 246. And Whitaker, in his work on Antichrist, says: 'During the first 500 years, the church was pure, and inviolably taught the faith delivered by the apostles,' p. 31.

"In one of your late Numbers, you say that you bring the authority of the fathers against the Catholics, when you think their opinion is in your favour, as it must have great weight with them on their own principles; yet, when the fathers are in favour of the Catholics, you add, you care no more for their opinion than for that of any divine of the present age. But, when I consider that a number of important passages in the New Testament are subject to so many various and contradictory interpretations, by what means are we to come to the knowledge of the true meaning of those passages, if it be not by a reference to the writings of those eminent men who flourished in the apostolic age, or those ages immediately succeeding? for they certainly had every opportunity of knowing the belief and practice of the apostles, which, without doubt, would be carefully preserved and handed down from age to age by the Christian churches. So that, on account of the times and circumstances in which they were placed, the fathers had surely a better opportunity of knowing the true meaning of the inspired writings than any divine of the present age can pretend to. But you may perhaps give in answer, what you said in one of your Numbers some time ago, viz. that as the writings of the fathers were, for so many ages, only in the hands of the Papists, they could make such interpretations in them as they thought necessary to answer their own purposes. If that were the case, how did it come to pass, that they were so inconsiderate as not to alter the more important part viz. the New Testament, in such a manner, as that it would have been more explicit on those disputed points upon which the fathers are so clear? Certainly they had the one in their power as much as the other. If it be said, they did make such alterations in the New Testament, where then did the Reformers at first get a copy for the instruction of their followers?

"Before finishing, I beg leave to say a few words on the supremacy in general.

"When, to show that Peter had no superiority, you bring forward St. Paul, in 2 Corinthians ch. xii. 11th, saying, that he was equal with the very chiefest of the apostles; in answer, is not the apostle here speaking in regard to his labours, miracles, &c. in which, without doubt, he was inferior to none?

"You say, that if St. Peter were the head of the apostles, how did St. Paul come to withstand him to his face at Antioch? The apostle, in the same place, tells us the reason—because he was to blame. And no one doubts, but that a superior, when in fault, may sometimes be lawfully reprehended by an inferior. St. Cyprian, writing on this subject, says, in his 71st Epistle, 'Nor did Peter, whom the Lord chose the first, and on whom he built his church, when afterwards he disagreed with Paul concerning circumcision, arrogate any thing to himself; saying, that he held the primacy, and that he ought to be obeyed by those who came after him. He despised not Paul because he had persecuted the church, but listened to the advice of truth, and assented to reason.'

"In short, that St. Peter was chief of the apostles, see satisfactory proofs in the Bishop of Lincoln's Elements of Christian Theology, vol. i. part second, xxv. p. 476,—an author whom no person can accuse of being a friend to the Catholic cause.

"In conclusion, I must apologize for the length to which I have carried my Letter, but I expect you will pardon the first offence against good breeding. So I finish with the hope, that you will excuse any inaccuracy of expression in one of the first attempts of

"Your humble servant,— JUVENIS."

Instead of making a particular reply to all the matters contained in the above, I request my readers to revert to what has been already said on the subject of Peter's supremacy, and that of the Pope, in THE PROTESTANT, No. XCIX. to CIV., inclusive. Juvenis manages his argument with more skill than I would expect from a mere youth; and yet he has not succeeded in proving that any one of my facts is doubtful, or any one of my arguments erroneous or inconclusive. The foundation on which such a fabric as the papal supremacy is built, ought surely to be very solid; but nothing that Juvenis has alleged, tends to invest it with this character.

He makes a fundamental mistake in the very outset, which vitiates the whole of his first argument. "In the first place," says he, "Christ promised to build his church upon a rock."

Now, there is no such promise in the New Testament. The mere English reader may see, that these are not Christ's words; but he who understands Greek, will perceive, in a much stronger light, that the above is not Christ's meaning. The original words, ταύτῃ τῇ πέτρᾳ, are properly rendered by my correspondent J. C. This THE rock. Allowing that the word πετρος may signify rock, as well as stone, it points to no particular object; but the phrase, this the rock, points to a definite object, already known and acknowledged as the Rock of Israel. But after all, Petros was not the name which Christ gave to this apostle, but only a translation of it into Greek. Christ and his apostles spoke the language of the common people, which was the Syro-Chaldaic; and the name which Simon received was, in that language, Cephas, which the evangelists usually translated into Greek, the language in which they wrote the gospels. Our translators have, in general, retained the Greek word in an English form; but, in one instance, when they had the word Cephas itself to translate, they gave it the true English rendering:—"Thou art Simon, the son of Jonah; thou shalt be called Cephas, which is, by interpretation, a stone;" John i. 42. Whether it be a moveable stone or not, it is merely a stone; or, even allowing the word to be translated in favour of my opponent, it is merely a rock, and cannot be the Rock on which the church is built, any more than a god among the gods many, can be the living and true God. My correspondent is equally unfortunate in his reference to the Greek Lexicons commonly used in our schools. These are chiefly Greek and Latin; and they do not profess to give the English of any Greek word: but there are two valuable Greek and English Lexicons, by means of which, a knowledge of the original language of the New Testament may be acquired without the intervention of Latin. These are the works of Ewing and Parkhurst. The former renders the word πετρος, a large stone, a piece, or fragment of a rock. The latter says, "Homer uses it constantly, I believe, for a large stone, i. e. a piece or fragment of a rock, but such as a strong man might throw."

I repeat, that with regard to any point of doctrine, or the meaning of any text of Scripture, St. Augustine is no greater authority than any other divine of ancient or modern times. I cited him to establish the fact, that the ancient fathers were not agreed about Peter's supremacy; and all that Juvenis cites from his other works, goes only to prove this other fact, that he was not agreed with himself; but wrote different, and even opposite sentiments, at different periods of his life. I make this remark upon the supposition, that what Juvenis quotes are really the words of Augustine; though if he, or the authors from whom he quotes, refer to the editions that have undergone the expurgatorian process of the index, he cannot be sure whether they are his words or not. All the other fathers whom he cites are liable to the same objection; but though it were otherwise, I account them of no authority whatever, in support of a system of religion, which ought to rest on nothing less than divine authority. Thus the second argument of my correspondent falls to the ground like its predecessor, because it was built upon a foundation too weak to bear the weight of one article of faith, or one ordinance of worship; much less could it bear the weight of a whole system, like that of Popery, which professes to influence heaven, and earth, and hell.

As for the respectable Protestant divines who have conceded to the Church of Rome, that Peter is the rock on which Christ built his church, I have nothing to do with them, but to marvel at their inconsistency. As a Protestant, I claim the privilege of thinking for myself, and am not to be influenced by great names, to adopt a sentiment which appears to me inconsistent with the Word of God, and with those promises, in particular, which assure the absolute security of the church, so that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it, whereas the enemy prevailed against Peter, once and again; and if the church has no more solid foundation than a mere creature, we cannot be sure of her stability for an hour.

No. CXX.

SATURDAY, October 28th, 1820.

I had asserted, that St Augustine was not a thorough-bred Papist; that it was some ages after his time that the man of sin came to maturity, or that the Pope was declared universal bishop: and that Augustine was not fully initiated in the doctrine of Peter's supremacy. I assert the same still; and every reader of church history knows it to be the fact, that the title of universal bishop was not conceded to the Pope of Rome for a long time after Augustine's death, and Gregory the Great declared, that the man who should assume that title, was the forerunner of Antichrist in his pride. (See Prot. No. CIV.) This is not like one of those doubtful maters about which historians grope in the dark, without being able to come to a satisfactory conclusion. It is as clearly recorded as any thing of the kind can be And what does my correspondent oppose to the well-known fact? Nothing, but that he is "at present of a different opinion." Then, as the ground on which he forms his opinion, he refers to certain Popes claiming universal jurisdiction, long before the time of Augustine, and he mentions an instance of an individual submitting to the claim, and, therefore, the Popes are said to have exercised the power of universal bishops. We know that the claim was made by certain individual bishops of high ambition, and was rejected with abhorrence by some churches in the east, long before the Pope of Rome was formally invested with it. That he claimed this high title, and professed to exercise universal jurisdiction at an earlier period, is no evidence that his title was acknowledged. It is but two years since a Popish priest in Glasgow, after the solemn farce of high mass, before an immense congregation of Protestants, who had gone to witness the ceremony, claimed the right and exercised the power, of denouncing, from the pulpit, the writer of these pages, and of virtually, if not actually excommunicating him. This holy father claimed, and even professed to exercise, a power and jurisdiction over my soul and body; but it does not follow, that he had a legal right to such power, or was acknowledged to possess it. No more does the claim of Pope Victor, and other early demagogues, over other churches beside their own, prove that they had a good title to exercise such power, or that it was generally conceded.

Juvenis tells me, that "the purity of the church of Rome for the first five centuries is acknowledged by the most learned Protestants." Before I concede this point, I must be informed what it is, that, in the opinion of these Protestants, constitutes church purity. I am sure that I could point out many impure things in that church, before the expiry of the fifth century; and yet I am willing to concede, that until that period she was comparatively pure. She was not then defiled by the absurdity of transubstantiation and the idolatry of the mass; nor was the worship of images then generally practised; nor were the clergy then forbidden to marry; nor was it then allowed to them to keep concubines; and there are fifty other abominable things which were not then countenanced, but which sprung up in the dark ages that followed, and are now so essentially incorporated with the system that they cannot be separated from it. But what does my correspondent gain by asserting the purity of his church for 500 years? This is a tacit admission that she has been impure for more than double the time, seeing he has not a word to say in her behalf since the end of the fifth century. It would be rather an ungracious way of complimenting an old man, to say, that the first twenty years of his life were spent virtuously, but as for the subsequent part, the less that is said the better. Now, it is chiefly the present state of a church, with which its members have to do. I advise Juvenis, therefore, not to satisfy himself with the notion, that his church was pure thirteen hundred years ago, seeing her more recent history presents her in a light so extremely bloated with every species of impurity; and seeing he professes himself not inclined to continue within her pale, if he sees sufficient grounds for forsaking her; I request him to pay attention to his Bible, and follow where he shall find it to lead, leaving the works of fathers and saints of the church to the worms and the moths, who will digest them with much more advantage to themselves, than he will ever be able to do.

My correspondent inquires why his church may not have corrupted the text of the Bible, seeing they had it in their hands, as well as the writings of the fathers, which they are said to have corrupted? To this it may be replied, that the Church of Rome was not the sole depository of the Word of God, else we cannot say what liberties she might have taken with it. We know that the Old Testament has been carefully preserved by the Jews; and we know that the New Testament was received by many churches in the east, over which the Church of Rome could never prevail; and by them has been preserved to this day; so that it was not possible for Papists to make any material alteration in the Divine Word, without exposing themselves to detection. This, however, is a subject which requires more particular discussion; and I will have an opportunity of entering fully into it, when I come to reply to Mr. Andrews.

When I find the authority of ancient fathers against the present doctrine of the Papists, I consider it perfectly fair to adduce it, because it is an authority which they acknowledge, and to which, upon their own principles, they ought to submit; but when such authority is brought against the Protestant doctrine, I am not obliged to submit to it, for I never acknowledged it.

I will give all due respect to the fathers, as witnesses of matters of fact which came within their own knowledge, so far as they give a consistent testimony; but when they appear as expounders of the Divine Word, I consider them in no higher light than the present Rector of Aston Sandford, or the late Independent Minister in Chester, or any other parish priest or dissenting minister, who may write a commentary on the Scriptures. I have here in my eye certain works of great value, but they are human compositions; and no man ought to trust them implicitly, in their exposition of any text, but ought to judge for himself, as he must give account for himself, at the great day.

Juvenis has fallen into a great mistake, and I believe it is a prevalent one with persons of his communion, and perhaps with some others; namely, that the fathers who lived near the apostolic age, had better opportunities of knowing the meaning of what the apostles taught, than persons who are alive at this day.

This might have been true, if the apostles had trusted the communication of what they taught to oral tradition; but seeing they put their instructions in writing, any man who understands the writing, though he should live at the distance of two thousand years, is as capable of understanding the instructions, as if he had heard them with his ears, from the lips of the inspired teachers. The Greek is a language, remarkable for its precision, as well as its copiousness. Perhaps there is no language more capable of expressing every thing that the human tongue can express, and the human mind apprehend; and from the multitude of books which were written in it, while it was the language of the polite and learned world, it is easy for a diligent student to acquire such a knowledge of every word and phrase, that he shall find little difficulty in translating, into his native tongue, the plain testimony of the apostles concerning Jesus of Nazareth, and the foundation on which he promised to build his church. And this plain testimony, expressed in English, is as capable of being understood by the reader of English, as by any saint or father of the second century.

Besides, we know from the apostolic writings, that erroneous sentiments began to prevail in the first century. Jewish converts had their Jewish prejudices, and heathen converts had theirs; and both had begun to mix up these prejudices with the articles of their Christian profession. Suppose, then, the doctrines which the apostles taught, had been communicated by the oral testimony of a Jewish or of a heathen convert, and there was no other, they would almost necessarily have received a colouring, or bias, from the medium through which they passed. In this way, I doubt not, the early fathers of the church were led into many mistakes. In short, they had no security against error, but by having recourse to the ipsissima verba, the very words, which the apostles wrote; rejecting every oral traditionary gloss, as calculated to lead them astray, and taking the very words of the divine record in their simple grammatical sense. This is what we of the present day are as capable of doing as they were; and therefore we are not dependent on them for the understanding of the Word of God.

Before entering upon the subject of the Inquisition, I shall occupy a Number or two with a sketch of the doctrine and personal character of the Reformers; which will afford a relief to the religious mind, after the disgusting details which I was obliged to give of the wicked lives of the Romish priests, while discussing the subject of their constrained celibacy. I shall introduce the present subject with an extract from a letter by AMICUS VERITATIS, for which see THE PROTESTANT, page 28. In one of my letters, in the Glasgow Chronicle, I had stated the Christian doctrine, that Christ's death was a sufficient satisfaction to divine justice; and that sinners are saved by what Christ has done, not by any thing that they can do. To this my opponent replied:—

"Like Luther before him, with one dash of his pen, he (i. e. THE PROTESTANT) magnanimously abolishes the obligation of good works, and opens the gates of heaven to every man who can only boast the gift of an all-saving faith.

This solifidian tenet, it must be acknowledged, with the Church of England, in her articles, is 'a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort.' The restraints of religion are too unpleasant to the passions of men:

> 'Tis prudent to reform her into ease,
> And put her in undress to make her please;
> A lively faith will bear aloft the mind,
> And leave the luggage of good works behind.'

"'On this head,' says a writer of the present day, 'we have undoubtedly great obligations to Luther. Our blessed Redeemer died for us, and still left the way to happiness strait and rugged; the new apostle rushed to the arms of his faithful Catharine, and made it spacious and commodious. After Christ it was still so uninviting, that, as he declared, few would choose to walk in it: after Luther, it was cleared of the thorns of virtue, and might with ease be trodden by thousands. His disciples, however, have gradually learned to blush at the extravagance of their master: in the course of time they have silently abandoned his school, and have returned, on this point at least, nearer to the doctrine of Scripture and common sense. But the unnatural portrait which their great patriarch had drawn of Catholic doctrine, they still cherish with filial respect, and consider it as an invaluable legacy.'"

This precious piece of popish buffoonery is given by AMICUS VERITATIS, partly as his own, partly as an extract from "a writer of the present day;" but there is not a word of it his own, except the first four, "Like Luther before him." His marks of quotation ought to have begun at, "with one dash of his pen;" but he throws them a few lines lower, that he may have the credit of what he will reckon a clever sneer at the doctrine of the church of England. His assertion consists of two falsehoods, which must be disposed of, before we proceed to any thing else. The first is, that by one stroke of my pen, I abolish the obligation of good works; and the second is, that Luther did this before me. Now there is not a word of truth in this, either with regard to Luther, or myself. I intreat every Papist in the kingdom to read and study my pages, from the beginning; and I challenge them all to point out a single sentence, that by fair construction, can be made to express, or even imply, that I abolish the obligation of good works; or, that I have said any thing that tends, in the smallest degree, to derogate from their importance and value. I request the reader, however, to observe that I refer to my own words only, or such words as I quote from others with approbation; for I am aware, that my pages contain many extracts from Popish writers, which do tend to set aside all obligation to good works; especially in my quotations from Jesuits' Morals, which go so far as to relieve men from the painful obligation of loving either God or man.

In speaking of the subject of indulgences, I had occasion to quote the words of the French Catechism, which are,—"The mind of the church is, to grant indulgences only to those who attend to the duty of satisfying, on their part, divine justice." On this ground I convicted the Church of Rome of not only indulging, but commanding, or making it a duty, to commit sin: and certainly, if it be true that Christ has satisfied divine justice by the sacrifice of himself once for all, it must be a great sin, no less than rebellion against God, for any man to attempt to satisfy divine justice for himself; for this is to set aside the satisfaction of Christ, as not sufficient, but as requiring, in order to its sufficiency, the satisfaction of the sinner himself. This is the avowed doctrine of Rome. By commanding sinners "to satisfy, on their part, divine justice," she virtually commands them not to rely on the satisfaction, or atonement of Christ, but upon their own doings and sufferings. This I showed to be in direct opposition to the whole tenor of the gospel; and to be, in fact, an authoritative injunction, requiring all men to reject the gospel, and the salvation which it reveals; and to satisfy divine justice, and effect their own salvation, the best way they can. This I declare to be commanding men to commit sin; for if it be the duty of all to submit to the rightousness of God, and renounce their own, as the words of the apostle clearly imply, (Rom. x. 3.) then it must be a high degree of wickedness for any man to trust in his own righteousness, and not submit to the righteousness of God.

This is the substance of what I taught in the Glasgow Chronicle, (see page 19) and this is what AMICUS VERITATIS calls, "with one dash of my pen, abolishing the obligation of good works." It is enough for me to know, that the same objection was made to the same doctrine, when it was taught by the apostle Paul; and it was made by the same description of persons, —men who did not like to submit to the righteousness of God, but who went about seeking to establish their own righteousness. "Now we know, that what things soever the law saith, it saith to them that are under the law; that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world become guilty before God. Therefore, by the deeds of the law there shall no flesh be justified in his sight; for by the law is the knowledge of sin. But now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all, and upon all them that believe; for there is no difference: for all have sinned and come short of the glory of God: being justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus; whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, through faith in his blood, to declare his righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God; to declare, I say, at this time his righteousness, that he might be just, and the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus. Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? Of works? Nay: but by the law of faith. Therefore we conclude, that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law. Is he the God of the Jews only? Is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also: seeing it is one God, who shall justify the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith. Do we then make void the law through faith? God forbid: Yea, we establish the law," Rom. iii. 19—31.

I have made this long quotation from the inspired writings, to show, that, upon the gospel plan, sinners believing in Christ, are justified without respect to any doings or merits of their own; that is, without their obedience to any law, either in the way of doing or suffering. This is a doctrine that has always startled sinners when proposed to them. It appears to them as making void the law of God; and the apostle, divinely inspired, anticipates their objection, and assures them that it does no such thing, but that it establishes the law.

"A man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law," are the express words of the Holy Spirit, speaking by his inspired messenger. This is what my opponent calls, with a sneer, "this solifidian (i. e. faith alone) tenet." I have no objection to the term; and I pity the sinner who can mock at what every sinner ought to receive with devout gratitude, as the best news that ever was proclaimed to our fallen race: and if it were not so, that a man is justified by faith, without regard to his own doings, no man ever could be justified at all; which is the same as to say, no man could ever be saved; and our whole race must lie for ever under the guilt and the punishment of sin; for no man ever did any good works which could entitle him to the pardon of his sins, or to his justification before God. "There is none righteous, no not one." "Every mouth must be stopped," on the plea of righteousness, "and the whole world become (be declared and acknowledged) guilty before God." Now for a guilty rebel against the Lord of all, to do any thing worthy of having his guilt removed, and his person justified, is contrary to the whole tenor of Scripture, and even to the dictates of enlightened reason. No man could think of it, without the most unworthy and degrading notions of the law of God, and of God himself.

But the gospel doctrine of justification by faith, through the divine righteousness, that is, the obedience and death of Christ, establishes the law. It even magnifies the law, and makes it appear honourable. And certainly the divine law is more likely to be obeyed by him who has high and honourable views of it, than by him who thinks meanly of it. No man ever thought highly enough of the holy law of God, or even thought rightly of it at all, until he understood how it was fulfilled and magnified by the obedience to death of the Son of God. He who really understands this as it is revealed in the Bible, is the most deeply impressed with the obligation of good works; not to procure his justification, but to manifest his justification; and he only will really do good works; for, believing in Christ he receives the new principle of spiritual life, from which alone works good and acceptable to God can proceed; he is created anew after Christ Jesus unto good works.

These things are familiar to every man whose religion is taken from the Bible. But it is impossible to make a Papist, or a self-righteous Protestant, understand them. They cannot imagine what good works are good for, unless it be to procure or aid in procuring their justification. The CATHOLIC VINDICATOR avows this very plainly, though I do not recollect his precise words; and to seek for them in such a mass of confusion as his volume is, would be like searching for a needle in a hay-stack. It will sometimes be found, that the less that people understand of the matter, and the less of good works they exhibit in their own practice, the more noisy are they in pleading the merit of them. Nay, as a living writer has observed, there are some who will swear mightily on behalf of good works, and curse as hypocrites those who really do them, because they disavow all merit in them, and hope for salvation solely by faith in Christ. AMICUS VERITATIS, and the author whose words he uses, have not gone the length of swearing against the solifidian doctrine; but they show their spite against it as much as if they had; and that too, under a professed regard for good works; while, in fact, the doctrine of justification by faith without works, is the only root from which good works ever did, or ever will spring, among the race of Adam.

From this, I hope, it will appear to every one who understands the Bible, that I have not, by one dash of my pen, abolished the obligation of good works. In the above vindication of my sentiments on this subject, I may have repeated something that I have written before; but it is a subject that will bear repetition; and of which no Christian will become weary.

A correspondent has favoured me with an extract from Augustine's "Retractions," a work which he published in the latter part of his life; in which, among other things, he retracts his former opinion, that Peter was the rock on which Christ built his church. The same correspondent gives extracts from the principal Greek and Latin Lexicons used in our schools, with regard to the meaning of πετρος, and its compounds, which confirm what I gave in my last Number. For instance, πετροβολος, a thrower of stones; would Juvenis translate it, a thrower of rocks? πετροω, in the verbal form, to stone, would he translate it, to rock? There are some other curious examples of the strange work that such a mode of translating would make, for which I am sorry I have not room.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4TH, 1820.

IT is time now to inquire into the truth of the assertion, that Luther before me, by one dash of his pen, abolished the obligation of good works. I shall give a more complete view of this charge, by quoting a little more of the author from whom AMICUS VERITATIS, in his zeal for good works, stole the words which he gave as his own:—"When the magnanimous fathers of the Reformation," says this writer, "separated from the Church of Rome, one object which engaged much of their attention was to justify or palliate their schism. For this purpose, every species of expedient was adopted; and among the Catholic doctrines, which they misrepresented and vilified, was that which teaches the utility and necessity of good works. The piety of Luther urged him to retire as far as possible from the corruptions of Babylon. With one dash of his pen, he magnanimously abolished the obligation of good works," &c. No. CXX. p. 501. A Vindication of the Remarks on the Charge of the Bishop of Durham, p. 39.

Those who are not acquainted with the writings of Papists can have no idea of the barefaced impudence with which they can assert a falsehood, even knowing it to be such; for all the world knows, and this writer could not but know, that Luther's complaint against the Church of Rome, which led to his separation from it, was not her teaching the utility and necessity of good works; but because, by her infamous traffic in indulgences, she encouraged all manner of evil works. This is asserted by her own historians; and it is a fact as universally known as the fact of the Reformation itself; so that the writer could not but know it: and if his zeal for good works has not led him to curse and swear on their behalf, it has led him to tell a lie, knowing it to be such, for their sake.

It is, indeed, admitted, that, on this point, Luther taught the very same doctrine that THE PROTESTANT teaches; and it is nothing but what apostles and prophets, and Christ himself, taught before them,—that justification before God is by faith, through the righteousness of Christ, without regard to works of law. Of this Luther had so strong a perception, that he called it the article by holding or rejecting which a church would stand or fall: and in this he judged rightly; for this doctrine is such a connecting link in the system, that he who has a firm hold of it, commands the whole chain of Christian principles; whereas, he who lets go this link, abandons the whole system of Christianity, and embraces a totally different and opposite religion. It was by the preaching of this doctrine that the apostles turned men from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God; and they went on preaching with wonderful success; insomuch that the kingdom of Satan was like to have been overthrown in the world, and the kingdom of Christ established on its ruins; when, in order to prevent this catastrophe, the prince of darkness began to insinuate into the minds of the converts of Paul, that their own obedience to the law must have some share in the work of their salvation. This subtile poison of the serpent soon pervaded all the churches in Galatia; insomuch that the apostle, in a letter addressed to them, is constrained to say, that he stood in doubt of them; that is, he was led to doubt whether they were really Christians or not, Gal. iv. 20. He was afraid that he had bestowed on them all his labour in vain, iv. 11, because they sought justification as it were by the works of the law, especially by being circumcised and observing the law of Moses; he assured them, that seeking justification in this way, Christ would profit them nothing; and that if righteousness came by the law, that is, if men could obtain justification in this way, Christ had died in vain; there was no need of such a sacrifice, if men could obtain salvation by their own obedience.

This was the great antichrist that appeared in the world, while yet some of the apostles were alive. This formed the greatest obstruction to the progress of the gospel in the days of the apostles, and in those that followed; for the error was interwoven with the natural pride of the human heart, and found an advocate in the bosom of every unrenewed man. In process of time, the error was embodied into a system. It supplanted Christianity over a great part of the world; it took the name of that which it had supplanted; and thus was imposed upon the world a system of self-righteousness, superstition, and idolatry, having for its head a monster, who called himself the Vicar of Christ, who professed to rule in the name of Christ; but whose whole administration was directed to maintain the reign of darkness, and the influence of the prince of darkness over the souls of men.

Thus Popery had its origin in the self-righteous bias of the human heart, and a disposition to submit to any thing, rather than the humbling self-denying truth, that we must be justified before God, if justified at all, upon the footing of what Christ has done, not what we can do for ourselves; and that for this we must be indebted to sovereign mercy. Disliking this method of salvation, the emissaries of the wicked one invented that system of rites and ceremonies which constitute what we call Popery. Their penances and pilgrimages, their masses and their merits of saints, their holy spittle and their holy water, their beads and their crucifixes, and the whole host of their superstitious observances, and idolatrous practices, were all invented for the very purpose of being put in the place of Christ's righteousness, and that by them a sinner might merit justification for himself, and appear before God in a righteousness of his own. Let the reader observe, this is not merely the Popery of the dark ages. It is publicly maintained at this very day by our Papists in Glasgow, and their organ in London, who scout at the idea of justification by faith in Christ, without regard to their own works and deservings; though, alas! if their works were tried by the righteous law of God, it would be found that their deservings are such as they could not think of without fearful apprehension: and I say this not of Papists only, but of every man who trusts in himself that he is righteous, and who does not, by a cordial reception of the gospel, submit to the righteousness of God.

Now, when the mind of Luther began to be opened to see the errors of Popery, he was directed, by a divine influence, I have no doubt, to fix his eye particularly upon this grand fundamental truth, which had long been denied by the Church of Rome, but which he found plainly taught in the New Testament, that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law. He was not the first who discovered this truth, after it had been smothered for ages under the rubbish of Popery, for Wickliffe and Huss had taught it before him, and there were a few in the darkest ages who knew and lived by it; but he was honoured by divine grace to apprehend it more distinctly, to teach it with more clearness, and to enforce it with a more powerful eloquence, than had fallen to the lot of any man, for at least a thousand years. Of this his commentary on the epistle to the Galatians is a standing evidence: and well do I recollect the effect which some passages in this work had on my own mind, at a very early period of life. On the subject of justification, it contained, indeed, nothing more than I had learned to repeat from the shorter catechism, but it was presented with a force of argument which I found altogether irresistible; and though it must have been thirty years ago, the impression remains to this day.

Luther having declared this to be a fundamental article in the Reformation of which he was honoured to be the instrument, he gave it a prominent place in the works which he published, and even in his private epistolary correspondence. The following is a specimen of the manner in which he handled this important subject. It is part of his comment on Gal. ii. 21. "For if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain." "These words of Paul ought diligently to be weighed and considered in this wise. Is it true that Christ suffered death or not? Again, did he suffer in vain or not? Here we are constrained to answer, unless we be stark mad, that he suffered in very deed, and that he suffered not in vain, nor for himself, but for us. If then he suffered not in vain, it followeth of necessity that righteousness cometh not by the law."

Then adverting to some of the evasions of Papists, by which they attempt to establish their own merits, he proceeds:—"Is this horrible blasphemy to be suffered or dissembled, that the divine Majesty not sparing his own dear Son, but delivering him up to death for us all, should not do all these things seriously and in good earnest, but as it were in sport? Before I would admit this blasphemy, I would not only that the holiness of all the Papists and merit-mongers, but also of all the saints and holy angels should be thrown into the bottom of hell, and condemned with the devil. Mine eyes shall behold nothing else but this inestimable price, my Lord and Saviour Christ. He ought to be such a treasure to me, that all other things should be but dung in comparison of him. He ought to be such a light unto me, that when I have apprehended him by faith, I should not know whether there be any law, any sin, any righteousness, or any unrighteousness in the world. For what are all things which are in heaven and earth, in comparison of the Son of God, Christ Jesus, my Lord and Saviour, who loved me, and gave himself for me!

"This thundering and lightning from heaven against the righteousness of the law, and man's own righteousness, should make us to abhor it. And here with this thunder-clap falleth down all the orders of monks and friars, with all such superstitious religions. For who will not detest his vows, his cowls, his shaven crown, all men's traditions, yea the very law of Moses also, if he hear that for these things he rejected the grace of God, and maketh the death of Christ unprofitable. The world hearing this, doth not believe that it is true. It thinketh that such horrible wickedness cannot enter into any man's heart, that he should reject the grace of God, and esteem the death of Christ as a thing of nought. And yet this sin commonly reigneth. For whosoever seeketh righteousness without Christ, either by works, merits, satisfactions, afflictions, or by the law, rejecteth the grace of God, and despiseth the death of Christ, whatsoever he protesteth with his mouth to the contrary."

In his preface he thus writes:—"Do we then nothing? do we work nothing for the obtaining of this righteousness? I answer, Nothing at all. For this is perfect righteousness, to do nothing, to hear nothing, to know nothing of the law or of works; but to know and believe this only, that Christ is gone to the Father, and is not now seen; that he sitteth in heaven at the right hand of the Father, not as a judge, but made of God unto us, wisdom, righteousness, holiness, and redemption. Briefly, that he is our high priest, entreating for us, and reigning over us and in us by his grace.

"When I have this glorious righteousness dwelling in my heart, I descend from heaven as the rain, making fruitful the earth, that is to say, I come forth into another kingdom, and I do good works, how and whensoever occasion is offered. If I be a minister of the word, I preach, I comfort the broken-hearted, I administer the sacraments. If I be a householder, I govern my house and my family, I bring up my children in the knowledge and fear of God. If I be a magistrate, the charge that is given me from above, I diligently execute. If I be a servant, I do my master's business faithfully. To conclude, whosoever he be that is assuredly persuaded that Christ is his righteousness, doth not only cheerfully and gladly work well in his vocation, but also submitteth himself through love to the magistrates and to their laws, yea though they be severe, sharp, and cruel, and (if necessity so require) to all manner of burdens, and to all dangers of this present life, because he knoweth that this is the will of God, and that this obedience pleaseth him." In another place he writes;—"This I say to the end that no man should think we reject or forbid good works, as the Papists do most falsely slander us, neither understanding what they themselves say, or what we teach. They know nothing but the righteousness of the law, and yet they will judge of that doctrine which is far above the law, of which it is impossible that the carnal man should be able to judge. Therefore, they must needs be offended, for they can see no higher than the law."

These extracts afford a view of the doctrine of the Reformer, and of the manner in which he maintained it. There is a vehemence and boldness in his style, that show he was perfectly master of his subject, and fully assured of the ground on which he proceeded. I do not say that his mode of expression is in all instances the happiest that might be chosen. Some phrases are apt to startle a simple inquirer, and give occasion to misrepresent the doctrines of the gospel; such for instance as that in which he includes the law of Moses among things to be detested. It is very evident that he means not the law considered in itself, which is holy, just, and good; but the law represented as a medium by which a sinner may obtain righteousness. In this view it must be rejected, otherwise we reject the righteousness of Christ; but in no sense whatever is the law of God an object of detestation. It is the error of misrepresenting the law, and putting it out of its proper place, that is to be detested.

Here it is proper to remark, that Luther's respect for the law of God, and his deep sense of the obligation of good works, were made manifest by his own personal character, which was such as to command the esteem and respect of those who most intimately knew him. Without this, indeed, he would have made a poor figure as a reformer of religion. Papists, aware of this, have spared no pains, by forgery and sheer lying, to deprive him of his fair character, that they might vilify the Reformation. He has indeed been represented as a monster of wickedness, who learned his religion from the devil, and had the devil for his familiar friend and companion; and the writer quoted in my last Number, by a sneer about his faithful Catherine, does more than insinuate that he taught and practised immorality; though the fact referred to, infers no more than that he lived happily with his lawful wife. Cotemporary enemies, however, knew better than to speak evil of his moral character. Nay, they are compelled to speak highly of it; and they even speak of this as one reason why so much respect was paid to him. "Luther," says the Popish historian Maimbourg, "in his sermons attacked the vices of men with great acrimony: he likewise published, in the German and in the Latin languages, a number of pious books." "Moreover, as he lived a moral life, and was not given in the smallest degree to covetousness or any other vice, he was universally held to be a good and great, and even a holy man; insomuch, that it was the custom to paint his portrait with rays of glory round his head, as if he had been a canonized saint." See Milner's Church History, vol. iv. p. 509.

Now we ought not to forget that it is of the nature of the doctrine which Luther taught, and made the basis of the Reformation, to produce such a character as he is here described to have been. The Popish doctrine of justification by works never produced a truly holy man; I mean devoted in heart and life to the service of God, and making his service and glory paramount to every selfish consideration. Such Luther seems to have been. Aleander, the Pope's agent employed to reclaim him, is said to have disliked him on account "of the soundness and purity of his morals. He is known to have said, 'it is impossible to soften Luther by money. He is a brute, who will not look either to bribes or honours; otherwise, he might long ago have had many thousands paid to him at the banker's by the Pope's orders.'" Milner, vol. iv. p. 485, with the authorities in the margin.

It is not meant to assert that Luther was a perfect man, or that he had a perfect acquaintance with the whole of divine truth. He was miserably mistaken with regard to the presence of the real body of Christ in the sacrament; and he contended for his dogma with as much keenness, and with more asperity, than he did for the fundamental point of justification by faith. Indeed, his very asperity in the sacramental controversy should have led him, in his cooler moments, to suspect that he was wrong; for it is comparatively seldom that men lose temper when they have truth on their side; whereas, it is scarcely possible to maintain and plead for error and nonsense, without getting into a passion.

Luther possessed many faults in point of temper, which no man knew better, and deplored more sincerely, than himself; but, in point of moral character, I do not only say that he will bear a comparison with the best of his adversaries, but that he stands in bright contrast with those who defamed and persecuted him. His associates, Melancthon, Ecolampadius, and others, were men of like character, and better temper. They were, in short, great lights in a dark age; and to them Europe, at this day, is under inexpressible obligations.

I know that my Popish neighbours will triumph greatly on account of my admission, that Luther erred, and that he had a violent temper; and what dependence, they will ask, can any man have on that religion, the founder of which was a fallible, and even an erring man? And I must tell them again, though they know it, that Protestants do not acknowledge Luther, or any mere man, as the founder of their religion; but that it has its foundation in the word of God, which Luther was an instrument of bringing to the view of the world at large, after the Church of Rome had done what she could to conceal it from public view; and it is one of the glories of that Reformation, that it has put it into the power of every man, and that it invites every man, to scrutinize the doctrines taught by him who was the chief instrument in that Reformation; and to reject such of them as we find not agreeable to the word of God; whereas, had we continued under the power of the Pope, we would not have been at liberty to scrutinize any doctrine, or believe or reject any thing, but as it might please the holy father. His children are slaves; those of the Reformation are free men.

The author on whom I am animadverting gravely tells us that Luther's disciples "have gradually learned to blush at the extravagance of their master: in the course of time they have silently abandoned his school, and have returned, on this point at least, nearer to the doctrine of scripture and common sense." I do not know that Luther has any disciples in this country; and as for those who bear his name on the continent of Europe, if they have abandoned the doctrine of justification by faith, it is the worse for themselves. They are what Luther would have called in the state of a fallen church; and if they seek, like the Papists, to be justified by their own works and deservings, it is of very little consequence what other tenets they may hold or reject. They are fallen from grace; Christ will profit them nothing. Gal. v. 2—4.

But though some churches have chosen to call themselves by the name of Luther, it is right the world should know, that the Reformer spurned with abhorrence the idea of having a sect named after him. In his warning against sedition and tumult, (says Milner, the historian, vol. v. p. 68.) he exhorts all men not so much as to mention his name in a sectarian view; not to call themselves Lutherans, but Christians. "The doctrine," says he, "is not mine, nor was I crucified for any one. Paul and Peter forbad the people to call themselves after their names: why should I, who am soon to be food for worms, desire the children of Christ to be called by the name of so poor a creature? By no means! No! No! Let us have done with factious appellations; and be called Christians, because we possess the doctrine of Christianity. The Papists have very properly another name, because they are not content with Christ's name and Christ's doctrine; they choose to be called Papists. Be it so, because they have a master. I desire to be no man's master. I hold with the Church the doctrine which belongs to us all in common, and of which Christ alone is the author."

The Churches of England and Scotland do not profess to be called after Luther, and it is unjust to call British Protestants his disciples; yet on the point of justification both Churches are entirely agreed with him. The former expresses herself as follows, in the eleventh article: "Of the justification of man. We are accounted righteous before God, only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, by faith, and not for our own works or deservings: Wherefore that we be justified by faith only, is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort, as more largely is expressed in the Homily of Justification." And one would think, that to all who understand the terms, it must be comfortable to know, that our hope of salvation rests not upon the sand, but upon a foundation of divine righteousness that cannot be shaken. My opponents sneer at this, but it is the only sure anchor of hope to a perishing sinner. The doctrine of the Church of Scotland, and of almost all sects in this country, is precisely the same, with only a little difference in the mode of expression.

No. CXXII.

SATURDAY, November 11th, 1820.

My Popish opponent Amicus Veritatis, in his affected zeal for good works, has done what he could to make them appear disagreeable, if not hateful in the esteem of his readers. In this respect, he has outheathened the very heathens; for they spoke of virtue as being its own reward; and though they understood not well what they meant, it is very clear that the doctrine which they intended to inculcate, was, that a good man was happier than a bad man, even in the present life, and whether the hope of a future state was taken into account or not. But AMICUS VERITATIS, and the author whom he takes for his guide, speak of virtue, or the way of holiness, as I choose rather to call it, as a rugged, uninviting, and thorny way. (See No. CXX. p. 502.) From this I infer, that they have no love to this way themselves, for no man would give an ill name to that which he loved, and in which he placed his delight.

"Our blessed Redeemer," say my authors, "died for us, and still left the way to happiness strait and rugged." This is the foundation of the Popish doctrine, that, notwithstanding what Christ has done, we must satisfy divine justice, and merit eternal life for ourselves. But where has Christ said that the way to happiness is strait and rugged? He has indeed said, "strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth to life, and few there be that find it;" but this straitness, or narrowness, arises not from the incapacity of the way, as if there were not room enough for all who should ever enter; but because, from the circumstance of few walking in it, the path is narrow. It is wide enough for all who shall ever go into it; and if the whole world were to enter, it would be wide enough for them all. "I am the door," says Christ to all who hear his word, "by me if any man enter in he shall be saved," which implies, that if all men would enter in they should be saved.

But Christ has not said a word about his way being rugged. On the contrary he describes it as smooth and pleasant. It is rest to the labouring and heavy laden. His yoke is easy, and his burden is light, Matt. xi. 28—30. Wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace, Prov. iii. 17. According to the Popish doctrine, when sinners are turned from the evil of their ways, and begin to live a new life, that is, when they really begin to do good works, they enter upon a rugged path, so uninviting that few would choose to walk in it, and those who do enter upon it, may expect to be lacerated and torn by "the thorns of virtue." The plain English of this is, that the life of a real Christian must be a miserable one; and so it would, were it not for that doctrine which the Church of England declares to be wholesome and very full of comfort. (See No. CXX. p. 502.) Papists rejecting the righteousness of Christ, and trusting to their own doings, and their own penances, cannot possibly obtain comfort; for let them torment themselves ever so much, they can never be sure that they have done enough to satisfy divine justice. Nay, they may starve, or otherwise torture themselves to death, and yet not be sure that they may not be tormented in purgatory for a thousand years. Seeing AMICUS VERITATIS believes, and publicly maintains, that he must satisfy divine justice for himself, his language is perfectly natural. The way of good works must appear to him a rugged and a thorny path; and I appeal to every reader of common sense, whether good works are more likely to be promoted by such a representation of them, or by that which makes them appear amiable and profitable in the present life?

I maintain, that suppose there were no hereafter, a life of holiness, or, if you will, a life of good works, is infinitely more happy than a life of sin. AMICUS VERITATIS and his oracle assert, that Luther made the way to happiness spacious and commodious; and their meaning is, that he tolerated, and encouraged sinful practices, so that the way might be trodden with ease by thousands. Hence we derive this doctrine, that the way of sin is an easy, spacious, and commodious way. This is Popery, but like every other peculiarity of the system, it is directly opposed to the word of God. Here we are assured that the way of transgressors is hard. This is truly the rugged and the thorny way, which Papists falsely assert Christ to have left to his people, for his commandments are not grievous. If, therefore, Luther made the way to happiness easy and commodious, it was not by abolishing the obligation of good works, as my opponents falsely assert; but by showing how men became able to do good works, and to take pleasure in them, that is, by becoming interested in Christ by faith, and being renewed after the image of Christ unto the love and practice of good works. This takes place in the experience of every man who truly believes the gospel. He enters upon the way of holiness; and he finds it inexpressibly a more pleasant way than the way of sin had been. Godliness hath the promise of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come. He is an enemy of true religion who represents it as a gloomy thing.

I shall be told perhaps that the scriptures give a different representation; that many are the afflictions of the righteous; that God's people are called an afflicted and poor people; and that, if in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men the most miserable. I know that many are the afflictions of the righteous; but I know also that many are the horrors of the wicked; and that, while the afflictions of the former are counterbalanced by joy unspeakable, in possession and in prospect, the horrors of the latter are augmented by a certain fearful looking for of judgment: and that, if the former should be poor in this world, they are rich in faith and heirs of a kingdom, while the latter can derive no benefit from the wealth of this world, seeing they are poor towards God. As for Christians being of all men most miserable in this world, if it were not for the hope of another, I think any man who should assert this, must sadly mistake the meaning of the passage. The apostle is by no means asserting an axiom of general application; but merely a fact with regard to himself and other apostles, upon the supposition that they had been preaching a lie. If Christ were not risen from the dead, as some in the Corinthian church asserted, then were the apostles false witnesses for Christ,—all their preaching was vain,—those who had died in the faith had perished, after all that Christ had done and suffered, we can have no hope beyond this life; if these things were so, then we, the apostles, are the most miserable men in the world. That this is the meaning of the passage any one may see who reads the words in their connection, 1 Cor. xv. 12—19.

Christians do indeed suffer many things in common with the men of the world, and they have afflictions peculiarly their own, of which worldly men can form no conception. Some of these are described by the apostle Paul in his epistle to the Romans, seventh chapter. But these afflictions are not such as to justify the assertion, that the way of good works is a rugged and thorny way, as my opponents represent it. The righteous have more joy in their afflictions than the ungodly have even in their mirth; and then there is a remorse and horror which the ungodly suffer in their hours of sadness, from which the Christian is delivered by that gospel which brought peace to his conscience at first, and in the belief of which he continues to enjoy the peace of God which passeth all understanding. One thing is certain, that persons who had been in the most miserable state imaginable, whenever they believed the gospel preached by the apostles, were filled with joy and comfort. (See Acts ii. 42—47, and xvi. 34.) They never had done good works till then; and they never knew till then what true happiness was. The same effects are produced at this day by the same gospel, wherever it is received, as those know best who are most engaged in the preaching of it, and in cultivating acquaintance with those who believe it.

But there is no gospel, that is, no good news, for sinners in the Church of Rome. Popery is a system of bondage and terror. It affords no real peace to the conscience. It effects no change in the heart from sin to holiness. It furnishes neither means nor proper motives for the performance of good works; and while it sets men to the work of satisfying divine justice for themselves, it makes them look upon God as unreconciled, and, therefore, as their enemy. In this state they must necessarily be alienated from God in their minds; and such works as are pleasing to him, cannot be pleasing to them. This accounts for the language of AMICUS VERITATIS, and other papists, who represent the way of holiness as so rugged and thorny, that few would choose to walk in it. The language of Christ in his gospel is, "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest," Matt. xi. 28. This is not the rest of idleness, but the far more comfortable rest of honourable and useful activity in the service of God, in doing those things which he has commanded, believing that our doing so is acceptable and pleasing to him, because our persons are accepted, and our sins pardoned, through the righteousness of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. This doctrine effectually teaches us to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, and righteously, and godly, in the present evil world. But the belief of the slave, who looks upon God as unreconciled, and as inflicting the punishment of his sins upon his own person, for the satisfaction of justice, possesses that alienation of mind from God, and that blindness of heart, which can produce nothing but wicked works.

The reader will be interested to know the feelings of Luther on this subject. While yet a monk, and living a blameless life, which could not have been said of all his brethren, he was actually a hater of God; and if every one who thinks he must satisfy divine justice for himself, were to express the feelings of his mind with as much honesty, he would confess the same truth. "However blameless a life I might lead as a monk," says Luther, "I experienced a most unquiet conscience; I perceived myself a sinner before God; I saw that I could do nothing to appease him, and I hated the idea of a just God that punishes sinners. I was well versed in all St. Paul's writings; and, in particular, I had a most wonderful desire to understand the epistle to the Romans. But I was puzzled with the expression, 'THEREIN is the righteousness of God revealed.' My heart rose almost against God with a silent sort of blasphemy: at least in secret I said with great murmur and indignation, Was it not enough that wretched man, already eternally ruined by the curse of original depravity, should be oppressed with every species of misery through the condemning power of the commandment, but that, even through the gospel, God should threaten us with his anger and justice, and thereby add affliction to affliction? Thus I raged with a troubled conscience. Over and over I turned the above-mentioned passage to the Romans most importunately. My thirst to know the apostle's meaning was insatiable.

"At length, while I was meditating day and night upon the words, and their connection with that which immediately follows, namely, 'the just shall live by faith,' it pleased God to have pity upon me, to open mine eyes, and to show me that the righteousness of God, which is here said in the gospel to be revealed from faith to faith, relates to the method by which God, in his mercy, justifies a sinner through faith, agreeably to what is written, 'the just shall live by faith.' Hence

I felt myself a new man, and all the scriptures appeared to have a new face. I ran quickly through them, as my memory enabled me; I collected together the leading terms; and I observed in their meaning a strict analogy according to my new views. Thus, in many instances, the work of God means that which he works in us; and the power and wisdom of God, mean the power and wisdom which his Spirit operates in the minds of the faithful; and in the same manner are to be understood the patience, the salvation, the glory of God.

"The expression, RIGHTEOUSNESS of God, now became as sweet to my mind as it had been hateful before; and this very passage of St. Paul proved to me the entrance into paradise." Luther's Works, Preface, vol. i. quoted by Milner, vol. iv. p.419.

It was a great mortification to the Papists, that they could find nothing against the moral character of Luther during his life; but they thought it would equally serve the purpose of making odious the reformation of which he was the chief instrument, if they could make the world believe, that there was something mysterious and horrific in his death and burial. That he died in the faith and hope of the gospel, full of peace and comfort, has been certified by those who witnessed his last moments, for the truth of which I refer the reader to his Life by Melancthon, and others. But the Papists propagated the following ridiculous account of his death, and, for any thing I know, it is firmly believed by all good Papists to this day:—

"That going to bed merry and drunk, he was found the next morning dead in his bed, his body being black, and his tongue hanging forth as if he had been strangled; which some think was done by the devil, some by his wife. And that, as they bare him to the church to bury him, his body so smelt, that they were fain to throw it into a ditch, and go their ways." This is the Popish fiction; but the recorded fact is, that Luther was buried with great pomp, in the Tower church in Wittemberg, by the appointment of the Prince Elector, "Bugenhagius making the funeral sermon, and Melancthon the oration."

Another Papist, a Jesuit, wrote as follows: "The same day that Luther died, many that were possessed of devils in a town of Brabant, were on a sudden delivered, and not long after possessed again. And when it was demanded of the devils, where they had been? they answered, that by the appointment of their prince, they were called forth to the funeral of Luther. And this was proved to be true, because a servant of Luther's, who was in the chamber when he died, opening a casement to take in air, saw near unto him a great number of black spirits hopping and dancing." See the Works of John White, folio, London, 1624, § 57. It is pleasant to see how these stories neutralize one another. If Luther had a servant in his chamber when he died, it would not have been left as a matter of uncertainty, whether it was the devil or his wife that was the immediate cause of his death; and if a legion of devils had been called from Brabant to attend his funeral, it is not probable that they would have left his body in a ditch unburied. Such are some of the reflections of the author from whom my account is taken.

But the following is worthy of the most particular attention, being more than doubly miraculous, seeing it contains an account of the death and burial of a man who was alive and in perfect health. I quote from the same section of the same author, who gives his authority in the margin,—

"A horrible miracle, and such as was never heard of before; that God, who ever is to be praised, in the foul death of Martin Luther, damned in body and soul, showed for the glory of Christ, and the amendment and comfort of the godly. When Martin Luther fell into his disease, he desired the body of our Lord Jesus to be communicated to him; which having received, he died soon after. And when he saw his end approach, he desired that his body might be laid upon the altar, and worshipped with divine honours. But God, willing at the length to make an end of horrible errors, by a huge miracle warned the people to desist from the impiety that Luther had brought in. For his body being laid in the grave, on a sudden such a tumult and terror arose, as if the foundation of the earth had been shaken. Whereupon, they that were present at the funeral, grew amazed with fear, and lifting up their eyes, saw the holy host hanging in the air. Wherefore with great devotion they took it, and laid it in a holy place; which being done, this hellish noise was heard no more. The next night after, was heard a noise and cracking about Luther's tomb, much louder than before, which waked all that were in the city out of their sleep, trembling, and almost dead for fear. Wherefore, in the morning, opening the sepulchre where Luther's detestable body was laid, they found neither body nor bones, nor clothes, but a stink of brimstone coming out of the grave, and well nigh killed all the standers by. By the which miracle, many being terrified, reformed their lives to the honour of the Christian faith, and the glory of Jesus Christ." The above having spread over all Italy, and perhaps the greater part of Europe, fell at last into the hands of Luther himself, who, in perfect good humour, and not the least dismayed by the "horrible miracle" relating to his own funeral, wrote under the narrative as follows:—"I, Martin Luther, by this my hand-writing, confess and testify, that, upon the twenty-first of March, I received this fiction concerning my death, as it was full of malice and madness; and I read it with a glad mind, and a cheerful countenance, but yet detested this blasphemy, whereby a stinking lie is fathered upon the divine majesty of God. As concerning the rest, I cannot but rejoice and laugh at the devil's malice, wherewith he and his rout, the Pope and his complices, pursue me. And God convert them from this devilish malice. But if this my prayer be for the sin that is unto death, that it cannot be heard, then God grant that they may fill up the measure of their sin, and with such lying libels as this, let them delight themselves one with another, to the full."

Luther was accustomed in his writings to ascribe evil thoughts, and suggestions of error, to the immediate agency of the devil. Thus, when he was suffering any temptation of this kind, he would say, "the devil told me so and so." In some of his works, he speaks of his temptations, and the opposition which he was enabled to make from the word of God, as if it had been a dialogue between the devil and himself. He had many anxious cogitations with regard to the great work in which he was engaged. These sometimes kept him awake in his bed; and when some discouraging suggestions occurred to his mind, and his courage was in danger of being shaken, he would say, in recording the fact, that the devil came to him at such an hour of the night, and pressed him with many weighty arguments; and then he would narrate how he answered the devil by such and such passages of scripture. In this there was nothing more than the occasional misgivings of a great mind, appalled by the magnitude of the work which he had undertaken, and an acknowledgment of the support which he derived from the word of God. But certain Popish writers, affecting to understand Luther's words in their literal sense, have stoutly maintained, and it is asserted to this day, that he held real and personal conferences with the devil, received his instructions from him, and was taught by him to argue so stoutly against the Church of Rome. "About Luther's conferences with the Devil," is the title of a chapter of a quarto volume which I have before me. The writer professes to have been brought up a Protestant, but falling into great doubts, he was led to examine the foundation of religion, and he became in due time a confirmed Papist. The circumstance of Luther's having been a disciple of the devil, had, it seems, great weight on his mind, in making him suspect the truth of Protestantism: but let us hear his own account of the matter:—

"And as for the matter of the devil's suggestion, both to M. Luther for rejecting the mass, and other articles of the Roman religion, and to Zuinglius for rejecting the real presence, did most stick in my mind, and caused some horror to think, that we in England should follow a doctrine revealed by the devil himself, I was very desirous to read the story at large in Luther himself: wherefore, I sought out Luther's works, and in the book de Missa angulari, et de consecratione sacerdotum, or, as others entitle it, de Missa privata, et unctione sacerdotum; and, for more certainty, I sought two editions of his works, the one of Wittemberg, Tome vii. the other of Jena, Tome vi. in which book is recounted at large the conference, or rather, large dispute which Luther said he had with the devil, or the devil rather with him, about the mass."—A Search, &c. by Francis Walshingham, p. 130.

The writer goes on to quote certain scraps of sentences from Luther's works; and, with great seriousness and apparent candour, he finds it his duty to renounce the doctrines taught by one who was so familiar with the devil. "Moreover," says he, "whereas before, I had a great aversion to believe that such a man of God as Luther, chosen to so great a work, (as I persuaded myself he was) should have any familiarity or conversation at all with the devil, and therefore could hardly believe that he should write of himself, that he knew him well, and that he had eaten more than a bushel of salt with him, and other such speeches recounted in the Defence of the censure; now reading over sundry parts of his works extant in print, I found many speeches of his not much differing from the other." Thus it appears the story about the bushel of salt is taken from another book, not from Luther himself. It is only a proverbial expression to intimate great familiarity; and the author is satisfied that it is Luther's, because in his own works he reads expressions "not much differing from the other," though Papists know well how to make a great difference in the meaning of a sentence, by a small omission or a small addition.

I have quoted these ridiculous conceits, to let the reader see to what contemptible arts Popish writers have had recourse to pervert the writings, and calumniate the memory of the great Reformer. I have great abundance of such matter, relating to Calvin and other reformers, but I think the foregoing will be considered enough as a sample.

No. CXXIII.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18TH, 1820.

FEW objects, of late, have received more of the public attention than the state of Ireland, and the improvement of our fellow-subjects in that kingdom. By the well-directed efforts of several societies, founded upon the most benevolent and liberal principles, many thousands of the poor peasantry are receiving an education that enables them to read the Word of God, and from the same, or similar benevolent sources, they are receiving Bibles to read. The Pope and his clergy have taken the alarm, knowing that their craft is at stake, and that the great goddess of Rome, whom the world has so long worshipped, is in danger of being set at nought. His holiness has issued another bull, of date the 20th of August last, against the wolves in sheep's clothing, namely, the benevolent men who are giving the people the Word of God, and teaching them to read it. This new bull is little more than a second edition of the one which I reviewed in my eighty-first, and some succeeding Numbers; so that I need not waste my time in exposing the falsehoods and absurdities which it contains.

For the farther information of my readers, I shall proceed to lay before them an interesting extract of a letter from a gentleman in Ireland, with whom I am personally acquainted, and on whose veracity I have the most complete reliance. The letter is addressed to a clergyman of the church of Scotland, who has kindly favoured me with this extract: I forbear giving the writer's name lest it should expose him to inconvenience among his Popish neighbours:—

"I shall now direct your attention to a few remarks on the state of Ireland in general, collected since I came to the country by personal observation. Much has been said on the demoralization of Ireland, and many causes have been assigned in order to account for them; but, as I could not see the operation of the causes which I had so often heard of, I resolved to satisfy myself on the subject by personal inquiry; and, accordingly, in going out to itinerate, having a horse belonging to———, I rode through the country in different directions, going into the houses, and conversing with the people in every mode I could think of, in order to elicit the information I wished to acquire. After a considerable time spent in this way, I called upon the priests, and, in conversing with them, made the best use that I could of the hints of information which I had received from the people. The priests are very cautious in speaking with Protestants; and, therefore, from many of them I could ascertain very little. But the aggregate of their respective information perfectly corroborated the information which I had previously received from the people, and I think put me in possession of the real cause of the degradation of Ireland.

"The mass of the Irish population is entirely in the hands of the priests, and governed by a system of policy, consolidated by a union of design and operation, which extends to every spot within the precincts of the kingdom of Ireland. To make this plain I shall be more particular.—The parish priests are the sole judges in their respective parishes, not only in an ecclesiastical, but also in a civil capacity. The people resort to them for information on every point of law that may affect either their conduct or their property; and, whether the information obtained in this way is correct or not, few will think of going further to inquire. All differences among the people are also referred to the decision of the priest; and from his judgment there is seldom an appeal. Should it be necessary to make oath in any disputed case, this also is done before the priest; and, to avoid the law, which restricts the administration of oaths to magistrates, the person deponing before the priest must declare that he does so by voluntary oath; and should the affidavit thus made be committed to writing, which it often is, it is signed by the priest as voluntarily made before him, he considering himself as only a witness, while he is in fact the real administrator of the oath, and regarded as such by the party who makes it, as well as by the party for whose satisfaction it is made. Written affidavits obtained in this way are frequently to be met with; and more importance is attached to them, even by Protestants, than to affidavits made before magistrates. Many of the priests go so far as to inflict punishment, by penance, in cases tried before them; and I have not been able to discover an instance where the penance has not been performed. Thus their authority over their flocks is both legislative and executive; and I am sure that the greatest despot could not meet with a readier compliance with his mandates, than is given to the "ipse dixit" of these ecclesiastical tyrants. Another source of the influence of the priests, is their interference with the commercial concerns of their parishes. When any thing is to be sold in a parish, it must be advertised by the priest from the altar, after the celebration of mass; for if it is not, the people are taught to infer, that the proprietor of the article to be sold, is not in favour with the priest; and in that case he will find no purchasers. This is so notoriously the case, that when gentlemen in the country have any thing for sale, the result of the sale will be in exact proportion to the degree of good understanding that may exist between them and the priest. In public establishments, such as breweries, the case is the same. I have known the proprietors of such establishments give, in some instances, regular salaries to some of the most active of the priests, in order to have the sale of their commodities promoted by them, through their influence over the people. Some gentlemen among the Protestant landed interest of the country, do the same for the protection of their property.

"The priests have another mode of exerting their influence in the country, which checks most effectually the efforts of the clergy of the establishment, without appearing openly against them. Whenever any of the clergy begin to be active in the discharge of their parochial duties, the priests throw out their innuendoes, and the people soon take take them up. When the collectors of the tithes go round for the tithes, they are shot at, and in many cases killed, and the clergyman is necessitated to relax his diligence, or lose his income, and perhaps his life. But if the minister be in good terms with the priest, (which he never can be unless he is inactive) the tithes may be collected with ease, and his life is perfectly secure.

"In addition to this, the priests are further supported in maintaining their system, by the constant intercourse which they keep up with their parishioners. Every individual in the parish, professing Popery, must confess to the priest, at least twice a year, at Easter and Christmas, when every thing must be told without reserve, even to the trifles of domestic life. The priests are thus in possession of every thing that can occur within their respective parishes; and, from the particularity of their inquiries, when they receive confessions, they can ascertain with the greatest precision the bent and disposition of the people's minds, as well as the different objects to which they may be directed, and the different points of view in which these objects may be considered. Add to this, that when the priests hear confessions they always direct the party, as to future conduct, according to the confession made; and, in this particular, they are sure to keep the interests of their system in view. The priests send a regular detail of the information thus acquired, to their respective bishops; who, in their turn, transmit it to the primate, and when the primate issues his annual address to the bishops, founded on the information thus received, they echo back his instructions in their diocesan charges to their priests, with such alterations as localities may require.

"With regard to the catholic question, the people are entirely in the dark. The priests never present it to them in a distinct point of view. They know, that if they were to enter into details, it would be impossible to convince the lower orders that they could be benefited by the much talked of emancipation; and therefore, to keep their minds in a constant agitation on the subject, they state the case generally, and in doing so, ascribe all the misery which exists in the country, to the refusal of government to grant their request. This puts both the government and the question, in a false point of view before the people; but the priests gain their end by it, and the minds of the Catholics become more and more embittered against the Protestants, every time that the subject is discussed. Thus you may perceive that every subject is made a handle of by the priests, to secure the attachment of the people; and in proportion as they succeed in securing their attachment, they will succeed in blinding their minds; for as ignorance is the mother of their devotion, so is she also the foundation on which their system stands. And every thing that can contribute to make this foundation more secure, is seized with an alacrity, and managed with an energy and address, which would astonish you. Popery, in short, is more than a religious system in this country; it is a political constitution perfectly distinct from the constitution of the empire, and conducted with such consummate dexterity, that many, who are under its influence, have no idea of its existence. It presents only one of its wheels at a time, while it conceals the grand engine by which that wheel is kept in motion; and, unless it be inspected with a watchfulness, equal to that which its conductors exercise for its concealment, the construction and operations of the machine never can be known.

"I respect the I. E. S. much, because I am convinced that as it has been the means of good to many, so it will be the means of good to many more; but I am certain, that if it were to identify with the objects which it has already taken up, that species of investigation to which I have alluded, it would be more generally useful, and its other plans would be more successfully executed. By the society's plan of preaching, its ministers have access only to some of the less bigoted Protestants; but by inquiring into the state of things among the Catholics, and acting on the information obtained, we open a door of general usefulness, and strike at the root of all the evils which exist in the country. I am so convinced of the necessity of this, that I am almost certain that no radical change in the moral or religious system of Ireland will be effected until it is done. The priests and their priest-craft must be dragged from their unhallowed concealment, and exposed to the just indignation of their deluded people, before the enthralling system, by which Ireland has so long been held in chains, can be overthrown.

"My intention has been long directed to this important work; but the host of the enemy is so numerous, that unless I could devote my whole time to it, I could not enter the field against them formally, although I do what I can when they come in my way. Could men be found who would unite their exertions to discover the nature and extent of the evils connected with the Popish system, as it now exists in Ireland, and to apply an efficient remedy, generations yet unborn would bless their memory, while they would enjoy, in the success of their labours, a present reward. I would not have dwelt so long on this subject, were I not convinced that there are many in Scotland who might be usefully employed in the cause I am pleading, and who perhaps might be influenced by the statement I have made, at least to give the subject their serious consideration. It involves the cause of souls, and the cause of souls is the cause of God and of his Christ. I have much more to say to you, but I am afraid I have already been too prolix."

It is difficult to imagine a state of more grievous bondage than that of the Irish people, under the domination of these ghostly tyrants. Every lover of his country is interested, therefore, in promoting the education of the youth among them, in order that by the slow, but sure operation of truth, the reign of error may be subverted, and Popery utterly extirpated. This is a consummation most devoutly to be wished for; and I think a train is laid by which it will be brought about, before the present generation pass away. The Pope himself seems to be aware of this, and to have a dread of it upon his mind. His weeping and wailing on on occasion of the Bible schools, is like the screeching of the owl when the dawn threatens the approach of the sun, whose rising he cannot prevent. An old priest is said to have remarked lately to his younger brethren, "I shall have my time of it; but you, young men, look to yourselves."

From the above statement it is easy to see, that the condition of the established clergy, in the more Popish parts of the country, must be extremely uncomfortable and insecure. If they are conscientious in the discharge of their duty, and if they presume to collect the provision which the law has made for them, it is at the hazard of their lives. Popery is therefore, in Ireland at this day, as hostile to the propagation of the gospel, as Mahomedanism is in Turkey, or heathenism in China. Let it be observed, it is not the mere collection of tithes that provokes the hostility of the Popish priests, it is also official diligence in the discharge of pastoral duties. If a parish minister shall preach the gospel to the poor, if he visit the sick, if he instruct the ignorant, if he warn his flock against false doctrine and the intrusion of false teachers, all which he is bound in duty to do, he is in danger of being shot at, and of losing his life. Now, as it is to be feared, there are many of the clergy of the established church in that kingdom, as well as elsewhere, who have not the courage and zeal of apostles, and who have no ambition for the crown of martyrdom, it is not surprising that non-residence and neglect of duty should prevail to a great extent. While this in some measure accounts for the fact, it is by no means a justification of it. Error will never be effectually put down, nor will the kingdom of Christ be universally established until more of the apostolic spirit, that is, more of the spirit of Christ himself, appear among those who are called his ministers. I know that Ireland is not altogether destitute of men endowed by the Holy Spirit, —full of zeal in the cause of the gospel both in the established church and out of it; but how few are they in proportion to the millions who are sitting in gross darkness!

If the churches in general were filled by such persons as I have referred to, the cause between truth and error would soon be brought to an issue. If the instructions communicated by the Bible read in schools, were followed up by preaching the gospel publicly, and from house to house, there can be no doubt the blessing of God would accompany the means of his own appointment, for turning many from their vain idols to the service of the living God. Popery could not long maintain its ground before the influence of truth, brought home to the heart and conscience, by the kind and affectionate ministrations of men whose own lives were cast in the mould of the gospel, and who were enabled to exhibit its kindly and sanctifying influence in their whole conversation and conduct. Some of them would no doubt lose their lives in the service; but this would be unspeakable gain to themselves, and it would hasten the overthrow of antichrist. We shall hear no more of farther concessions to the Papists, or of investing them with political power, when they shall appear among ourselves in their true character of bloody persecutors, as they always have been when they had power in their hands, and as I venture to predict they will be again, even without political power, or any other power than that which they usurp over their blinded adherents, whenever faithful ministers shall begin to labour in the manner which I have described, in those districts over which they claim spiritual oversight and authority. Popery, at this day, has not a firmer hold of Ireland than it had of Scotland, at the period of the reformation; yet we know how it was subverted, and almost extirpated, by means of preaching and suffering. The eloquence of a Knox was not more instrumental in effecting the happy change, than the blood of a Hamilton, a Mill, and a Wishart. Christ will be served by men who count not their lives dear to themselves, but who are willing to lay them down for his sake; and if all the clergy of Ireland were but half as much devoted to the service of Christ, as the soldiers of king George are to his service, we should soon hear of victories more glorious than ever were achieved upon the mountains of Spain, or the plain of Waterloo. It would be the victory of truth over error, of the kingdom of light over the prince of darkness.

It is one of the pleasing effects which result from the circulation of my Numbers in Ireland, that certain facts are corroborated and illustrated by persons who are acquainted with them, of which I shall here give a curious instance. In my seventy-eighth Number, p. 328, I gave an account of a priest having bequeathed money to procure masses for his soul, at the rate of 1s. 7d. each, which it seems should have been only 1s 6d.;* but all the rest is confirmed, with the following curious illustration, for which I am indebted to a correspondent of undoubted credit. "I was well acquainted with father Lonergan of ——— who left the three legacies, and a more rational man by a fire-side, in general matters, I never knew; but to such a delusion are the wisest of them given up to believe a lie, that this man in his will gave a rare instance of spiritual foolishness and carnal wisdom, that makes one smile. The reason assigned in his will for ordering 1s. 6d. masses, was, 'and whereas the only difference between a guinea mass and a shilling mass consisting in the intention of the priest; and knowing by experience that whatever priests may say or intend, there is very little difference between the intention given in the one and in the other, I do will and direct, that the money be applied in masses of one and sixpence each, being persuaded that there is more intention in a hundred masses at one and sixpence each, than in twenty or more at a guinea each, and therefore more benefit to my soul!!!' I did not conceive what was the blindness of the human mind till I heard this part of the will. I got a new insight into the human mind, and the character of Popery."

There can be no doubt, I think, that this poor man really believed that his soul would derive some benefit from these masses; and yet he knew that all the benefit would depend upon the intention of the priest that should say them. Mr. Fletcher says somewhere in his Lectures, upon authority which he adduces, that many of the priests in Ireland do not really believe in Transubstantiation, and that their scepticism on this point is a leading article in their confessions to one another; and a learned divine of the church of England, who honours me with his correspondence, in a letter received a few days ago, assures me that Papists in England are allowed to disbelieve the same dogma in their hearts, provided they do not deny it with their lips. But here is a priest, and a polite gentleman too, upon the point of death, and making his last will, who seemed to believe most sincerely, that the money which he left behind him, would procure benefit to his soul after death. This can be accounted for only upon the ground of the divinely attested fact, that when men receive not the love of the truth that they may be saved, they are given up to strong delusions, that they may believe a lie.

This holy father, without intending it, has left in his last will and testament, a strong testimony against his religion. The virtue of the sacraments, and of the mass in particular, depends in a great measure, if not entirely, upon the intention of the officiating priest. He could not be sure that the masses said for his soul after death should be accompanied by the necessary intention; nay, there is reason to think the priests would owe him a grudge, seeing he imposed upon them the drudgery of doing a job for eighteen pence, for which they might as well have had a guinea; and, therefore, it is probable that they would take their revenge by saying his masses without any intention at all. At least he could not know but this might be the case; and, therefore, he could have no real hope in his death. The gospel believed gives a sure and certain hope of rest beyond the grave; and he that continues to the end shall be saved, without a peradventure. The righteous, therefore, hath hope in his death; but the Papist can have no such hope. It is at best mere peradventure with him. He is not only all his lifetime subject to bondage; but he dies in a state of bondage. It must be a miserable thing to trust in the doings of a fellow-creature; and yet Papists have not so much as even this to depend upon. Their whole dependence is upon the intention, that is, the secret thought of him who performs a certain ceremony. This melancholy view of Popery, which shows it to be truly ruinous to the souls of men, is confirmed by the dying words of one of its own priests, and he one of the best of his order. Surely every man who has a feeling of compassion for the souls of poor sinners, held thus in bondage by the devil, ought to lend his aid that such a delusion may be banished from the earth.

From the same correspondent, and in the same letter, I am furnished with the following curious particulars:—"Carrick is in the county of Tipperary; the county of Kilkenny commences about a mile from it, divided by a stream,—one in Ossory, the other in Cashell diocese. For many years the lents in Cashell diocese were black lents, and no meat allowed. In Ossory they were generally white lents, Kilkenny being more refined, and they had power to eat meat twice a week or more. The priests of Carrick not being able to eat meat in Tipperary county, always took advantage of the white lent in Ossory. Accordingly there was a public-house kept at the other side of the bridge that divides the county of Tipperary. It was kept by so notorious a woman that she was called Kate Heart; that is, she had too tender a heart to deny any man. At this woman's house the Carrick priests used to bespeak a meat dinner, on the Ossory meat-days, and from fifteen to twenty of them dined there during lent. They crossed the stream which was the line of demarcation between a curse and a blessing; and with all manner of jollification they feasted and drank till they were right full of what, had they eaten it at the other side of the bridge five yards wide, would have been an abomination fraught with mortal sin. There were cars to bring home those who were too wise to walk. This is keeping lent. Oh, Popery, what art thou!"

No. CXXIV.

SATURDAY, November 25th, 1820.

The holy Inquisition is the next subject that comes in my way according to the plan which I have prescribed to myself. As this is a tribunal established for the very purpose of taking cognizance of heresy, that is, any departure from the standard of faith which the Church of Rome has established, and of punishing to the uttermost all who shall be found guilty, or even suspected, of such a deviation, it will not be considered impertinent to introduce the subject with a few remarks on persecution for conscience' sake.

There can be nothing more certain, than that the genius of Christianity is hostile to persecution in every form. The gospel is addressed to the understanding, and to the heart of man, with this very solemn intimation, "He that believeth shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be condemned." The condemnation of unbelief, which is the only deadly heresy, is not committed to fellow-creatures for the purpose of being executed upon the persons of unbelievers in the present life. Unbelief is not a sin against men, but against God, whose testimony it rejects, and whose veracity therefore it impeaches. He reserves the judgment in this case to himself. He has commanded no man to interfere in the matter; and no man, and no church, has a right to interfere in it, farther than to declare, that he who rejects the divine testimony, can have no part in any divine ordinance. He is, therefore, with propriety, excluded from the fellowship of the visible church, but he ought not to suffer damage either in his person or property.

But there are persons who do not reject the divine testimony, but who really receive it, and who ought to be acknowledged as belonging to the household of faith, whose minds are but partially enlightened, with regard to many things connected with the faith and obedience of the Gospel. Now it was never meant by Christ, or taught by his apostles, that such persons should be compelled, by force, to think rightly upon every religious subject. The thing is absurd and impossible, for mind will not yield to any external pressure; and the Word of God authorizes no means for removing mistakes from the human mind, but instruction and persuasion; and these have often been found successful, while the world may be challenged to produce an instance of conviction of truth having been effected by brute force.

The use of compulsion, in relation to religious opinion, originated with the enemies of the truth, who, conscious that they could not maintain their ground by fair argument, had recourse to the power which they possessed in the strength of their arm, or the number of their adherents. Cain stands at the head of the black catalogue of persecutors. He was sadly mistaken with regard to the character of God, and the way of approaching to him with acceptance. Abel thought rightly on this most important subject; but it does not appear that he ever thought of compelling his elder brother to adopt more just ideas, or of murdering him if he did not. It was then, as in all subsequent ages: He that was after the flesh persecuted him that was after the Spirit. Every false religion excites its adherents to persecute the true religion, or to oppose it by force: but the spirit of Christianity is most remote from this; and, if any real Christian ever thought of promoting truth, or opposing error by other means than instruction and persuasion, he had learned his lesson, and taken his example from antichrist.

The primitive Christians suffered much from the Jews and the Heathens, especially the former, who, as they were the murderers of the Lord of glory, were also the most furious persecutors of his disciples. After the subversion of their nation, and their being deprived of the power of persecuting to any great extent, the work of wholesale murder was taken up by the Roman emperors, by whom many thousand Christians were destroyed for no crime but that of being Christians, which in Roman reckoning was enough to incur the sentence of being thrown to be devoured by wild beasts. It was not long after Constantine had taken Christianity under his protection, that persons, called Christians, began to persecute one another; but by this time the glory was departed. The word Christian had acquired a different meaning from that which it bore when first applied to the disciples at Antioch. Augustine and other early fathers strongly condemned violence on account of religion; but their voice was not heard. Heresy was considered a crime of the first magnitude; this was often a mere nickname of the truth, and the abettors of it were devoted to destruction. But persecution in every hideous form was never so completely reduced to a system, as after the Pope was seated upon his throne, showing himself as a god, having all power in heaven and in earth.

"In the following ages," says Limborch, speaking of a period subsequent to the age of Augustine, "the affairs of the church were so managed under the government of the Popes, and all persons so strictly curbed by the severity of the laws, that they durst not even so much as whisper against the received opinions of the church. Besides this, so deep was the ignorance that had spread itself over the world, that men, without the least regard to knowledge and learning, received, with a blind obedience, every thing that the ecclesiastics ordered them, however stupid and superstitious, without any examination; and if any one dared in the least to contradict them, he was sure immediately to be punished; whereby the most absurd opinions came to be established by the violence of the Popes." Hist. Inq. chap. vii.

In the twelfth century it was found, that a numerous people inhabited the valleys of Piedmont, held certain doctrines different from those which the Pope commanded all men to receive, on pain of death. The people have been called Albigenses and Waldenses. The principal articles of their faith were substantially the same with those of the Reformation. It is not certain when or by whom such doctrines were first promulgated among them; but I think it is probable, that the truth of the gospel found an asylum among these mountains and valleys after it had been banished from Rome, and from every other part of the world to which the Pope could extend his influence. It is probable that the number of professors was very few for many ages; and, therefore, they escaped the notice of the holy see; but by the time mentioned they had become numerous; and they excited the utmost hatred of the Pope and his adherents. It was with a view to extirpate them that the Inquisition was established, and that Saints Dominic and Francis, the first Inquisitors, were set a-hunting after the precious lives of a simple and virtuous people, a thousand times more worthy than themselves.

It was the fashion, however, of the Church of Rome then, as it has always been since, to represent those who dissented from her errors as monsters of one kind or another. They could not persuade the world that the Waldenses were monsters of wickedness; for all who knew them, bare witness that they were a peaceable and harmless people; but they did succeed in their misrepresentations so far as to make the Duke of Savoy, and perhaps many others believe, that they, or at least their children, were not formed like other human creatures. At the instigation of the Pope, a cruel and murderous war had been carried on against the Waldenses, many of whom were subjects of the Duke of Savoy. He seeing his country in danger of being ruined by such violent measures, found means to put an end to the war: "Nay," says the historian from whom I quote, "it pleased God so to touch his heart with compassion for that poor people, that he spoke it openly, that for as much as he had always found them to be most faithful and obedient subjects, he would not suffer them to be so dealt with, by force of arms in future: only for what was past, he ordered, for formality's sake, that twelve of them should come to Pignerol where he then was, there to beg his pardon, for taking up arms in their own defence; the which they accordingly did, and his highness receiving them courteously, forgave them freely all that had passed during the time of the war, giving them to understand, that he had been misinformed, both as to their persons and their principles; and withal he desired to see some of their little ones, because there were some who had made him believe, that they were strange and monstrous creatures, having but one eye in their forehead, with four sets of black teeth, with many other such like fictions; whereupon some were brought before him, and he finding them, on the contrary, handsome-shapen and well favoured, did openly profess, how ill satisfied he was with the calumnies and slanders of their malicious adversaries, and thereupon did not only confirm their privileges and liberties, but withal made them a gracious promise to settle and establish the same for the time to come. And this was undoubtedly the real intention and resolution of that prince at that time, however afterwards wrought upon (or at least deluded) by the subtle devices of the Inquisitors, who took the boldness, notwithstanding all the gracious promises of their prince, to continue to persecute those poor Waldenses, laying violent hands on them, and delivering them up to the secular powers, who also, in most places, were not at all backward to lend them their helping hand." Moreland's History of the Evangelical Churches in Piedmont, folio, page 223.

Thus we see, that Popish malice against the professors of true Christianity, showed itself not only in speaking evil of their character and principles; but also in misrepresenting their personal form, so as to make princes believe that they were not human creatures, but something worse than wild beasts, that ought to be run down and destroyed; and, indeed, they were run down, and murdered with a ferocity such as has never been equalled by any attempt to extirpate the most savage beasts of the forest. For which see Moreland's History above quoted, and Jones' History of the Waldenses.

"It was the entire study and endeavour of the Popes, to crush, in its infancy, every doctrine that any way opposed their exorbitant power. In the year 1163, at the synod of Tours, all the bishops and priests in the country of Tholouse were commanded to take care, and to forbid, under the pain of excommunication, every person from presuming to give reception, or the least assistance to the followers of this heresy, which first began in the country of Tholouse, whenever they should be discovered. Neither were they to have any dealings with them in buying or selling; that by being thus deprived of the common assistances of life, they might be compelled to repent of the evil of their way. Whosoever shall dare to contravene this order, let him be excommunicated as a partner with them in guilt. As many of them as can be found, let them be imprisoned by the Catholic princes, and punished with the forfeiture of all their substance." Limb. Hist. Inq. chap. ix. This edict is expressed in pretty intelligible language. The heretics themselves were not only to be extirpated with fire, and sword, and famine; but every man who should show them the smallest favour, were it only by selling a loaf to one of them, or giving him a drink of cold water, was to be excommunicated as a partner in the guilt of heresy; and this implied imprisonment, the forfeiture of goods, and of life itself. Such are the tender mercies of the wicked; such was Popery in the days of its glory; and such it is, and must be still, where it has space and opportunity to show its true character, for it is an infallible system, and, therefore, incapable of change to the better. I call upon the Papists in Ireland to answer this. They are living in peace, so far as they are able to live peaceably; they have the utmost freedom even in observing their idolatrous rites; they suffer no sort of molestation whatever on account of their religion; and yet they lately complained in a letter to the Pope, that they were the victims of the most sanguinary and unrelenting persecution that ever aggrieved a Christian people. I have no desire to see the experiment tried upon them; but I think it would teach them a useful lesson, if they were placed but for one day, in the situation in which the holy father, their lord the Pope, placed the Waldenses, and all who should presume, for mere humanity's sake, to give any of them a cup of cold water. They and their oratorial demagogues would then learn what the word persecution means; for at present, they do not understand what they have never felt or seen.

The holy church instigated several sovereign princes to commence a crusade against the poor people who were desirous of living at peace with all men; and who asked nothing of any man, but to be allowed to possess and read the Word of God, and to worship him as that word dictated. This crusade was more murderous and cruel than that against the Turks for the recovery of the holy land, and similar or greater indulgences were granted to all who should take up the cross in the Popish sense of the expression. Those who went against the Turks, wore the sign of the cross on their backs; but those who went against the Waldenses wore it on their breasts. No historian that I have read, has attempted to account for this difference in the position of the Popish idol. I gave it, therefore, as a conjecture of my own, that when these heroic children of the Pope contemplated an encounter with so fierce a people as the Turks, they had an idea, that their backs would have more need of protection than their fronts; and, therefore, they placed the idol behind, expecting, no doubt, that it would protect both itself and them, from enemies whom they could not see after they had turned about. But they knew that the Waldenses were far from being formidable as men of war; that they were better acquainted with preaching and praying than with fighting; and, therefore, they thought they might venture to look them in the face, with weapons in their hands, and their idol before them.

Be this as it may, we are informed by Limborch, who gives the Popish historians Bzovius and Raynaldus as his authors, that the vast army of the cross-bearers, "every where attacked the heretics, took their cities, filled all places with slaughter and blood, and burnt many whom they had taken captives. For, in the year 1209, Buerre was taken by them, and all, without any regard to age, cruelly put to the sword, and the city itself destroyed by flames. Cæsarius tells us, that when the city was taken, the cross-bearers knew that there were several Catholics mixed with the heretics; and, when they were in doubt how to act, lest the Catholics should be slain, or the heretics feign themselves Catholics, Arnold, Abbot of Cisteaux, made answer, Slay them all, for the Lord knows who are his; whereupon the soldiers slew them all without exception.

"Carcassone also was destroyed; and by the common consent of the prelates and barons, Simon, Earl of Montfort, of the bastard race of Robert, king of France, (whom Petavius in his Ration. temp. calls a man as truly religious as valiant) was made governor of the whole country, both of what was already conquered, and what was to be conquered for the future. The same year he took several cities and reduced them to his own obedience. He cruelly treated his captive heretics, and put them to death by the most horrible punishments. In the city of Castres two were condemned to the flames, and when a certain person declared he would abjure his heresy, the cross-bearers were divided among themselves: some contended that he ought not to be put to death; others said, it was plain he had been a heretic, and that his abjuration was not sincere, but proceeded only from his fear of immediate death. Earl Montfort consented that he should be burnt; alleging, that if his conversion was real, the fire would expiate his sins; if otherwise, he would receive a just reward of his perfidiousness. In other places also, they raged with the like cruelty. One Robert who had been of the sect of the Albigenses, and afterwards joined himself to the Dominicans, supported by the authority of the princes and magistrates, burnt all who persisted in their heresy; so that within two or three months he caused fifty persons, without distinction of sex, either to be buried alive or burnt; from whence he gained the name of the Hammer of the Heretics. Raynold affirms, that it ought not to be doubted, but that Pope Innocent appointed him to this office. At Paris, one Bernard, with nine others, of whom four were priests, the followers of Almerick, were apprehended; and being all had into a field, were degraded before the whole clergy and people, and burnt in the presence of the king.

The year following, there was undertaken a new expedition of the cross-bearers against the Albigenses. They seized on Alby, and there put many to death. They took La Vaur by force, and burnt in it great numbers of the Albigenses. They hanged Aymerick the governor of the city, who was of a very noble family. They beheaded eighty of lesser degree, and did not spare the very women. They threw Girarda, Aymerick's sister, and the chief lady of that people, into an open pit, and covered her with stones. Afterwards they conquered Carcum, and put to death sixty men. They also seized on Pulchra Vallis, a large city near Tholouse and burnt in it four hundred Albigenses, and hanged fifty more. They took Castres de Termes, and in it Raymond de Termis whom they put in prison, where he died; and burnt, in one large fire, his wife, sister, and virgin daughter, with some other noble ladies, when they could not persuade them, by promises or threats, to embrace the faith of the church of Rome." Hist. Inq. chap. xi.

All this fury and massacre would not do. It was found impossible to extirpate the professors of a more scriptural faith than Rome professed. The Pope, therefore, "pressed the Inquisition as the most effectual remedy for the extirpation of heretics. Bzovius relates, that at this time many heretics were burnt in Germany, France, and Italy, and that in this year (1215,) no less than eighty persons were apprehended at once in the city of Strasburg, of whom but a very few were declared innocent. If any of these denied their heresy, friar Conrad of Marpurg, an apostolical inquisitor of the order of predicants, put them to the trial of the fire ordeal, and as many of them as were burnt by the iron, he delivered over to the secular power to be burnt as heretics; so that all who were accused and put to this trial, a few excepted, were condemned to the flames." Ibid.

These facts are given as an introduction to the subject of the Inquisition, which will come more into view in some of my future Numbers. This is a subject which modern Papists do not like to say much about. They would rejoice if all the histories which record the monstrous cruelties of their holy mother, were consigned to the flames. This, however, they cannot accomplish; and as the next best shift, they affect to discredit every historian who has written on the subject. In my thirteenth Number, I gave some strong facts from Limborch's History of the Inquisition; and in discussing the subject of not keeping faith with heretics, I had occasion to refer to the same author. In reference to this, "The Catholic Vindicator," "by one dash of his pen," abolishes his authority as an author, in the following manner:—"This Limborch, whom THE PROTESTANT here quotes, was minister of Gouda, and died in 1712. In religion he was half a Calvinist, and half a Socinian. He was the author of several works; and in his 'Complete Course of Divinity,' he shows himself as inconsistent in argument, as his quoter; for he therein rejects all tradition, but when he comes to distinguish the canonical books of Scripture from the apocryphal ones, he is obliged to have recourse to the very rule which he himself rejects." Cath. Vind. No. X. These circumstances, it seems, invalidate the authority of Limborch as an historian; and though he does not profess to give any thing upon his own authority, but gives the names of Popish authors, with the titles and pages of their works, in which his facts are recorded; all must go for nothing, because he was not very decided in his doctrinal opinions, and because there was some inconsistency in his mode of ascertaining the canonical books of Scripture. This is modern Popish logic! Limborch gives hundreds of well-attested facts, in the very words of great Popish authors, with reference in every instance to the works from which he quotes; but our modern Papists will not believe a word of such quotations, because Limborch was half a Calvinist, and half a Socinian, &c. There must be some wonderful virtue in the pen, or in the ink of a heretic, seeing he possesses the power of imparting a new meaning to the words of Popish authors, without altering a letter or a point; and seeing he can render facts untrue, by merely transplanting the words which assert them into his pages; and that, while they still remain true, in the pages of those who originally recorded what they saw and heard. For the satisfaction of the reader, however, I shall give here the character of Limborch, by a living author, of at least equal authority with the "Catholic Vindicator."

"He was a native of Amsterdam, born in 1633, a person of great learning and talents, which raised him to the rank of professor of divinity in that city. When his History of the Inquisition first came over to England, it was received with the highest approbation by many of the principal nobility and clergy. In particular, Mr Locke, that incomparable judge of men and books, bestowed the strongest eulogiums upon it,—commends it for its method and perspicuity, and the authorities with which it is so abundantly confirmed, and pronounces it to be a work of its kind absolutely perfect. In a letter to Limborch himself, he tells him, that he had so fully exposed their secret arts of wickedness, that if the Papists had any remains of humanity in them, they must be ashamed of their horrid tribunals, in which every thing that was just and right was so monstrously perverted; and that it was proper it should be translated into the vulgar language of every nation, that the meanest people might understand the anti-christian practices of that execrable court. The papists became so alarmed at its publication, that the cardinals, inquisitors general at Rome, condemned it by an edict, and forbade the reading of it under the severest penalties." Jones' Hist. Wald. 1st ed. p. 399.*

No. CXXV.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2D, 1820.

MY last Number exhibited a sample of the manner in which the holy Roman church endeavoured to extirpate heresy. Fire and sword were the instruments employed for the purpose of compelling men to believe as the church believed; and not individuals or families only, but whole cities were put to the sword, if there were to be found, within their walls, any who would not assent and consent to all the impiety and nonsense which his holiness was pleased to impose upon them as matter of faith and Christian worship. Scotland and England suffered not a little at the period of their reformation, from the violence of the agents of Rome, who had still authority among the people; but, all that was suffered in this island, appears as nothing in comparison of what the Waldenses and Albigenses were called to suffer, long before the reformation under Luther was effected. It was determined by the holy see to hunt them down, and destroy them as "venomous adders;" and the provinces and cities in which any of them were to be found were exposed to all the horrors of military execution.

Hundreds of thousands of armed men, called pilgrims or cross-bearers, were let loose upon the provinces and cities in which heretics were supposed to reside. They were under the command of men devoted to Popery, and ready to lay the world in ruins, if they could, for the aggrandizement of the holy see. The army of the crusaders was indeed under the command of clergymen, who seemed to have in view nothing less than the universal subjection of the human mind, to the will and pleasure of the holy church; and any individual who refused to be so subjected, was instantly destroyed as not fit to live longer on this earth, which the Pope claimed as his own, in virtue of an imaginary grant to his great predecessor St Peter.

In my last Number I mentioned the melancholy fate of the city of Beziers, the whole inhabitants of which were put to the sword, Papists and all, because the besieging army could not distinguish between the heretics and the faithful, and because the Abbot of Cisteaux commanded to kill them all, for the Lord knew them that were his. A short historical sketch of what followed thereon, will be interesting to the reader, as furnishing a view of the manner in which the church of Rome was wont to defend and propagate the faith.

"The earl of Beziers, foreseeing the ruin which awaited his capital, made his escape, and withdrew to a neighbouring city of Carcassone. This place was much more strongly fortified, both by nature and art, than Beziers, and consequently more defensible. The city, or upper town, stands upon a hill, surrounded by a double wall; the lower town, or borough, is in the plain, about two miles distant from the city. Numbers of the Albigenses resided there, and many more fled to it for security. The young earl, who had now been fully instructed, by the horrible proceedings at Beziers, into the motives and determinations of the Catholics, resolved, as far as was practicable, to defend Carcassone."—"He, therefore, urged the inhabitants to defend themselves like men, and to recollect that both their lives and the free exercise of their religion were at stake, pledging himself that he would never forsake them in so honourable a cause, as was that of defending themselves against their common enemies, who under the mask of dissembled piety, were, in effect, nothing better than thieves and robbers."

In the meantime, says my author, Jones, in his History of the Waldenses, the army of the crusaders had been augmented by the arrival of the fresh levies from every part of France, as well as from Italy and Germany, to upwards of three hundred thousand men, some writers make them five hundred thousand. Here we have a half, or on a more moderate calculation, one third of a million of armed men, gathered together against one city, to destroy it, because it contained a number of persons who did not believe in transubstantiation, or in the efficacy of the mass sacrifice; and because they chose to worship God rather as he taught them in his own word, than as the Pope dictated. This is Popery, appearing in its genuine character; and I request my readers to look at it, and to say what they think of the religion which was so occupied upon a large scale, not to save men's lives but to destroy them. The pilgrims, or cross-bearers, had hard work in besieging Carcassone, notwithstanding they had the Allix, 8vo, Oxford, 1821; and the same author's "Remarks upon the ancient Churches of the Albigenses," Oxford (at the University press), 1821. Pope's legate as their commander. They met with so violent a repulse, that the ground was covered with their dead bodies round about the city. The following day the legate ordered the scaling ladders to be applied, and a general assault to be made on the town, but the inhabitants made a resolute defence. They were, however, at length, overpowered with numbers, and beat back from the walls, when the enemy entered, and gave the inhabitants of the borough exactly the same treatment they had lately done to those at Beziers, putting them all to the sword. This, no doubt, was for the glory of God, and in defence of the true faith!

The city, or upper town, however, was yet secure, but the besieging army lost no time in proceeding to its reduction. The legate commanded them to play all their engines of war against it, and to take it by assault. But he had the mortification to see his soldiers of the cross fall by thousands,—the ground covered, and the ditches filled with the bodies of his pilgrims. The king of Arragon who was in the legate's or rather the Pope's army of pilgrims, who fought under the assurance that the gates of paradise would open to receive them, if they fell in this holy warfare, undertook to negotiate with the young earl of Beziers, who was himself a Papist, but did not like to see his subjects murdered because they were not Papists. The king endeavoured to persuade the earl to surrender, but without success. The earl acknowledged to the king, that many of his subjects possessed a faith very different from that of the Church of Rome, but they were persons who never did wrong or injury to any one, and in requital of their good services to himself, he was resolved never to desert them. This is a sufficient reply to those modern Popish writers, who represent the Waldenses and Albigenses as seditious persons, and as not fit to live under a regular government. The fact is, they were the quiet of the land wherever they resided. They were good neighbours and good subjects, as their sovereign here testifies; and it does not appear that on any occasion they took up arms, except at the command of their sovereign, or when they were driven to extremities by their unrelenting persecutors.

It was expected by the besieging army, that the city of Carcassone would ultimately be obliged to surrender to the immense host that surrounded it; and though, as yet, there was no appearance of this, the commander of the holy pilgrims, professing to be influenced by the intercession of the king of Arragon, offered the following terms of capitulation to the city, which were highly characteristic of such a band of holy Roman cross-bearers:—That the earl himself "should be permitted to come out of the city, and to bring with him a dozen more, with their bag and baggage. But with regard to the rest of the inhabitants, they should not leave the city, except at his discretion, of which they ought to entertain the most favourable opinion, because he was the Pope's legate: That all the inhabitants, both men, women, maidens, and children, should come forth without so much as their shirts or shifts on, or the smallest covering to hide their nakedness." Such was the discretion of the Pope's legate, of which all men were called upon to have the most favourable opinion, because he held that high office.

"The Spanish monarch was fully persuaded, that propositions so degrading as these were, it was needless to offer to the earl of Beziers; he, nevertheless, complied with the legate's request, and submitted them to the earl, who gave an immediate reply that he would never quit the city upon conditions so dishonourable and unjust, and that he was resolved to defend both himself and his subjects, by every means that God had put within his power.

"Finding himself thus foiled in his attempt to move the earl of Beziers, the legate soon had recourse to a less honourable, but more deep laid plot. He insinuated himself into the graces of one of the officers of his army, telling him that it lay in his power to render to the church a signal instance of kindness, and that if he would undertake it, besides the rewards which he would receive in heaven, he should be amply recompensed on earth. The object was, to get access to the earl of Beziers, professing himself to be his kinsman and friend, assuring him that he had something to communicate of the last importance to his interests, and, having thus far succeeded, he was to prevail upon him to accompany him to the legate, for the purpose of negotiating a peace, under a pledge that he would be safely conducted back again to the city. The officer played his part so dexterously, that the earl imprudently consented to accompany him. At their interview, the latter submitted to the legate the propriety of exercising a little more lenity and moderation towards his subjects, as a procedure that might have the happiest tendency in reducing the Albigenses into the Church of Rome; he also stated to him, that the conditions which had been formerly proposed to him, were dishonourable and shameful, and highly indecorous in those whose eyes ought to be as chaste as their thoughts; that his people would rather choose to die than submit to such disgraceful treatment. The legate replied, that the inhabitants of Carcassone might exercise their own pleasure; but that it was now unnecessary for the earl to trouble himself any farther about them, as he was himself a prisoner until Carcassone was taken, and his subjects had better learnt their duty.

"The earl was not a little astonished at this information—protested that he was betrayed, and that faith was violated; for that the gentleman by whose entreaties he had been prevailed upon to meet the legate, had pledged himself by oaths and execrations to conduct him back in safety to Carcassone. But appeals, remonstrances, or entreaties, were of no avail; he was committed to the custody of the duke of Burgundy, and having been thrown into prison, died soon after, not without great suspicion of having been poisoned.

"No sooner had the inhabitants of Carcassone received the intelligence of the earl's confinement, than they burst into tears, and were seized with such terror, that they thought of nothing but how to escape the danger they were then placed in; but blocked up as they were on all sides, and the trenches filled with men, all human probability of escape vanished from their eyes. A report, however, was circulated, that there was a vault or subterraneous passage somewhere in the city, which led to the castle of Caberet, a distance of about three leagues from Carcassone, and that if the mouth or entry thereof could be found, providence had provided for them a way of escape. All the inhabitants of the city, except those who kept watch upon the rampires, immediately commenced the search, and success rewarded their labour. The entrance of the cavern was found, and at the beginning of the night they all commenced their journey through it, carrying with them only as much food as was deemed necessary to serve them for a few days. It was a dismal and sorrowful sight, says their historian, to witness their removal and departure, accompanied with sighs, tears, and lamentations, at the thoughts of quitting their habitations and all their worldly possessions, and betaking themselves to the uncertain event of saving themselves by flight; parents leading their children, and the more robust supporting decrepit old persons; and especially to hear the affecting lamentations of the women. They, however, arrived the following day at the castle, from whence they dispersed themselves through different parts of the country, some proceeding to Arragon, some to Catalonia, others to Tholouse and the cities belonging to their party, wherever God in his providence opened a way for their admission."—Jones' Hist. Wald. ch. v. sect. vi.

Here we have a view of Popery in all its glory. Provinces laid waste, and cities destroyed, marked the triumph of the successor of St Peter and the vicar of Christ. "The reader, who has never had an opportunity of exploring the history of this period, can scarcely conceive the scenes of baseness, perfidy, barbarity, indecency, and hypocrisy, over which Pope Innocent presided. The bare reflection of three hundred thousand men, actuated by motives of avarice and superstition, filling the country of the Albigenses with carnage and confusion, during a period of twenty years, is, in itself, sufficient to harrow up the soul; but to go into a circumstantial detail of all the multifarious atrocities which belong to it, would only be to impose upon the reader an obligation to throw aside the book, from a regard to his own feelings."—Ibid.

Some of these atrocities must, however, be brought to view before I have done, in order to show the reader the true character of Popery. I would not insist so much upon this, if our modern Papists would confess the truth, and acknowledge the faults of their predecessors. But when they maintain that their religious system has undergone no change, since it urged on their fathers to kill, destroy, and cause to perish, all who presumed to believe and worship as they learned from the Bible; and since they maintain that their religion is unchangeable, and infallible, and, therefore, incapable of having improved in the smallest degree, I do them no injustice when I lay the crimes of Innocent III. and of his army of priests at the door of Pius VII. and his host of clergy, whose principles being confessedly the same with those of Innocent, in every particular, their practice would also be the same, were it not for providential restraints, by which they are prevented from murdering heretics by thousands at a time, as was done formerly, as if it had been a mere matter of amusement.

"In the course of the war," says Jones, in the same section, "the castle of Minerva having surrendered at discretion, the Abbe Cisteau, who, ever since the election of Montfort to the command of the army, had continued the chief counsellor of the crusaders, hesitated for some time how he should dispose of the garrison and inhabitants. He sincerely desired the death of the enemies of Christ, says the author of the History of the Albigenses, but being a priest and a monk, he could not agree to the slaughter of the citizens, if they would be converted. Robert Mauvoisin, a zealot in the army, dissatisfied with this appearance of humanity and condescension, insisted that they had come there, not to favour heretics, but to exterminate them. In this dilemma, the blood-thirsty monk was relieved from his embarrassment, by the higher tone, not the fiercer spirit of a third person, who exclaimed, 'fear not, probably not one of them will accept of the alternative!' The event proved the correctness of his judgment, for the piles being kindled, they generally precipitated themselves into the flames." They chose to suffer the most cruel death, rather than to wound their consciences, and dishonour God, by being converted to the faith of Rome. And that they made a wise choice, no one will deny, who understands the import of Christ's words, "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it:" and, even if we should take lower ground than this, we may be convinced that they made a wise choice; for had they professed to be converted, they would have been put to death in order to prevent a relapse, and that they might have the happiness of dying in the holy faith of the Pope. Thus they would have incurred the curse of having denied Christ before men, and they would have suffered the scorn and the cruelty of men into the bargain.

"But, independent of those who fell by the edge of the sword, or were committed to the flames by the soldiers and magistrates, the Inquisition was constantly at work, from the year 1206 to 1228, and produced the most dreadful havoc among the disciples of Christ. Of the effects occasioned by this infernal engine of cruelty and oppression, we may have some notion from this circumstance,—that in the last mentioned year the archbishops of Aix, Arles, and Narbonne, found it necessary to intercede with the monks of the Inquisition, to defer a little their work of imprisonment, until the Pope was apprized of the immense numbers apprehended—numbers so great, that it was impossible to defray the charge of their subsistence, or even to provide stone and mortar to build prisons for them. Their own language, indeed, is so remarkable, that it deserves to be laid before the reader, and here it is:—'It has come to our knowledge,' say they, 'that you have apprehended so many of the Waldenes, that it is not only impossible to defray the charge of their subsistence, but also to provide stone and mortar to build prisons for them. We, therefore, advise you to defer for a while augmenting their numbers, until the Pope be apprized of the great multitudes that have been apprehended, and until he notify what he pleases to have done in this case. Nor is there any reason you should take offence hereat; for as to those who are altogether impenitent and incorrigible, or concerning whom you may doubt of their relapse or escape, or that, being at large again, they would infect others, you may condemn such without delay.' Such is the representation given us, by writers of unimpeachable veracity, of the merciless treatment which the Albigenses received from the Catholics of this period, purely on account of their religious profession." Hist Wald. ch. v. sect. vi. It is computed, that, in the first twenty years of the thirteenth century, not less than a million of persons were put to death, by the command of the pretended vicar of Christ; solely because they would not believe and worship according to the standard which he had set up. See Mede on the Apocalypse, p. 503, and Newton on the Prophecies, referred to by Jones, Hist. Wald. How justly is the church of Rome, this mother of abominations, represented as drunk with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus! Rev. xvii. 6. For these things more in detail, and a great deal more to the same purpose, I refer to Jones' History of the Waldenses, and Sir Samuel Moreland's History of the Evangelical churches in Piedmont.

The last mentioned author was English Ambassador at Geneva, at the time of a most horrible massacre of the Protestants in the valleys of Piedmont; the descendants of the Waldenses, which took place in the year 1655. * He gives a translation of a long letter, written by "some of the poor distressed Protestants" in these valleys, which exhibits such a picture of Popish cruelty on the one hand, and patient suffering on the other, as have scarcely been paralelled since the time of the persecution of the Christians by the Roman emperors. The letter begins thus:—"Brethren and fathers, our tears are no more tears of water but of blood, which do not only drown and obscure our sight, but even oppress our very hearts. Our pen is guided by a trembling hand; our brains are made dry by the many knocks we have received, and our mind so exceedingly troubled by such unexpected and sudden alarms, that we are not able to form a letter answerable to the intent of our minds, and the strangeness of our desolations." In the course of the narrative we read as follows: The persecuted people, having no way to flee or save themselves, were most fearfully massacred and put to death. "In one place they cruelly tormented no less than a hundred and fifty women and small children, and afterwards chopped off the heads of some, and dashed the brains of others against the rocks. As for a great part of the prisoners which they took, from fifteen years of age and upwards, who refused to go to mass, they hanged some, and nailed the feet of others to trees, with their heads hanging towards the ground." "'Tis too evident that all is lost, since there are some whole communities, especially St Giovanni, and La Torre, where the business of setting fire to our houses and churches was so dexterously managed by a Franciscan friar and a certain priest, that they left not so much as one of either, unburnt. In these desolations the mother was bereft of her sweet child, the husband of his dear wife. Those who were the richest among us, are forced to beg their bread; yea, what is worse, they are weltering in their own blood, and deprived of all the comforts of life."

I had some dreadful instances of cruelty to men, women, and children, which I intended for the conclusion of this Number; but I find I have not room for above one or two of them; and I think it better to forbear giving these by themselves. I wish to throw together, at once, what persons of weak nerves will not be able to read; and I intend to give them warning beforehand, that they may know when to stop.

* The following pamphlet gives an account of the civil and religious liberty enjoyed by the Waldensian Catholics since that date; "The history of the Persecutions of the Reformed Churches in France, Orange and Piedmont, from the year 1655 to this time."

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9TH, 1820.

ON the subject of the Inquisition, materials are so abundant, that it is difficult to comprise the substance of them within reasonable bounds. If I were to give this subject alone the space which it might occupy, I should be obliged to continue my labours for many years beyond the period at which I expect them to terminate: but I wish my Popish readers to understand, that I have no intention of continuing to torment them, as long as they and I shall live. Greatly encouraged as I am, to persevere in my labours, by the extensive and long-continued approbation of the best judges in the three kingdoms, I must not write for ever; and, therefore, I feel it necessary to take but a comparatively slight glance at the history and character of the holy Inquisition.

"The growth of the Inquisition was very gradual, and it is difficult to say when it commenced. Its advocates make it as old as the Mosaic dispensation, and represent Moses himself, and his successor Joshua, as having exercised the functions of Inquisitors-general. We must, however, look for the origin of the modern Inquisition in the persecutions excited by Innocent III. about the beginning of the thirteenth century, against the Albigenses. Honorius III. who succeeded Innocent, gave it a more regular form, and committed the superintendence of the system to Dominic de Gusman, commonly called St Dominic. Dominic founded an order of monks, and another of nuns, which are still continued under the name of Dominicans. He instituted also a third lay order, called "Militia Christi," the members of which have since been designated, Familiars of the Holy Office. Gregory IX. confirmed all that had previously been done, and committed the charge of the Inquisition to the Dominican friars, and in their absence to the Franciscans. Hitherto the Inquisition had extended only to Italy and France, but during the pontificate of Gregory, it was introduced into the Christian kingdoms of Spain, (meaning those parts of Spain in which Christianity was professed, in distinction from those possessed by the Moors;) and the Dominicans of that country soon found an ample field for the exercise of their office, among the Jewish and Moorish proselytes, whom interest or fear had drawn within the pale of the Catholic church. From this period the institution went on increasing in extent and activity till the year 1492, when Ferdinand and Isabella became sovereigns of all Spain. During their reign, it became the subject of much controversy between the courts of Spain and Rome. Isabella, a woman of considerable talents, appears to have foreseen the encroachments which the Inquisition would make upon the royal prerogatives, but her resistance was overruled; and in 1482, the famous Torquemada was appointed Inquisitor-general of Castile. In the succeeding year, his commission was extended to Arragon; and following the successes of Ferdinand and Isabella, he successively planted the Inquisition in the Moorish kingdoms of Seville, Cordona, Jaen, and Villa Real. The Inquisition thus established, continued in force till the invasion of Spain, by Bonaparte, and has latterly, with some reformations, been re-established under the auspices of Ferdinand VII." See a well written article in the Literary and Statistical Magazine for March last, entitled, "Sketches of the Spanish Inquisition." Since the above was published, Ferdinand has been obliged to retrace his steps, and again to abolish the Inquisition in Spain.

Heresy was the offence for the discovery and punishment of which this dreadful tribunal was instituted. But heresy was a thing so undefined in its nature, that it was easy to make the law against it apply to any thought that might pass through a man's mind, if that thought came to be revealed;—much more to any action of a man's life, or any word that he might speak. If a man think at all, his thoughts must have some relation to the things of time or of eternity. The holy church, of course, the holy Inquisition, professed to have unlimited jurisdiction over all words and thoughts relating to eternity; and they so explained the connection between temporal and eternal things, as to bring the former also under their cognizance; so that they actually obtained absolute dominion over the human mind, body, and estate. "Most offences were left to the cognizance of the secular tribunals," says the writer of the article above referred to, "but if a suspicion existed, that the offence had been committed under a persuasion of its not being criminal, this justified the interference of the holy office. As branches of heresy, the Inquisition examined all cases of blasphemy, divination, witchcraft, schism; and, even those who conversed with, or harboured heretics, were considered as justly suspected of heresy themselves. The breach of the vow of chastity, bigamy, and crimes against nature, were all supposed to imply a perversion of faith. At one period, the sale of Spanish horses to the French was considered as heresy, because the French were Huguenots, and would probably use the said horses against the interest of the Catholic church. Moors and Jews, who had embraced Christianity, and relapsed into their former errors, were classed among heretics; and, even if they had made no such profession, yet if, by word or deed, they made any attempt to shake the faith of any Christian, the Inquisition took cognizance of the offence. Even death, which is generally supposed to put its victims out of the reach of human molestation, was unable to arrest the march of the Inquisition. Processes which had begun, were never suspended by the death of the accused; and accusations were received, even against those who, during their lives, had maintained a fair character for orthodoxy. In either case, if the charges were proved, the corpse of the accused was burnt by the common executioner, his memory devoted to infamy, and what was more important, his goods were forfeited to the holy office."

This tribunal was invested with all the power that it is possible for the strong to possess over the weak. I speak of its power, not as consisting so much in its physical strength, though in many places that was not small, but rather as consisting in the influence which it had over the minds of a superstitious people. The Inquisitors assumed, and they had silently conceded to them, absolute dominion over every soul within their jurisdiction, without being obliged to account to the civil powers for what they did with the persons and the property of the many thousands who fell under their displeasure, who were immured in dungeons, and never again heard of by their relatives or neighbours; some of whom perished in darkness and despair; others were privately tortured to death; and not a few publicly committed to the flames, for the amusement and edification of such faithful children of the church as had never been suspected of heretical pravity.

The word Inquisition, or Inquisitorial, has come into proverbial use, as denoting any thing that combines injustice, cruelty, perfidy, and cunning; and the Inquisition became so identified with the Church of Rome, that it is vain for modern Papists to attempt to clear their holy mother of the guilt of the misery which that tribunal has inflicted on the world for six hundred years. It is in full operation at this day in some parts of the world; and the abolition of it in Spain, within the present year, is no evidence that Popery has become more humane; but only that some enlightened men, who happily have got the direction of public affairs, are beginning to see the evil of Romish superstition and abomination, as is farther evident by the suppression of the monasteries in that kingdom.

It is difficult for the inhabitants of this country, long accustomed to freedom, and the administration of equitable laws, to imagine the anguish and despair which Popery inflicted upon many an innocent family, by means of the Inquisition. It was in the power of any miscreant, who conceived a hatred of his neighbour, to lodge a complaint, or insinuate a suspicion of heresy against him; and the same night the unsuspecting victim of malice was dragged from his family, confined to prison, and perhaps tortured to death, while his wife and children remained ignorant of his fate, as well as of the crime laid to his charge; and durst not inquire, lest the holy office should lay its merciless paw upon them also. And even, when there was not so much as a suspicion of heresy, it was usual to invent accusations against persons in order to obtain possession of their property. If the holy fathers took a fancy to a young lady, or to a married woman, it was their custom to send, at the dead hour of night, to tear them away from the bosom of their families: the husband was obliged to surrender his wife, and the father his daughter, without daring to whisper a complaint, or ever after to inquire what had become of those who were so dear to him; and neighbours durst not so much as remark that such persons were amissing, lest some spy of the holy office should inform against them, and they be brought to share the same fate.

Under the pretext of labouring to suppress heresy, the holy Inquisition was found to make war, not against true religion only, but also against what is demonstrably true in philosophy and science. We have a striking example of this in the case of Galileo, the first mathematician and astronomer of his age, who, if not the original inventor of the telescope, was the first that applied it to any valuable purpose in the science of astronomy. From a careful observation of the motions of the heavenly bodies, Galileo became a convert to the system of Copernicus, or what is now called the Newtonian system, having been, by Sir Isaac Newton, demonstrated to be the true system of the universe; that is, that the sun is the centre of motion to a number of planets, and the earth among the rest, which revolve round the sun at different periods, in proportion to their respective distances. I suppose there is scarcely a peasant in Scotland in the present day, who has studied the subject, who is not convinced of the truth of the system thus described; and yet, for daring to teach it, Galileo was in danger of being burnt to death.

The process against the philosopher is given by Limborch at great length, and copied from him by subsequent writers. I shall give here the substance of it. It would occupy too much space to give the indictment verbatim; but when I come to the philosopher's recantation, I shall give it without abridgement. The names of certain great ecclesiastical dignitaries are given as sitting in judgment upon the poor astronomer, and his libel runs in the following strain:—

Whereas, you Galileus, of Florence, aged 70, were informed against in the year 1615, in this holy office, for maintaining as true, a certain false doctrine, held by many, viz. that the sun is the centre of the world, and immoveable, and that the earth moves round it with a daily motion. Likewise, that you have certain scholars to whom you have taught the same doctrine. Likewise, that you have kept up a correspondence with certain German mathematicians concerning the same. Likewise, that you have published certain letters concerning the solar spots, in which you have explained the same doctrine as true, and that you have answered the objections which in several places were made against you, from the authority of the holy Scriptures, by construing or glossing over the said Scriptures, according to your own opinions. And finally, whereas the copy of a writing under the form of a letter, reported to have been written by you to one who was formerly your scholar, has been shown to us, in which you have followed the hypothesis of Copernicus, which contains certain propositions contrary to the true sense and authority of the holy Scriptures.

Now, this holy tribunal, being desirous to provide against the inconveniences and dangers which this statement may occasion, to the detriment of the holy faith, by the command of the most eminent lords, cardinals, &c. of this supreme and universal Inquisition, have caused the two following propositions concerning the immoveability of the sun, and the motion of the earth, to be thus qualified by the divines, viz.

"That the sun is the centre of the world and immoveable, with a local motion, is an absurd proposition, false in philosophy, and absolutely heretical, because it is expressly contrary to the holy Scriptures.

"That the earth is neither the centre of the world nor immoveable, but that it possesses a daily motion, is likewise an absurd proposition, false in philosophy, and, theologically considered, at least erroneous in point of faith.

"But as it pleased us in the first instance to proceed kindly with you, it was decreed in the said congregation, held before our lord N. Feb. 25, anno 1616, that the most eminent lord cardinal Bellarmine should command you, that you should entirely depart from the said false doctrine, and in case you should refuse to obey him, that you should be commanded by the commissary of the holy office, to abandon the same, and that you should neither teach it to others, defend it, nor say any thing concerning it, and that, if you should not submit to this order, you should be put in gaol," &c. &c. Thus, for merely entertaining and expressing an opinion with regard to the system of the universe, was the greatest philosopher of his age subjected to be imprisoned in the gaol of the Inquisition, which imprisonment almost necessarily inferred the forfeiture of life by means of burning; and if the holy Inquisitors, in their great mercy, were pleased not to burn him to death, the circumstance of being imprisoned by them necessarily inferred the forfeiture of all his property, and the consigning of his name to infamy. The opinion which the holy fathers condemned happens to be true in philosophy, and not contrary to Scripture, for the word of God is occupied about higher matters, and does not pronounce any decision upon a subject so unimportant as the structure of the universe; but supposing the doctrine, that the earth moves round the sun, and not the sun round the earth, to be false in philosophy, what right had the Church of Rome to imprison, and commit men to the flames for believing it? The error was not greater, than to maintain that two and three make six; and truly that must be a holy office that will burn men to death for such a harmless opinion.

After a long round-about account of the errors of Galileo's writings, their condemnation of the same, and their dealings with the unhappy author in order to his recantation, the holy fathers proceed as follows:—

"Invoking, therefore, the most holy name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of his most glorious mother, Mary, ever a virgin, we do, by this our definitive sentence, which, sitting in our tribunal, we pronounce in these writings, with the advice and judgment of the reverend masters, doctors of divinity, and both laws, with whom we have consulted concerning the cause and causes now depending before us, between the magnificent Carolus Sincerus, doctor of both laws, and procurator of the exchequer of this holy office of the one part, and you Galileus Galilei, a criminal here under the power of the Inquisition, by this present written process, examined and confessed as above, of the other part; We do say, judge, and declare, that you the aforesaid Galileus have, upon account of those things, which are produced in the written process, and which you have confessed as above, subjected yourself to a strong suspicion of heresy in this holy office, by believing and holding to be true, a doctrine which is false and contrary to the sacred and divine Scripture; viz. that the sun is the centre of the orb of the earth, and does not move from the east to the west; and that the earth moves, and is not the centre of the world, and that these things may be considered and defended as probable opinions, although they have been declared and determined to be contrary to the sacred Scripture; and consequently, that you have incurred all the censures and penalties appointed and promulgated by the sacred canons, and other general and particular acts against such offenders; from which it is our pleasure that you should be absolved, provided that you do first, with a sincere heart, and a true faith, abjure, curse, and detest, before us, the aforesaid errors and heresies, and every other error and heresy contrary to the catholic and apostolic Roman church, in the form which shall be prescribed to you by us." Then follows the formal condemnation and prohibition of Galileo's book, with an injunction of suitable penance, such as the holy fathers should please to inflict upon the miserable author, who happened, unfortunately for himself, to know more of God's works of creation, than the Church of Rome chose that any man should know. The deed, if given at length, would nearly fill one of my Numbers; it is subscribed by no less than seven cardinals; and it shows what must have been the low state of learning and science in Europe, only two hundred years ago. The following is the abjuration, which I give at full length, though the substance of it might have been expressed in half the number of words:

"I, Galileus, son of the late Vincentius Galileus, a Florentine, aged 70, being here personally upon my trial, and on my knees before you, the most learned and eminent the lords, cardinals, inquisitors-general, of the universal Christian commonwealth, against heretical wickedness, and having before my eyes the most holy gospels, which I touch with my proper hands, do swear that I always have believed, and do now believe, and by the aid of God I will in future believe, every thing which the holy catholic and apostolic Roman church doth hold, preach, and teach. But whereas, notwithstanding, after I had been legally enjoined and commanded by this holy office, to abandon wholly that false opinion, which maintains that the sun is the centre of the universe, and immoveable, and that I should not hold, defend, or in any way, either by word or writing, teach the aforesaid false doctrine; and whereas, also, after it had been notified to me, that the aforesaid doctrine was contrary to the holy Scripture, I wrote and published a book, in which I treated of the doctrine which had been condemned, and produced reasons of great force in favour of it, without giving any answers to them, for which I have been judged by the holy office to have incurred a strong suspicion of heresy, viz. for believing that the sun is the centre of the world, and that the earth is not the centre, but moves. Being, therefore, willing to remove from the minds of your eminences, and of every catholic Christian, this strong suspicion which has been legally conceived against me, I do, with a sincere heart, and a true faith, abjure, curse, and detest, not only the aforesaid errors and heresies, but generally every other error and opinion which may be contrary to the aforesaid holy church; and I swear, that, for the future, I will never more say or assert, either by word or writing, any thing that shall give occasion for a like suspicion; but that if I should know any heretic, or person suspected of heresy, I will inform against him to this holy office, or to the inquisitor, or ordinary of the place, in which I shall then be. Moreover, I swear and promise, that I will fulfil and fully observe all the penances which have been, or shall be hereafter enjoined me by this holy office. But if, which God forbid, it should happen that I should act contrary to my word, promises, protestations, and oaths, I do hereby subject myself to all the penalties and punishments which have been ordained and published against such offenders by the sacred canons and other acts, both general and particular. So help me God, and these holy gospels which I now touch with my own proper hand, I, the above-mentioned Galileus Galilei, have abjured, sworn, promised, and bound myself as above, and in testimony of these things I have subscribed, with my own proper hand, this present instrument of my abjuration, and have repeated it word by word at Rome, in the convent of Minerva, this 22d day of July, anno 1633. I, Galileus Galilei, have abjured as above, with my own proper hand."

It must be admitted, that the great philosopher appears here in a contemptible light. He denies upon oath what he believes to be true. He had indeed no alternative between this and being burnt to death; and mere philosophy could not furnish him with a reason and a motive for laying down his life for her sake. Had he been actuated by Christian principle, he would rather have died than have sworn to a falsehood, though it had been in a matter of no more importance than that two and three make five. But if the philosopher appears contemptible in this matter, what shall we say of the holy Church of Rome, that imposed such a hardship upon the wisest of her children? She appears not only as the enemy of truth and righteousness, but also as the enemy of science and literature. Under her influence, men could have no heart for making discoveries of any kind. Had any man proposed in Italy 200 years ago, to light a city by means of an invisible substance extracted from pit-coal, he would have been suspected of heretical intercourse with the devil; and if he should have succeeded in his plan, as our Gas Light Company has done, he would have been thrown into one of his own retorts, or more publicly burnt at an Auto-de-fe, as a wizard, or convicted heretic at least. It is easier to conceive how He that made all things out of nothing, should make the earth to move round the sun, than that a fellow-creature should be able to bring light out of darkness. The things, however, are both alike true. The one is proved by experiment, the other by observation; but if we were under the dominion of Popery, we should be obliged to deny both upon oath, or submit to the alternative of being thrown into the fire.

No. CXXVII.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16TH, 1820.

IN treating of the holy Inquisition, it is not necessary that I go minutely into the consideration of its constitution, the laws by which it is regulated, and the titles and functions of the officers by whom it is governed. A full account of these may be found in "Limborch's History of the Inquisition;"—"The History of the Inquisition as it subsists in the kingdoms of Spain and Portugal," by Baker; Dellon's Account of the Inquisition at Goa; and in the work of a late, and I suppose, living author, entitled, "A narrative of the persecution of Hippolyto Joseph da Costa Pereira Furtado de Mendoza,"* who was imprisoned and tried in Lisbon, by the Inquisition, about eighteen years ago, for the alleged crime of being a freemason. The narrative of this writer with regard to his own sufferings is highly interesting; but his account of the constitution and laws of the "Holy Office," is in a great measure a compilation from Limborch and others; and it ought to be mentioned, to the honour of the last mentioned author, that though he wrote about the middle of the 17th, his account is confirmed by the narrative of one who suffered in the Inquisition at the beginning of the 19th century.

But as my plan is to expose the cruelty and extreme wickedness of Popery, as these appear in the conduct of the sacred tribunal, I shall, in a great measure, confine myself to facts illustrative of what I assert. Let it be remembered, that the grand avowed object of the institution was the suppression of heresy; that is, to prevent any man from thinking and speaking about religion, except according to a fixed rule, laid down by the Church of Rome; and if any man would not be persuaded to think and speak according to this rule, it was the business of the holy office to deliver him up to the flames. But though this was the avowed object of the Inquisition, it will appear in the sequel, that it was used by great luxurious ecclesiastics as a mean of providing for the gratification of their lusts. The grand Turk has not a more splendid seraglio within the walls of his palace, than holy fathers are known to have kept within the prison of the Inquisition: and these very fathers would, without scruple, have sent any man of their own order to the flames, if he had presumed to commit the heresy of marrying, and living honestly with one woman.

About the beginning of the last century, there happened to be a sort of a civil war in Spain, in which the troops of the king of France were actively engaged on one side. In their victorious career they came into possession of the city of Zaragosa, in Arragon, in which were a number of convents, particularly one of Dominicans. The French commander, M. Legal, found it necessary to levy a pretty heavy contribution upon the inhabitants, not omitting the convents. The Dominicans, all whose friars were familiars of the holy Inquisition, excused themselves in a civil manner, saying, they had no money, and if M. Legal insisted upon the demand of a thousand pistoles, which fell to their share, they could not pay him in any other way than by sending him the silver bodies of the saints. The friars imagined that the French commander would not have the heart to require such a sacrifice, and they thought, that if he should insist upon it, they would, by raising the cry of heresy against him, raise the mass of the people to take their part. The Frenchman, however, felt no qualms of conscience about the matter. He signified that the silver saints would be very welcome visitors. The friars, seeing they could not mend the matter, carried their gods to the governor, Legal, in a solemn procession, with lighted candles. The governor having heard that it was their intention to make a procession, and raise a mob, if they could, ordered out four companies of grenadiers, well armed, to receive the saints in the most devout and honourable manner; so that the design of raising the people completely failed. The saints were forthwith sent to the mint; and the holy fathers applied to the Inquisition to interpose its supreme power in order to save them from the furnace. This power was readily exercised in the way of excommunicating M. Legal. An instrument to this effect having been drawn up and signed, the secretary of the holy office was commanded to go and read it to the governor. Having performed his duty, the excommunicated governor, instead of expressing displeasure, with a mild countenance took the paper from the secretary, and said, "Pray tell your masters, the Inquisitors, that I will answer them to-morrow morning."

The governor then ordered his secretary to draw a copy of the excommunication, with the simple alteration of inserting "the holy Inquisitors," instead of his own name; and the next morning he ordered four regiments to be sent along with his secretary to the Inquisition, with command to read the excommunication to the Inquisitors themselves, and if they made the least noise, to turn them out, open all the prisons, and quarter two regiments there. The orders were obeyed; and the holy fathers were deeply amazed and confounded, to find themselves excommunicated by a man who had no authority for it; and they began a hue and cry against the governor as a heretic, and as having publicly insulted the Catholic faith. "Holy Inquisitors," said the secretary, "the king wants this house to quarter his troops in; so walk out immediately;" and having no alternative, they were compelled to obey. The doors of the prisons were thrown open; and then the wickedness of the Inquisitors was exposed to the world. Four hundred prisoners got liberty that day; and among them sixty well dressed young women, who were found to be the private property of the three Inquisitors, and of which they had robbed the families of the city and neighbourhood.

* To the authors mentioned in this page as treating upon the Inquisition, may be added the work of Llorente in 4 vols. 8vo, both in Spanish and French; but by the ordinary reader the following may be considered sufficient:—"The History of the Inquisition of Spain, from its Establishment to the reign of Ferdinand VII., from the Original Documents of the Archives of the Supreme Council, abridged from the work of Jean Antoine Llorente," 8vo, London, 1826; a very good abridgement. We refer likewise with pleasure to the "History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Spain, by Thomas M'Crie, D. D." 8vo, Edinburgh, 1829. To show the leaden malignity of the church of Rome, we may just mention that persons condemned by the Inquisition are considered as if they had never been born. See Mendham's "Policy of the Church of Rome," p. 319, edit. 1830.

The archbishop, seriously concerned for the honour of the holy tribunal, desired M. Legal to send these women to his palace, promising that he would take care of them; and in the mean time, he published an ecclesiastical censure against all who should defame by groundless reports the holy office of the Inquisition; that is, all who should mention the fact thus come to light. The governor professed his willingness to comply with his grace's desire; but as to the young women, that was not in his power, for the French officers had hurried them all away, being glad to get such fine mistresses. In fact, they were chiefly young ladies, beautiful and accomplished, who had been forcibly carried away, at the pleasure of the holy fathers, from the most opulent families in the city, and who probably would never have been seen without the walls of the sacred building, but for such a deliverance as that which was effected by the French soldiers. Some of them were afterwards married to their deliverers, one of whom furnished Mr. Gavin, from whom I abridge this statement, with a narrative of her own case, which I am sure will be interesting to my readers. I shall give the substance of it, without adhering strictly to the author's phraseology, as I think I can give it in fewer words than he does. He having been bred a Papist, seems not to have been able, after his conversion, to lay aside the Popish verbose, round-about style of writing.

Travelling in France some time after the event above referred to, and after he had renounced his situation as a Popish priest, he met one of the ladies at Rochfort, in an inn where he happened to lodge. She was then the wife of the innkeeper's son, who had been a lieutenant in the French service in Spain. Though she did not know Mr. Gavin in his secular habit, he recognized her as the daughter of counsellor Belabriga, in Zaragosa, with whose family he had been acquainted. Her father, it seems, had died of grief, after having lost her, without the comfort of revealing the cause of his trouble, even to his confessor; so great was his dread of the Inquisition. From this lady Mr. Gavin obtained an account of the manner of her abduction, and of the treatment which she received in the holy office.

"I went one day, said she, with my mother to visit the countess of Attarass, and I met there Don Francisco Torrejon, her confessor, and second Inquisitor. After we had drunk chocolate, he asked me my age, my confessor's name, and so many intricate questions about religion, that I could not answer him. His serious countenance frightened me; and perceiving my fear, he desired the countess to tell me, that he was not so severe as I supposed, after which he caressed me very kindly. He gave me his hand, which I kissed with great respect and modesty; and when he went away he told me, 'My dear child, I shall remember you till the next time.' I did not know what he meant, being quite unexperienced, and only fifteen years old. Indeed, he did remember me; for that very night, when in bed, hearing a hard knocking at the door, the maid who lay in the room with me went to the window, and asking who was there? I heard the reply, 'The holy Inquisition.' I could not forbear crying out, Father, father, I am ruined for ever. My dear father got up, and inquiring what the matter was, I answered him with tears, the Inquisition; he, for fear that the maid would not open the door so quickly as such a case required, went himself to open the door, and like another Abraham to offer his child to the fire; and as I did not cease to cry out, my dear father, all in tears, stopped my mouth, to show his obedience to the holy office, for he supposed I had committed some crime against religion. The officers gave me time only to put on a petticoat and a mantle: they took me into the coach; and without allowing me the satisfaction of embracing my father and mother, they carried me into the Inquisition.

"I expected to die that night; but when they carried me into a noble room, well furnished, I was quite surprised. The officers left me there, and immediately a maid came in with a salver of sweetmeats and cinnamon water, desiring me to take some refreshment before I went to bed. I told her I could not, but that I should be obliged to her, if she could tell me whether I was to die that night or not? Die, said she, you do not come here to die, but to live like a princess, and you shall want for nothing in the world but the liberty of going out; so be not afraid, but go to bed, and sleep easy, for to-morrow you shall see wonders in this house; and as I am chosen to be your waiting-maid, I hope you will be kind to me. I was going to ask some questions, but she told me she had not leave to tell me any thing more till the next day, only nobody shall come to disturb you; so she left me for a quarter of an hour. The great amazement

I was in, took away the exercise of my senses to such a degree, that I could neither think of my parents nor my own dangerous situation. In this suspension of thought, the maid returned, and locked the chamber door after her. Madam, said she, let us go to bed, and be pleased to tell me at what time in the morning you will have the chocolate ready. I asked her name, and she told me it was Mary. Mary, said I, for God's sake, tell me whether I come to die or not? I have told you Madam, said she, that you come to be one of the happiest ladies in the world. I went to bed, but the fear of death prevented me from shutting my eyes, so that I rose at break of day. Mary lay till 6 o'clock, and was surprised to find me up. She said little, but in half an hour she brought me, on a silver plate, two cups of chocolate and biscuits; I drank one cup, and desired her to drink the other, which she did. Well, Mary, said I, can you give me any account of the reasons of my being here? Not yet, Madam, said she; have a little patience. With this answer she left me, and an hour after came again, with a fine Holland shift, a Holland under petticoat, finely laced round, two silk petticoats, and a little Spanish waistcoat, fringed all over with gold, and combs, and ribbons, and every thing suitable to a lady of higher quality than I; but my greatest surprise was to see a gold snuff box, with the picture of Don Francisco Torrejon in it. Then I understood the meaning of my confinement. I considered with myself, that to refuse the present would be the occasion of my immediate death; and that to accept it, was to give him too great encouragement against my honour. But I found, as I thought, a medium in the case; so I said to Mary, Pray give my service to Don Francisco Torrejon, and tell him, that as I could not bring my clothes along with me last night, honesty permits me to receive what is necessary to keep me decent; but since I do not take snuff, I beg his lordship to excuse me if I do not accept this box. Mary went to him with this answer, and came again with a picture, nicely set in gold, with four diamonds at the four corners of it, and told me that his lordship had mistaken, and that he desired me to accept that picture. While I was musing what to do, Mary said, Pray Madam, take my poor advice, accept the picture and every thing he sends you; for consider, that if you do not comply with every thing he has a mind for, you shall soon be put to death, and nobody can defend you; but if you are obliging to him, he is a very complaisant gentleman, and will be a charming lover, and you will be here like a queen. He will give you another apartment with fine gardens, and many young ladies shall come to visit you; so I advise you to send a civil answer, and desire a visit from him, or else you will soon repent it. O dear, cried I, must I abandon my honour without remedy? and if I oppose his desire he will by force obtain it. So full of confusion, I bid Mary give him what answer she pleased. She was very glad of my humble submission, and went to give Don Francisco an account of it. In a few minutes she returned, with great joy, to tell me that is lordship would honour me with his company to supper. In the meantime he desired me to mind nothing but how to divert myself, and to give Mary my measure for some new clothes, and order her to bring me every thing I wished for. Mary added,—Madam, I may now call you my mistress, and must now tell you, that I have been in this holy office these fourteen years, and know the customs of it well; but as silence is imposed on me under pain of death, I cannot tell you any thing but what concerns your person: so, in the first place, do not oppose the holy father's will: secondly, if you see some young ladies here, never ask them any questions, neither will they ask you; and take care that you never tell them any thing. You may come and divert yourself among them at such hours as are appointed. You shall have music, and all sorts of recreations. Three days hence you shall dine with them; they are all ladies of quality, young and merry. You will live so happily here, that you will not wish to go abroad; and when your time is expired, the holy fathers will send you out of this country, and marry you to some nobleman. Never mention your name, nor Don Francisco's to any. If you see here some young ladies you have formerly been acquainted with, no notice must be taken; and nothing must be talked of but indifferent matters. All this made me astonished, or rather stupified, and the whole seemed to me a piece of enchantment. With this lesson she left me, saying she was going to order my dinner; every time she went out, she locked the door. There were but two windows in my room, and they were so high that I could see nothing through them, but hunting about, I found a closet, with all sorts of historical and profane books; so I spent my time till dinner in reading, which was some satisfaction to me.

"In about two hours she brought dinner, at which was every thing that could satisfy the most nice appetite. When dinner was over, she left me alone, and told me if I wanted any thing, to ring the bell: so I went to the closet again, and spent three hours in reading. I think I was really under some enchantment; for I was in a perfect suspension of thought, so as to remember neither father nor mother. Mary came and told me that Don Francisco was come home, and that she thought he would come and see me very soon, and begged me to receive him with all manner of kindness.

"At seven in the evening Don Francisco came, in his night-gown and cap; not with the gravity of an inquisitor, but with the gaiety of an officer. He saluted me with great respect, and told me that his coming to see me, was only to show the value he had for my family, and to tell me that some of my lovers had procured my ruin, having accused me in matters of religion; that the informations were taken, and the sentence pronounced against me, to be burnt alive in a dry-pan, with a slow fire; but that he, out of pity and love to my family, had stopped the execution of it. Every word was a mortal stroke to my heart. I threw myself at his feet, and said, Ah! Seignior, have you stopped the execution for ever? It only belongs to you to stop it, or not, said he, and with this he bade me good night. As soon as he went away, I fell a crying, but Mary came and asked what made me cry so bitterly? Ah! good Mary, said I, tell me what is the meaning of the dry-pan and gradual fire? for I expect to die by it. O Madam, said she, never fear. You shall see ere long the dry-pan and the gradual fire; but they are made for those that oppose the holy father's will; not for you that are so obliging as to obey it. But pray, was Don Francisco very obliging? I do not know, said I, for his discourse has put me out of my wits; he saluted me with great civility, but he left me abruptly. Well, said Mary, you do not yet know his temper; he is extremely kind to people that are obedient to him, but if they are not, he is as unmerciful as Nero; so for your own sake, take care to oblige him in all respects. She bade me be easy and go to supper; but the thoughts of the dry-pan so troubled me, that I could neither eat nor sleep that night.

"Early in the morning Mary got up, and told me, that nobody was yet stirring in the house, and that if I would promise secrecy, she would show me the dry-pan and the gradual fire; so taking me down stairs, she brought me into a large room with a thick iron door, and within it was an oven burning, and a large brass pan upon it, with a cover of the same and a lock to it. In the next room, there was a great wheel covered on both sides with thick boards; and opening a little window in the centre of it, she desired me to look with a candle on the inside of it. There I saw that all the circumference of the wheel was set with sharp razors. After that she showed me a pit full of serpents and toads. Now, my good mistress, said she, I'll tell you the use of these three things. The dry-pan is for heretics, and those who oppose the holy father's will and pleasure. They are put naked alive into the pan, and the cover of it being locked up, the executioner begins to put a small fire in the oven, and by degrees he increases it till the body is reduced to ashes. The second is designed for those that speak against the Pope, and the holy fathers; for they are put within the wheel; and the little door being locked, the executioner turns the wheel till the person is dead. And the third is for those who contemn the images, and refuse to give due respect and veneration to ecclesiastical persons; for they are thrown into the pit, and become the food of serpents and toads. Then Mary said to me, that another day she would show me the torments for public sinners: but I was in so great an agony at what I had seen, that I desired her to show me no more places; so we went to my room, and she again charged me to be very obedient to all the commands of Don Francisco, for I might be assured if I was not, that I must undergo the torments of the dry-pan. I conceived such a horror of the gradual fire, that I was not mistress of my senses; so I promised Mary to follow her advice. If you are in that disposition, said she, leave off all fear, and expect nothing but pleasure and satisfaction.—"

Hitherto I have given the narrative nearly in the author's words, with very little abridgment; but I forbear giving the particulars of what immediately follows. Seduction, in its most refined form, is a process which ought not to meet the public eye. The holy fathers of the Inquisition knew perfectly how to work upon the imagination of their wretched victims, first by putting lascivious books in their way, and then upon their fears, by showing them the instruments of torture, so as effectually to bend the most unyielding to their will. The sequel of the story shall be given in my next Number. There can be no doubt with regard to the truth of the narrative. The author was known, after his conversion from Popery, to some of the nobility and dignitaries of the Church of England; and he has his character certified at the beginning of his first volume, under the hand of the bishop of London. He wrote what he saw and heard from eye and ear witnesses; and the reverend J. Baker, who must have been his contemporary, in his History of the Inquisition, gives this entire story, with a declaration of his conviction of its truth.

No. CXXVIII.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23RD, 1820.

PROCEED we now to the sequel of the story of the young lady in the Inquisition, whose case occupied the greater part of my last Number.—"About ten o'clock, Mary came, says she, and dressed me. We left Don Francisco in bed, and she carried me into another chamber, very delightful, and better furnished than the first; for the windows were lower, and I had the pleasure of seeing the river and gardens. Mary then told me, that the young ladies would come and pay me their respects before dinner, and would take me to dine with them; and begged me to remember her advice; she had scarcely finished, when I saw a troop of young beautiful ladies, finely dressed, who came, one after another, to embrace me, and to wish me joy. My surprise was so great, that I was unable to answer their compliments; but one of them seeing me silent, said, Madam, the solitude of this place will affect you in the beginning, but when you begin to feel the pleasures we enjoy, you will quit your pensive thoughts. Now we beg of you the honour to come and dine with us to-day; and henceforth three days in a week. I returned them thanks; so we went to dinner. That day we had all sorts of exquisite meats, delicate fruits, and sweetmeats. The room was long, with two tables on each side, and another at the front of it; and I reckoned in it that day fifty-two young ladies, the eldest not exceeding twenty-four years. After dinner we went up to a long gallery, where some of us played on instruments of music, others at cards; and some walked about for three or four hours together. At last Mary came up ringing a small bell, which was, as I was told, the signal to go to our own rooms; but Mary said to the whole company, 'Ladies, to-day is a day of recreation, so you may go into what rooms you please till eight o'clock.' They all desired to go into my apartment with me. We found in my antichamber a table, with all sorts of sweetmeats upon it;—iced cinnamon, almond milk, and the like. Every one ate and drank, but nobody spake a word about the sumptuousness of the table, or the Inquisition, or the holy fathers.

"They retired to their respective apartments at eight o'clock, when Mary came to conduct me to Don Francisco, with whom I was to sup and spend the night. In the morning, when I returned to my own chamber, I found ready two suits of clothes of rich brocade, and every thing else suitable to a lady of the first rank. I put on one, and when I was quite dressed, the ladies came to wish me joy, all dressed in different clothes, much richer than before. We spent the second and the third day in the same sort of recreation; Don Francisco continuing in the same manner with me: but on the fourth morning, after drinking chocolate, (which it was the custom to do in bed,) Mary told me, that a lady was waiting for me in her own room, and with an air of authority desired me to get up. Don Francisco saying nothing to the contrary, I obeyed, and left him in bed. I thought this was to give me some new comfort, but I was very much mistaken; for Mary conveyed me into a lady's room not eight feet long, which was a perfect prison; and told me this was my room, and this young lady my bedfellow and companion; and without saying any more she left me there.

"What is this, dear lady? said I; is it an enchanted place, or hell upon earth? I have lost father and mother, and what is worse, I have lost my honour, and my soul for ever. My new companion, seeing my agitation, took me by the hands, and said, Dear sister, forbear to cry and grieve; for such extravagant behaviour will only draw upon you a cruel death. Your misfortunes and ours are exactly of a piece. You suffer nothing that we have not suffered before you; but we dare not show our grief for fear of greater evils. She advised me to be sure and show no uneasiness before Mary, who was the only instrument of their torments or comfort. I was in a most desperate condition; but my new sister Leonora prevailed so much upon me, that I overcame my vexation before Mary came to bring our dinner, which was very different from what we had had for three days before. After dinner another maid came to take away the plate and knife, for we had but one for us both; and after she had gone out and locked the door, Leonora told me that we should not be disturbed again till eight o'clock; and that if I would promise to keep secret what she should tell me, while I remained in that house, she would reveal all that she knew. I promised all that she desired, upon which she began as follows:—

'My dear sister, you think your case very hard; but I assure you all the ladies in this house have already gone through the same. In time you will know all their stories, as they hope to know yours. I suppose Mary has been the chief instrument of your fright, as she has been of ours; and I warrant she has shown you some horrible places, though not all; and at the mere thought of them, you were so much troubled in your mind, that you have chosen the same way we did to redeem yourself from death. By what has happened to us, we know that Don Francisco has been your Nero; for the three colours of our clothes are the distinguishing tokens of the three holy fathers; the red silk belongs to Don Francisco, the blue to Guerrero, and the green to Aliaga. We are strictly commanded to make all demonstrations of joy, and to be very merry for three days when a lady comes first here, as we did with you, and you must do with others; but afterwards we live like prisoners, without seeing a living soul, but the six maids, and Mary, who is the housekeeper. We dine all of us in the hall three days in the week. When any one of the holy fathers has a mind for any one of his slaves, Mary comes at nine o'clock, and conducts her to his apartment. Some nights Mary leaves the door of our rooms open, and that is a sign that one of the fathers has a mind to visit us that night; but we do not know whether it is our patron or not. If one of us happens to be with child, she is removed to a better chamber, and she sees nobody but the maid till she is delivered. The child is taken away, and we know not where it is carried. I have been in this house six years, and was not fourteen when the officers took me from my father's house. I have had one child here. We have at present fifty-two young ladies; and we loose every year six or eight; but where they are sent we do not know. We always get new in their places; and I have seen here seventy-three ladies at once. Our continual torment is to think that when the holy fathers are tired of us they will put us to death; for they never will run the hazard of being discovered in their villany. So, though we cannot oppose their commands, yet we continually pray to God to pardon those ills which we are forced to commit, and to deliver us out of their hands; so, my dear sister, arm yourself with patience, for there is no other remedy."

By this discourse of Leonora, the young captive was prevailed upon to make the best of her condition. She found every thing to be as she was told. She continued in durance eighteen months, in which time the company lost eleven ladies, and got nineteen new ones. "When the French soldiers threw open the doors of their prison, M. Faulcant, says she, happily for me, opened the door of my room, and from the moment he saw me, showed me great civility. He took Leonora and me to his own lodgings, and, after hearing our stories, for fear things should turn to our disadvantage, he dressed us in men's clothes, and sent us to his father's. So we came to this house, where I was kept for two years as the old man's daughter; till M. Faulcant's regiment being broke, he came home, and two months after married me. Leonora was married to another officer, and went to live in Orleans."

From the above it appears, that about once a month, upon an average, a family in Zaragossa was robbed of a daughter to recruit the seraglio of the holy fathers of the inquisition. This narrative does not refer to the dark ages of Popery; the thing took place but about a hundred years ago; and who can tell the misery that was thus inflicted upon many a family? In fact, there could be no such thing as domestic comfort in any country in which the Inquisition was established. It was not enough that every young lady kept at home; that she did not so much as show her face at a window; this would certainly have made her a victim to any member of the holy office whose spies might be passing. Every exposure of the kind therefore was most carefully avoided; but this did not serve the purpose of concealing such as might be desirable inmates of the Inquisition. Every lady was required to make confession to a priest twice, or at least once, a year; the priests were all dependants of the holy office; they were in short the panders of lewdness to the lords Inquisitors; and becoming, by means of confession, acquainted with the name and circumstances of every individual in every family, it was easy for them to inform their superiors where they might obtain a victim, to be sacrificed at the shrine of their lusts.

It is difficult to exhibit any thing more wicked than what I have related, with regard to the Inquisition, in this and my last Number; but there is something more tragical in what follows; in which we shall find that all the horrors of the "dry-pan," or burning to death, were actually realized in the case of young accomplished ladies, for no crime but that of heresy, or believing as they were taught by the word of God. I quote from an article formerly referred to, in the Literary and Statistical Magazine for June last; as continued from the Number for March:—

"Among the twenty-one victims who were burned at Valladolid, in the Auto-da-fe of 1559, the case of Dona Maria de Bohorques is peculiarly interesting. Dona Maria was a natural daughter of Pedro Garcia de Xeres Bohorques, and had just completed her twenty-first year, when she was arrested on suspicion of Lutheranism. Under the instruction of D. Juan Gil, Bishop elect of Tortosa, she was perfectly acquainted with the Latin language, and had made considerable progress in Greek. She knew the Gospels by heart, and was deeply read in those commentaries, which explain in a Lutheran sense, the texts referring to justification by faith, good works, the sacraments, and the characteristics of the true church.

"Dona Maria was confined in the secret prison of the Inquisition, where she avowed the doctrines imputed to her, defended them against the arguments of the priests who visited her, and boldly told the Inquisitors, that instead of punishing her for the creed which she held, they would do much better to imitate her example. With regard to the depositions of her accusers, though she allowed the principal points, she persisted in denying some facts which related to the opinions of other individuals; and this denial gave the Inquisitors an opportunity of putting her to the rack. By this torture they only procured a confession, that her sister Johanna Bohorques knew her sentiments and had not disapproved them: and as she persisted in her profession of faith, sentence was passed upon her as an obstinate heretic. In the interval between her condemnation and the Auto-da-fe, in which she was to suffer, the Inquisitors made every exertion to bring her back to the Romish faith. They sent to her successively two Jesuit and two Dominican priests, who laboured with great zeal for her conversion, but returned without having effected their object, full of admiration of the talents she displayed, and regretting the obstinacy with which she persisted in what they supposed a damnable heresy. The evening before the Auto-da-fe, two Dominicans joined in the attempt, and were followed by several theologians of other orders. Dona Maria received them with civility, but dissuaded them from attempting a hopeless task. To the professions which they made of being interested in the welfare of her soul, she answered that she believed them to be sincere, but that they must not suppose that she, being the party chiefly concerned, felt a less interest in the matter than they did. She told them that she came to prison fully satisfied of the orthodoxy of the creed which she held, and that she had been confirmed in her belief by the evident futility of the arguments brought against it.

"At the stake, Don Juan Ponce de Leon, who had just abjured the Lutheran doctrines, exhorted Dona Maria to follow his example. The weakness of this apostate for a moment overcame her, and she silenced him by language rather of contempt than of pity. Recollecting herself, however, she told him that the time for controversy was past, and that their wisest plan would be, to occupy the few minutes which remained to them, in meditating on the death of their Redeemer, in order to confirm that faith by which alone they could be justified. We have already mentioned, that if a condemned heretic renounced his heresy even at the stake, he was not burned alive, but first strangled and then burned; (and this was all that poor Juan Ponce de Leon gained by apostacy.) On this occasion the attendant priests, moved by the youth and talents of Dona Maria, offered her this milder death if she would merely repeat the creed. With this offer she readily complied, but having finished it, she immediately began to explain its articles according to the sense of the reformers. This confession of faith was immediately interrupted; Dona Maria was strangled by the executioner, and her body was afterwards consumed to ashes.

"We have mentioned that the only confession extorted by the rack from Maria Bohorques was, that her sister knew her religious sentiments, and had not disapproved them. This sister was named Johanna; she was a legitimate daughter of the same Pedro Garcia, and was married to Don Francis de Vargas, lord of Heguera. She was immediately arrested upon the confession of her sister Maria, and though six months advanced in pregnancy, she was confined in one of the common dungeons of the inquisition. In this dungeon she was delivered of a child, and received no assistance except from a young woman, confined on a charge of Lutheranism, who occupied the same cell. Eight days after its birth the child was taken from her; and soon after, her friendly nurse, having been tortured, returned to the dungeon with bruised and dislocated limbs; and Dona Johanna, still feeble from her confinement, was called upon to repay the charitable attentions she had received. Before her health was established, she also was subjected to the torture. Her enfeebled frame sunk under its sufferings: a blood vessel burst while she was on the rack, and in two days she was delivered by death from any farther persecution. After perpetrating this foul murder, the Inquisitors thought it sufficient expiation to declare Dona Johanna innocent at the ensuing Auto-da-fe."

Cases of the same kind might be multiplied to any extent; but my design is to give only a selection by way of sample. The following affords a view of the secrecy with which the affairs of the holy office were conducted: "When the Familiar is sent for to apprehend any person, he has the following order put into his hand. 'By the command of the reverend father N. an Inquisitor of heretical pravity, let B. be apprehended and committed to the prisons of this holy office, and not be released out of them, but by the express order of the said reverend Inquisitor.' And if several persons are to be taken up at the same time, the Familiars are commanded so to order things, that they may know nothing of one another's being apprehended. And at this the Familiars are so expert, that a father and his three sons, and three daughters, who lived together in the same house, were all carried prisoners to the inquisition, without knowing any thing of one another's being there until seven years afterwards, when they that were alive came forth to an Auto-da-fe."—Limborch, vol. i. p. 187.

Thus persons the most nearly related to one another, may be confined in contiguous cells without knowing it; and the merciless turnkeys of the holy office are constantly on the watch, to prevent the utterance of any sound, lest it should occasion the discovery of some secret. If a person bemoans himself, or bewails his misfortune, or prays to God with an audible voice, or sings a psalm or sacred hymn, he is instantly silenced. Persons may know one another by their cough, as well as by their articulate voice, and therefore, no man was allowed even this expression of his misery in the damp dungeons of the Inquisition. Limborch relates the following instance, which, he says, he had from several persons. "A prisoner in the Inquisition coughed. The jailors came to him, and admonished him to forbear coughing, because it was unlawful to make any noise in that house. He answered it was not in his power to forbear. However, they admonished him a second time to forbear it, and because he did not, they stripped him naked and cruelly beat him. This increased his cough, for which they beat him so often, that at last he died through the pain and anguish of his stripes."

I shall bring in here what was intended for the conclusion of No. CXXV. but for which I had not room. These cruelties were not, indeed, committed within the walls of the Inquisition, but they were done with the concurrence of the head of the church, and the head Inquisitor at Rome.

Sir Samuel Moreland has given a great number of instances of cruelty to individuals whom he names, with the attestations of witnesses, which he procured upon the spot. With a few of these I shall conclude the present Number. I have been accused of being too delicate in some instances, especially in my treatment of the subject of clerical celibacy. I have now with some reluctance brought myself to speak plainly out, some facts and circumstances, which I hope will have the effect which I have all along avowed to be the object of my work, not to injure the persons of Papists, but to hold up the system of Popery, which I maintain to be the invention of the devil, to universal detestation. I advise all who have the misfortune to have weak nerves, to read no more of this Number.

Upon the 22d of April, 1655, in a certain place called La Sarcena, one Captain Pola of Pancalier, took two poor women of La Torre and with a falchion ripped up their bellies, and left them wallowing upon the snow in this lamentable condition. And this was seen by M. Gross, minister of Villaro.

Martha Constantin, wife of Jacob Barral, after she had seen others most cruelly put to death, was herself first ravished, and then had her breasts cut off. The soldiers took and fried them and presented them to their comrades as tripe.

Anna, daughter of Giovanni Charboniere, had a long stake thrust through her body longitudinally, by some soldiers, who carried her thus upon their shoulders, quite naked, until they were tired; and then they stuck the end of the stake in the ground, and thus left her dead body exposed to the world.

Giovanni Tolasano, a mercer of Villaro, as he was passing by the hill of Juliano, saw a poor woman flying from the soldiers, with a cradle on her head, wherein was a young sucking child; but seeing she was like to be overtaken by them, she left her cradle in the middle of the way, as verily believing those butchers could not possibly have such hearts of adamant as to lay violent hands upon the poor innocent babe, and so hid herself not far from the place, in a cleft of the rock. But those blood-hounds having found the infant in the cradle, in a most savage manner took it out, and pulled it into four pieces or quarters; and afterwards finding the mother, ravished her, then cut off her head, and left her dead body upon the snow.

The daughter of Moyses Long, of Bobio, about ten years of age, was taken by the soldiers of Piedmont, as she was flying upon the snow, who, broaching her upon a pike or halbert, roasted her alive upon a broad stone not far from the place. When they had thus done, they cut off a slice of her flesh, intending to have made a meal's meat on her, but not finding it thoroughly roasted, their stomachs would not serve them to eat it.

M. Gross, pastor of Villario, in Bobio, told the author (Sir S. M.) during his abode at Geneva, that being at Pignerolio, he heard several persons affirm, that some of the murderers, having taken eleven men at Garcigliana, heated a great oven or furnace red-hot, and caused those poor creatures to throw one another into the said fiery furnace; and when it came to the last man, they themselves threw him in. It is a thing most certain also, that very frequently these blood-hounds pursued and hunted out multitudes of those poor Protestants among the rocks and mountains, by the very traces of their bleeding feet and legs, which had been sorely cut and mangled by the ice and flints which they met with by the way, in their flight.

These are a few examples, taken almost at random from a catalogue of some hundreds, related with horrible minuteness by the English Ambassador. It would be difficult to find instances of such cruelty among the rudest savages; for there is no ferocity or cruelty equal to that with which the devil qualifies his agents for the propagation of idolatry and superstition, and for blotting out the knowledge of real Christianity from the earth.

This remark is confirmed by what Dr Geddes records of what came under his own observation, when he was an eyewitness of an Auto-da-fe. The victims were chained to stakes, at the height of about four feet from the ground. A quantity of furse that lay round the bottom of the stakes was set on fire; by a current of wind it was in some cases prevented from reaching above the lowest extremities of the body. Some were thus kept in torture for an hour or two, and were actually roasted, not burnt to death. This spectacle, says he, is beheld by people of both sexes, and all ages, with such transports of joy and satisfaction, as are not on any other occasion to be met with. And that the reader may not think that this inhuman joy is the effect of a natural cruelty that is in these people's disposition, and not the spirit of their religion, he may rest assured, that all public malefactors, except heretics, have their violent death no where more tenderly lamented, than amongst the same people, and even when there is nothing in the manner of their death that appears inhuman or cruel.—See Limborch, vol. ii. p. 301.

No. CXXIX.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30TH, 1820.

ACCORDING to the courtly, or ever-courteous morality of this world, it is alleged, that the more deficient a man is known to be, with respect to any particular virtue, the more abundantly it ought to be bestowed upon him, by his flatterers during his life, and his panegyrists after his death. The Inquisition seems to have acted upon this principle from its very commencement. It gave itself out as the holy office, and all men were required to regard it, and call it holy, though it is well known to have been the most unholy tribunal that ever afflicted the world. In like manner the Inquisition incessantly boasted of its justice and its mercy, especially of the latter, though it is certain that its justice was a perversion of all righteousness, and the tenderest of its mercies was the most barbarous cruelty.

I had thought of afflicting my readers by presenting them with a particular account of an Auto-da-fe, which would have occupied a Number or two, but on reflection, I rather chose to pass this over. Those who wish to have their souls harrowed up by such an exhibition, may find materials in Limborch's History, and in almost all the Martyrologies in the English language. Suffice it to say, that an Auto-da-fe, or Act of Faith, was the burning to death of such persons as the holy Inquisition was pleased to pronounce defective in their belief of all, or any of the error and nonsense which the Church of Rome had propounded as articles of faith. This burning took place as often as the holy office could provide subjects for the fire. Kings and queens were not only invited to witness it as a most joyful spectacle; but actually required to sanction it with their presence, under the pain of being themselves suspected of heretical pravity. Limborch gives a series of prints, in which the king and queen of Spain are represented under a rich and royal canopy, feasting their eyes with the delightful spectacle of a number of poor wretches led to be committed to the flames; and the representation is by no means a production of the fancy. It is sober historical truth, the memory of which will remain to the latest ages, as an evidence of the diabolical cruelty and wickedness of the Church of Rome, and of all those who lent themselves to its support.

It was the manner of the holy Inquisitors to be continually boasting of their mercy. It often happened that the most inoffensive man in a city was brought before them, under a vague suspicion of something which related to the integrity of the faith. After having his spirits broken by confinement in a dungeon for months or years, he was required to make confession of his crimes, while he was not conscious of any thing in his conduct that deserved the name of crime. The holy fathers would not condescend to tell him what it was of which he was accused; but they would assure him that the holy Inquisition was merciful, and that if he would make a free and candid confession, he should be mercifully dealt with. The poor man could not confess crimes of which he was not guilty; and the holy Inquisitors, in their great mercy, would send him back to his dungeon, with a command to review his whole life; and there they would leave him for a year or two longer, to recollect, if he could, every word that he had spoken, and every person to whom he had spoken, during the whole period of his conscious existence.

A man thus shut up in a dark and loathsome dungeon, without the society of a living creature, would very probably recollect some foolish thing that he had said to some person in the course of his life; and trusting in the boasted mercy of the holy tribunal, he would confess this the next time he was called to a hearing. This however would only furnish his tormentors with a pretext for teasing him with more ensnaring questions, not only with regard to himself, but also the persons with whom he had conversed upon any point of religion. These persons would be immured within the sacred walls before the next morning; and he himself would be sent back to his dungeon to consider of what other crimes he ought to accuse himself.

These reflections are not thrown out at random. They are supported by incontestible facts, as any person may see who will read the numerous relations in Limborch, and in Baker's History of the Inquisition. This last author, among a number of instances, relates at great length, the sufferings of one Isaac Martin, an English merchant in Malaga, who was confined in the Inquisition in 1714, and grievously tormented, upon suspicion of his being a Jew, and that upon no stronger evidence than that his name was Isaac, and that he had a son whom he had named Abraham. It was in vain that he protested that he was a Christian of the Church of England, and that Abraham and Isaac were not Jews, but had lived hundreds of years before the designation of Jew was known in the world. The Inquisitors would not believe his assertion either with regard to himself or the patriarchs. He was known to be guilty of the crime of being rich, of which he was effectually purged by the holy office, for this heresy yields to force sooner than any other; and then he was sent out of the country with a body dreadfully torn by scourging and other torments which he had endured.

But the unparalleled hypocrisy and impudence of the Inquisitors appear chiefly in their professions of mercy for those whom they have devoted to the flames. It is pretended that the holy office puts no man to death. It merely, on finding persons obstinate heretics, delivers them over to the civil power, which in a Popish country must submit to be the church's hangman; and when men are so delivered over, it is with great affectation of pity and compassion on the part of the ghostly fathers, who beseech the magistrate, perhaps with tears in their eyes, as a crocodile is said to shed tears over the prey he is about to devour, to deal mercifully with the unhappy criminals, and to be sure not to hurt them; and this at the very time when the stake is fixed, the fuel prepared, and people assembled to witness their execution; and if any magistrate should so understand them as to comply with their request, the fire would soon be applied to himself as a favourer of heretics.

"Is there," says Dr Geddes, in his view of the Court of Inquisition in Portugal, p. 446. "in all history, an instance of so gross and confident a mockery of God, and the world, as this of the Inquisitors beseeching the civil magistrate, not to put the heretics they have condemned and delivered to them, to death? For were they in earnest when they made this solemn petition to the secular magistrates, why do they bring their prisoners out of the Inquisition, and deliver them to those magistrates in coats painted over with flames? Why do they teach that heretics, above all other malefactors, ought to be punished with death? And why do they never resent the secular magistrates having so little regard to their earnest and joint petition as never to fail to burn all the heretics that are delivered to them by the Inquisition, within an hour or two after they have them in their hands? And why in Rome, where the supreme, civil, and ecclesiastical authority are lodged in the same person, is this petition of the Inquisition, which is made there as well as in other places, never granted?"—Thus far Dr Geddes. And let me here add, that this hypocrisy and dissimulation is the more vile and execrable, in that the Inquisitors are commanded by the bulls of several Popes, to compel the secular magistrate, under penalty of excommunication and other ecclesiastical censures, within six days, readily to execute the sentences pronounced by the Inquisitors against heretics, that is, to burn them. Limborch, vol. ii. p. 289.

On entering upon this subject, I said that Popish writers traced the Inquisition to a period as ancient as that of the Mosaic dispensation. I have since received from a correspondent, an extract from a Spanish author, who maintains that the holy tribunal had its origin in paradise; but instead of ascribing it to its real author, who was a liar and a murderer from the beginning, this writer blasphemously represents the Creator himself as the first Inquisitor, and Adam and Eve as the first who were brought before the holy tribunal. The words are "Dizen que Dios fue Inquisidor de Adam y Eva por haver comido el vedado fruto." &c. &c. That is, "It is said that God was Inquisitor of Adam and Eve, for having eaten the forbidden fruit."

If there be any of my readers who wish to see more evidence of the bloody and murderous character of Popery than I have given in my late Numbers, I refer them to the narrative of the grand massacre in Paris, which is recorded in all our ecclesiastical histories and martyrologies. And here I take the opportunity of expressing my best thanks to a worthy correspondent in Ireland, for sending me an impression in wax, of a genuine medal which Pope Gregory XIII. ordered to be struck, in honourable commemoration of that, to him, joyful event. It is pretty generally known, that the Pope was so delighted with the intelligence which he received from Paris on that occasion, that he ordered solemn thanksgiving to God to be offered up in all the churches. But that the memory of the thing might not be forgotten, he ordered to be struck a medal in silver, which has on one side, a well-defined profile of himself, and on the reverse, the figure of an angel, with a crucifix in one hand, and a drawn sword in the other, in the act of destroying a confused multitude of human creatures, who are represented as falling down before him. O, what a delightful picture this must be to all good Papists! and how they would rejoice if they had it in their power to do the thing over again! Some sentimental Protestants will cry out against this as uncharitable, and they will insist upon it, that modern Papists are not so bloody-minded; then let modern Papists themselves say so. Let them condemn the bloody massacre of thousands of peaceable citizens; and let them condemn the fiend-like triumph and rejoicing of the head of their church on the occasion, and then they may perhaps deserve credit for their professions of being more humane and less bloody-minded than their fathers were. But I know they will not, and that they dare not pronounce any such condemnation. They will not say that the head of their church did wrong in rejoicing, and in calling the whole church to rejoice in that horrible massacre; and, therefore, I do them no wrong in maintaining, that they would practise the same thing if they had it in their power.

The Papists in France had another glorious opportunity of glutting themselves with the blood of Protestants, on the revocation of the edict of Nantz, by Lewis XIV. For particulars, I refer the reader to Jurieu's Pastoral Letters:—the Introduction to Quick's Synodicon:—and to a work in French entitled, "Etat des Réformes en France:" printed at the Hague in 1685, during the very heat of the persecution. This work was lately sent me by a reverend gentleman from a remote part of the Highlands. It goes with much detail into the dreadful sufferings which Protestants were called to endure on that occasion. I do not know if there be an edition of it in English.

To come nearer home, I might fill a volume with a tragical account of the sufferings of Protestants in Ireland, in the great massacre and rebellion that commenced in 1641, in the reign of Charles I. "The rebellion," says Hume, "which had been upwards of fourteen years threatened in Ireland, and which had been repressed only by the vigour of the Earl of Stafford's government, broke out at this time with incredible fury. On this fatal day, the Irish, every where intermingled with the English, needed but a hint from their leaders and priests to begin hostilities against a people whom they hated on account of their religion, and envied for their riches and prosperity. The houses, cattle, and goods of the unwary English were first seized. Those who heard of the commotions in their neighbourhood, instead of deserting their habitations, and assembling together for mutual protection, remained at home, in hopes of defending their property, and fell thus separately into the hands of their enemies. After rapacity had fully exerted itself, cruelty, and that the most barbarous that ever in any nation was known or heard of, began its operations. A universal massacre commenced of the English (Protestants) now defenceless, and passively resigned to their inhuman foes; no age, no sex, no condition was spared. The wife weeping for her butchered husband, and embracing her helpless children, was pierced with them, and perished by the same stroke; the old, the young, the vigorous, the infirm, underwent the like fate, and were confounded in one common ruin. In vain did flight save from the first assault; destruction was every where let loose, and met the hunted victims at every turn. In vain was recourse had to relations, to companions, to friends; all connections were dissolved, and death was dealt by that hand from which protection was implored and expected. Without provocation, without opposition, the astonished English (Protestants), being in profound peace and full security, were massacred by their nearest neighbours with whom they had long upheld a continued intercourse of kindness and good offices. But death was the lightest punishment inflicted by those enraged rebels; all the tortures which wanton cruelty could devise, all the lingering pains of body, and anguish of mind, the agonies of despair, could not satiate revenge excited without injury, and cruelty derived from no cause. To enter into particulars would shock the least delicate humanity; such enormities, though attested by undoubted evidence, would appear almost incredible.

"The weaker sex themselves, naturally tender and compassionate, here emulated their more robust companions in the practice of every cruelty. Even children, taught by the example, and encouraged by the exhortations of their parents, essayed their feeble blows on the dead carcasses, or defenceless children of the English (Protestants). The very avarice of the Irish was not a sufficient restraint to their cruelty; such was their frenzy, that the cattle which they had seized, and by rapine made their own, yet because they bore the name of English, were wantonly slaughtered, or when covered with wounds, turned loose into the woods and deserts.

"The stately buildings or commodious habitations of the planters, as if upbraiding the sloth and ignorance of the natives, were consumed with fire, or laid level with the ground; and where the miserable owners shut up their houses and prepared for defence, perished in the flames, together with their wives and children, a double triumph was afforded to their insulting foes. If any where a number assembled together, and assuming courage from despair, were resolved to sweeten death by revenge upon their assassins, they were disarmed by capitulations and promises of safety, confirmed by the most solemn oaths; then the rebels (in the immutable spirit of Popery), with perfidy equal to their cruelty, made them share the fate of their unhappy countrymen. Others more ingenious still in their barbarity, tempted their prisoners with the fond hope of life, to embrue their hands in the blood of their friends, brothers, and parents; and having thus rendered them accomplices in guilt, gave them that death which they sought to shun by deserving it.

"Amidst all these enormities, the sacred name of religion sounded on every side, not to stop the hands of these murderers, but to enforce their blows, and to steel their hearts against every movement of human or social sympathy. The English, as heretics abhorred of God, and detestable to all holy men, were marked out by the priests for slaughter; and of all actions, to rid the world of these declared enemies to Catholic faith and piety, was represented as the most meritorious in its nature, which, in that rude people, sufficiently inclined to atrocious deeds, was further stimulated by precepts and national prejudices, empoisoned by those aversions, more deadly and incurable, which arose from an enraged superstition. While death finished the sufferings of each victim, the bigoted assassins, with joy and exultation, still echoed in his expiring ears, that these agonies were but the commencement of torments infinite and eternal."

This extract from Hume's History is given by the Rev. Mr Graham, as an Introduction to his interesting work,—The Annals of Ireland. "That he has not heightened the picture beyond reality," says this author, "the writings of Temple, of Clarendon, of Rushworth, of Whitlock, contemporary historians, and volumes of original depositions taken on the occasion, and now extant in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, sufficiently prove."

Mr Graham has, with immense labour, collected and arranged such a number of well attested facts on this subject, in his "Annals of Ireland," as will make the labour of the future historians very easy, and hold up to the abhorrence of future ages the cruel and unrelenting spirit of the Romish religion. After the general massacre had commenced, and thousands were obliged to flee for their lives, Mr Graham proceeds as follows, and gives Temple for his authority:—

"Many persons of good rank and quality came into Dublin, covered with old rags, and some without any other covering than a little twisted straw to hide their nakedness. Some reverend ministers escaped with their lives, sorely wounded—wives came bitterly lamenting the murder of their husbands—mothers lamenting their children barbarously destroyed before their faces. Some were so overwearied with long travel, that they came creeping on their knees, others frozen up with cold, ready to give up the ghost in the streets. To add to their miseries, they found all manner of relief utterly disproportionable to their wants, the Popish inhabitants refusing to minister the least comfort to them, so that these sad creatures appeared like living ghosts in every street. Many empty houses in the city were, by special direction, taken for them; barns, stables, and outhouses were filled with them, yet many lay in the open streets, and there most miserably perished. Those of a better quality who could not bring themselves to beg, crept into private places, and some of them, who had not friends to relieve them, wasted away silently, and died unnoticed."

The infatuated and unfortunate King Charles I., who was most unhappily beset by a Popish queen, and a host of Jesuit priests, was pretty generally suspected of having given his countenance to this rebellion of his Popish, and consequent massacre of his Protestant subjects; and it is certain that the rebels gave out that they acted under a commission from him; but this is accounted for in the following manner, for which Mr Graham refers to Borlase, p. 30, Nov. 4, 1641. "On this day Sir Phelim O'Neil, and Roger M'Guire, gave notice to their confederates, from the rebel camp at Newry, of their having received a commission from the king under the great seal of Scotland. This pretended commission was disclaimed by Lord M'Guire afterwards; and it appears that one Plunket, a worthy branch of the Cavan family of Popish advocates, having taken an old broad seal from an obsolete patent out of Farnham Abbey, fixed it to his forged commission, to seduce the vulgar into an opinion of the loyalty of those who had excited them to take arms." It will be in the recollection of most of my readers, that a similar trick was practised, a few years ago, upon the Lord Mayor and citizens of London, by means of which, the public funds rose 20 per cent. in one hour. We need not then be surprised, that the Papists of Ireland, few, if any, of whom, in those days, could read, should have been deceived; and that the king should have got the blame of what arose from the unstimulated barbarity of his Popish subjects; or which, if stimulated at all, was by the queen and her Jesuit incendiaries.

It was then publicly declared by the rebels, that no Protestant should be suffered to live in Ireland. On Sunday, October 24, "Rory M'Guire, who had, on the preceding day hanged seventeen Protestants in the church of Clowes, seized Mr Middleton, at Castlekeagh, alias Ballybalfure, in the county of Fermanagh, robbed him of his money, burned the county records in this gentleman's possession, and compelled him to declare himself a Papist, after which they hanged him and his wife and children, and put one hundred persons in the town to death." P. 9, with reference to Borlase, p. 58, &c.

Let us never forget that this wickedness was perpetrated under the influence of an unchanged and unchangeable religion, which is maintained in all its integrity by the Papists of the present day. My author introduces a remark of a late eminent civilian, which is well worthy of the attention of every man who is concerned for the safety of his country. "The government and legislature had better beware of attempting to conciliate the Roman Catholics of Ireland by reiterated concessions, for although they grant all the demands of the laity, show me the man that can say, that their clergy have ever suffered a document to issue from their hands, by which the extent of their pretensions and expectations can be ascertained." The fact is, their expectations are nothing less than the overthrow of the present established order of things;—the establishment of their own religion, to the exclusion of every other;—and the restoration of all the property which belonged to the Popish establishment, and to Popish families, in former ages, and which had been forfeited by their treasons. This is what our Papists expect and desire; but it does not suit their purpose to make much talk about the extent of their expectations.

No. CXXX.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 6TH, 1821.

DECEIT and violence are the two main pillars of Satan's kingdom. This corresponds with the character of the adversary himself, who has been a liar and a murderer from the beginning; that is, one who makes use of deceit and violence for the promotion of his cause in the world. Viewed in this light, Popery proves itself to be of its father the devil. In my late Numbers, I have given, I think, sufficient evidence of its violent and murderous character. I shall now proceed to show how deceitful it is; and that it is no less dependent upon lying than upon murder for its support. I do not rest this assertion merely upon the falsehoods published by our Glasgow Papists against myself, which were exposed in my Letter to Mr M'Hardy, which exposure remains to this day unrefuted. I shall prove my point by reference to a greater authority in the Romish church than any that Glasgow can boast of having possessed for at least two hundred and forty years.

It is a prominent feature in the character of Papists, that they will tell a man to his face what both he and they know to be a lie, and command him to believe it, under pain of death. In my last Number, I alluded in general terms to the revocation of the edict of Nantz, and the miseries which were, in consequence of this revocation, inflicted upon the Protestants in that kingdom, thousands of whom were compelled to leave their country for ever, or submit to the alternative of becoming Papists, or being put to death, or condemned to the galleys for life, which was the mildest sentence that any of them could expect. For almost a century, the Protestant religion had been legally recognised in that kingdom, and its professors protected, according to the edict above mentioned, for which they were indebted to the famous Henry IV. In these circumstances, there were many who professed to be Protestants merely because they had been so educated; but who had no heartfelt conviction of the truth and importance of the tenets by which they were distinguished from their Popish neighbours. When the edict was revoked, and when all men were required, under pain of military execution, to conform to the church of Rome, and subscribe a declaration to that effect, which declaration was presented by a host of armed dragoons, there were not a few who refused to conform, choosing rather to suffer death, or the galleys, as it might please their tormentors, the merciful agents of the Pope, and Lewis XIV.; but at the same time, it must be admitted, that great numbers of those who were Protestants only in name, terrified by what was threatened, and what they saw their neighbours suffer, did subscribe the declaration, did renounce the Protestant religion, and declare themselves good Papists, according to the will of the Pope and the King. Some real Christians, under the influence of fear, were induced to subscribe; but finding no peace in their consciences, they publicly recanted their cowardly compliance, and chose to suffer death rather than continue to deny the truth. These, however, were few in comparison of those over whom the fear of man prevailed, and who suffered themselves quietly to be considered as belonging to the merciful, holy, and infallible church of Rome.

On this occasion the celebrated Bossuet, bishop of Meaux, a man of rare talents, but a devoted partisan of the holy see, published what he called "The Pastoral Letter of my Lord the Bishop of Meaux to the new Catholics of his diocese." By the "new Catholics" are meant the recent converts, who had been compelled at the point of the bayonet to renounce the Protestant religion. "The Pastoral Letter" congratulates them on their reconciliation with the only true church, in such language as this:—"I do not marvel, my dearest brethren, that you are returned in troops, and with so much ease, to the church where your ancestors have served God. The foundation of Christianity, and, as I have already said, the character of baptism, hath secretly called you hither." In the esteem of the bishop, who remained quietly at home, the conversion of these men was effected with much ease; but it appears, that in some instances at least, it was no easy task for the dragoons. "Set him matter of fact," says M. Jurieu, "against this pretended facility (of conversion) and assure him, that for four months time there have been assemblies almost every day in the Cevennes, and in the adjacent parts, for the offering up prayers and supplications to God, sometimes in woods, at other times in caves, and rocks, and dens of the earth. The dragoons, which almost always surprise them, put them to the sword, according to their instructions; they kill, and hang, and drag them to prisons; but all signifies nothing; they assemble nevertheless. In the month of June last, near the end thereof, the dragoons having surprised an assembly near Nismes, they killed many of them on the place, and four they hung upon the trees. The hangmen withdrew, supposing that they would have no great inclination to return again to that place. But two hours after there was another assembly in the same place, on the dead bodies, and in the view of the carcases that hung on the trees of the mountains. There is not a week passes without like assemblies and like massacres."

Now it was while the Protestants were suffering such cruel persecution, that the bishop of Meaux, in his Pastoral Letter, addressed his new Catholics,*—those who had been compelled to become such, and that he had the impudence to tell them that they were voluntary converts,—that they had suffered nothing,—and that they had not even heard of such a thing as persons suffering on account of religion. His words are;—"Not one of you hath suffered violence, either in his person or goods. So far have you been from suffering torments, that you have not so much as heard them mentioned. I hear other bishops say the same. But for you, my brethren, I say nothing to you but what you may speak as well as I. You are returned peaceably to us, YOU KNOW IT." The design of the bishop was to make the world believe that there was no persecution in France at the time; but that thousands of heretics were, of their own accord, and from a conviction of the truth, returning to the bosom of the Church; and his appeal to the converts themselves was a Jesuitical trick, by which he hoped to stop the mouths of all gainsayers; for it would be said that the new converts acquiesced in the truth of the statement;—they had been appealed to as to the fact, and no one had denied it. But the bishop knew well that no one dared deny it, else he would have lost all the benefit of his conversion, and have been sent to the flames, or to the galleys for life. Thus were deceit and violence combined to prop up the tottering system of Antichrist. Violence is not so common now as it was then, for the world will not suffer it; but the system of deceit is as prevalent as ever, of the truth of which I could produce abundant evidence. I long ago brought to view one fact which is conclusive on this subject. All the world knows that Popery is tolerated and protected in every part of the British empire, and that there is no legal obstruction to the free exercise of Popish worship any more than to that of other dissenters from the established religion, yet our Irish Papists lately told the head of their church, and published to the world, that they were suffering the most sanguinary and unrelenting persecution that ever aggrieved a Christian people. The impudence of the assertion was equal to that of the bishop of Meaux, who told a miserable and persecuted people, in the face of the world, that they had suffered no persecution; and while the bishop stood only upon his personal responsibility as an author, the Hibernian lie was asserted by a board, professing to represent the whole of "Catholic Ireland;" and it may therefore be considered as asserted by all the Papists in that kingdom, though not one of them should have suffered in a hair of his head, or to the extent of a farthing of his property on account of being a Papist.

My almost forgotten opponent Amicus Veritatis, in one of his letters in the Glasgow Chronicle, (see Prot. part I. p. 28,) has some piteous wailing about persecution; but he has taken care not to enter into particulars, lest the reader should discover that his Popish ancestors in this country had nothing to complain of, at least very little in comparison of what they inflicted upon Protestants in the times of their power. In support of something that I had written, I had quoted a bull of Pope Urban VIII. To this Amicus Veritatis replied as follows:—"Respecting the bull of Pope Urban VIII., the style and language in which it is couched assure me that it must be a forgery. Its very date increases my suspicion. A period when the sword of persecution was unsheathed from its scabbard—when the flames of intolerance raged with destructive violence—when the storms of passion, like a hurricane upon the deep, overwhelmed the miserable victims of their fury—when the demon of falsehood spread her malignant influence over the hearts and sensibilities of men, and prompted them to invent the most wicked calumnies for the destruction of their Catholic brethren. Who would take a review, from the year 1577 to the year 1684, that would not shudder at the horrific scenes that were the consequence of accumulated forgeries?" &c.

I shall not stay long to inquire how my opponent comes to be so well acquainted with the "style and language" of the holy see, as to be assured that the bull here referred to is a forgery, and that merely from its style, and language, and date. It was produced in the Court of King's Bench, on the trial of one of the Irish rebels, February 10th, 1644, and so far as appears, no objection was made to it, either by the court, or the criminal. Its authenticity was not then questioned; and it is rather too late to question it now. This bull granted a plenary indulgence, and full remission of all their sins, to such Irish Papists as should most effectually contribute to the extirpation of their Protestant neighbours; and that the command of the holy father was obeyed to a fearful extent, and with the most barbarous cruelty, I again refer to the reverend Mr Graham's Annals of Ireland, in which the fact is proved by the most abundant evidence.

During this period, to adopt the elegant language of my opponent, the sword of persecution was unsheathed from its sheath, or scabbard, as he has it. He was not thinking of the many thousands who were murdered in Ireland, by their Popish neighbours, solely because they were Protestants. This subject had no magnitude in his eye. The murdered persons were heretics; and therefore, according to the true Romish doctrine, laid down by the Rhemish translators of the New Testament, putting them to death was no crime. (See their note on Rev. xvii. 6.) His declamation about "flames of intolerance," "storms of passion" overwhelming "the miserable victims of its fury," relates merely to the sufferings of a few Jesuits, who, in the reign of Elizabeth, and for some time after, were found plotting against the state, with a view to overturn the established order, and to restore Popery, and who, of course, suffered the penalty of their treason. As for his accusation that Protestants invented "the most wicked calumnies for the destruction of their Catholic brethren," I maintain, that the thing was impossible; for no such creatures were then known by Protestants as "Catholic brethren." Those who now assume the name would then have been called "Popish malignants;" and there was no occasion to invent calumnies against them: —they were the known and convicted enemies of our Protestant established government.

I am by no means disposed to deny that Protestants have been persecutors; but I do maintain that Papists have suffered little from this quarter, while Protestants themselves have suffered not a little from it. Severe laws were indeed enacted against Papists, but at different periods, from the Reformation to the Revolution in 1688, they were a mere dead letter. If a Papist chose to enjoy his religion in peace, he was much safer in England than a Puritan, and in Scotland than a Covenanter. I grant indeed, that during the period to which this remark chiefly refers, our government, though nominally Protestant, was much under Popish influence, as was less or more the case during the reigns of the three last of the Stuarts, when many conscientious Protestants suffered nearly as much as they had done under Popery; and those who were suffering very naturally desired, and loudly demanded the execution of the laws against Papists, who they believed were instigators of the persecution. The fact is, our Reformers brought their intolerant notions from Rome, and it was long ere their successors could shake themselves loose of principles which they had imbibed from their fathers. No consistent Protestant of the present day will justify Cranmer in putting poor women to death for being Anabaptists; —or the Presbyterians for attempting to compel all England to submit to their discipline; —or the Independents in New England for their severities against Quakers and witches. It would be easy to make out a bloody case against one or other of the three denominations, which might emulate, at an humble distance, some of the least horrible instances of cruelty which I have given in my late Numbers. But it would be unjust, as well as ungenerous, to bring an accusation of this kind against the Independents, Presbyterians, and Episcopalians of the present day, because they disavow and condemn in the most unequivocal terms, not only persecution in general, but the specific acts of it, which stand on record against their predecessors, and the conduct of these predecessors themselves, by name, if they are able to ascertain the names of individuals who were guilty.

But the principles of Popery, and of course of all true Papists, are always the same. What the Pope commanded in the thirteenth century, when he issued an order to destroy and tread under foot, as venomous adders, hundreds of thousands of human beings, for disbelieving transubstantiation and purgatory, he has a right still to command; and his subjects have no right but to obey. In a Protestant country like this, they will condemn and argue against persecution for conscience' sake, when it is considered merely as an abstract question; but they will not condemn any specific act of persecution of which their holy church, or holy father, stands convicted; and the reason is, they do not consider, at least they dare not call that persecution which the holy church pleases to do for the maintenance of the true faith. The doctrine of the church of Rome is very distinctly laid down by the bishop of Meaux, in a private letter to a gentleman of his diocese, who, it would appear, had some qualms of conscience about the severities which were inflicted upon the Protestants, and who had gone, or was about to go over to them notwithstanding their persecutions. The bishop disavows persecution on the part of the church; but finds the state bound to do it at the church's bidding. It is worthy of remark, that this letter was written about the very time that he addressed his Pastoral Letter to the new converts, who were assured by him, that they had neither suffered nor heard of any persecution, or violence being inflicted upon persons on account of religion. I quote from Jurieu's Pastoral Letters, Let. I.

"From Meaux, April 3*d*, 1686.

"MONSIEUR,—I continue to write to you, notwithstanding the answer you made to my former letter. I have there observed a character and style too much of a minister, to attribute it to you. In a word, I apprehend that it does not proceed from a spirit such as yours. But although it be so, I shall not cease to invite you to return. I have seen in the letter you wrote to Mademoiselle of U. that the true church does not persecute. What understand you by that, Sir? Do you understand that the church by herself never makes use of force? That is very true, since the church has no other arms but spiritual. Do you understand that princes, who are sons of the church, never ought to make use of the sword which God hath put into their hands to abase the enemies thereof? Do you dare to say contrary to the opinion of your own doctors, who have maintained by so many writings, that the republic of Geneva had power and right to condemn Servetus to the fire for denying the divinity of the Son of God? And without serving myself of the examples and authority of your doctors, tell me in what texts of Scripture heretics and schismatics are excepted from the number of those malefactors against which St Paul says, God hath armed kings and princes. And although you will not permit Christian princes to take vengeance of such great crimes, because they are injurious to God, can they not take vengeance on them because they cause trouble and sedition in states? Do you not see clearly that they build upon a false principle?"—

Such is the doctrine of the great bishop of Meaux, who is allowed to be a pillar in the Romish temple. He is indeed of such authority among modern Papists, that his writings are usually referred to, as furnishing the best defence of the system that has appeared in modern times. Here, however, he appears as a mere sophist, and a sophist of the very lowest order. "Tell me," says he, "in what texts of Scripture heretics and schismatics are excepted from the number of those malefactors against which St Paul says, God has armed kings and princes?" To this question another question would be a sufficient reply:—Tell me in what texts of Scripture heresy and schism are declared to be crimes cognizable by the civil magistrate? It is not in the power of the Pope himself to point out in the Bible any such text; and the bishop's challenge amounts simply to this;—supposing it were a crime for a man or a woman to have red hair,—tell me in what texts of Scripture persons having red hair are excepted from the number of those malefactors against which God has armed kings and governors? I do most unequivocally maintain that the colour of a man's hair is as much cognizable by the civil magistrate, as his private thoughts in relation to any religious principle in which he may conceive the salvation of his soul to be interested. If a man shall think erroneously on such an important subject, the matter rests between God and himself; and no human power has a right to interfere. There is nothing in the apostle's words which can lead us to infer that civil governors have a right to interfere in our religious opinions, any more than in the colour of our hair. I must not be understood as asserting that heresy and schism are in themselves, and in the sight of God, as innocent as the colour of our hair; but I do maintain, that in the sight of the civil magistrate they ought to be held equally innocent; for they are not offences against the state, and therefore the magistrate, as head of the state, has nothing to do with them. If false principles in religion shall lead any to be guilty of immoral acts, or to disturb the peace of society, such persons ought then to be taken up and punished by the magistrate, but not till then.

The bishop of Meaux seems very glad to avail himself of a Protestant authority for putting men to death for conscience' sake. He refers to the republic of Geneva, which claimed the power and right to condemn Servetus to death for denying the divinity of the Son of God. Such a power will not be conceded to the republic by Protestants of the present day; and the melancholy fact here referred to, proves nothing but that the Genevese, though they had renounced Popery in name, held fast too much of the thing, when they could, in cold blood, consign a man to be burnt to death for certain speculative opinions, however erroneous, or even blasphemous these opinions were. Our great Reformer, Calvin, has been much reviled of late years for the hand which he is said to have had in this business; and I am far from saying that Calvin understood the subject of liberty of conscience, for no man in his day understood it; and perhaps he did not use the means which he might have used for saving Servetus from the cruel death to which he was condemned; but what I would remark here is, that the bishop of Meaux, who certainly had no good will towards Calvin, and who would have been happy to publish any thing unfavourable to him, had it come in his way, does not so much as insinuate that he had any hand in the burning of Servetus; but gives it as the doing of the republic of Geneva, without so much as mentioning the name of the Reformer. The bishop lived much nearer the time of Calvin than we do, and according to a principle much insisted upon by Papists, had better opportunities of knowing the facts than we can have. Since, therefore, he did not consider Calvin implicated in the infamous transaction, the Anticalvinists of the present day have no right to declare him guilty.

I now, for the present, take leave of the subject of persecution and the Inquisition. I have got over the most disagreeable part of my labours; but I have still a great deal of work before me, which will occupy the greater part of the present year at least. In the next, and some following numbers, I shall pay my respects to some correspondents, beginning with an extract of a letter from Juvenis with remarks thereon.

No. CXXXI.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 13TH, 1821.

A FEW weeks ago, I was favoured with a second letter from my correspondent Juvenis, equally well written, and in equally good temper with his former one. Had it been of moderate length, I should cheerfully have inserted it entire; but I think his own good sense will suggest to him, that he cannot reasonably expect, that I should occupy so many of my pages with mere verbal criticism, as his dissertation on the Greek word πετρος alone would occupy; not to mention his long extracts from the writings of ancient fathers, which have no weight with me, in reference to the point in question, and which would be of very little importance to my readers in general. Were I to print his whole letter, and reply to it all, it would take me the third time over the same ground, without having a new idea to suggest, or a new argument to combat.

Suffice it to say, that he has laboured with great ingenuity and acuteness to prove that πετρος signifies rock as well as stone. He has not convinced me that it is so; but as I said before, (see Prot. No. CXIX. p. 499,) though I were to concede this to him, it would signify very little. He has not shown that it signifies the rock (τη πετρᾳ) on which Christ promised to build his church; and now I say, that were even this conceded to him, which it is not, he would be as far as ever from having shown, that Peter was bishop of Rome; that the Popes are his successors; that those lechers and murderers, who filled the see of Rome for hundreds of years, were Peter's successors, and Christ's vicars, and the foundation on which Christ built his church; and yet, unless Juvenis can prove this, all his arguments go for nothing. It is the system of Popery as it appears in the world at present, and has done for a thousand years, with which I am contending; and unless Juvenis can make it appear from the New Testament, that such a system was appointed by Jesus Christ, it is of no use to dispute about the meaning of a word, or whether Christ constituted the apostle Peter his vicar, and head over his fellow-apostles. I defy the whole Church of Rome to prove even this; but suppose they had proved it, it would not follow, that the greatest monsters of cruelty and impurity, as most of the Popes have been, were Christ's vicars and heads of his church.

Juvenis disavows an inference which I drew from a clause in his former letter; namely, that by asserting the purity of the Church of Rome for the first 500 years, and limiting his remark to this period, he tacitly admitted its impurity thereafter. Justice requires me to insert his reply to this in his own words; and as he has some other things in the concluding part of his letter which are worthy of remark, I shall give it verbatim from this point:—

"'But what' you say, 'does my correspondent gain by asserting the purity of his church for 500 years? This is a tacit admission that she has been impure for more than double that time, seeing he has not a word to say in her behalf since the end of the fifth century.' This admission I deny. I however admit the well-known fact, that many Protestants assert the church's corruption in the time to which you refer; and, to use the words of the Homilist, that 'the whole of Christendom had been at once drowned in abominable idolatry, and that for the space of 800 years and more; but how far this was really the case, or how far it was consistent with the promises of Christ, does not fall to be examined in the subject I have in hand. In treating of the subject of the supremacy, I was aware that in consequence of this common opinion, the belief of those times would be of no authority: for this reason I kept myself to those ages immediately succeeding, and adduced the writers of those times as witnesses of the faith delivered by the apostles, which then continued to be taught. For giving so many proofs from these authors, I stated, that it was by reason of the clearness of the testimony of Protestant authorities, the words of some of whom I gave, as so explicitly admitting the purity of the church in those times. This, however, was only confining myself to the evidence of an authority acknowledged by the most learned Protestants, and by no means an admission that she was impure in any succeeding age. But you demand, what those Protestants meant by the church purity of those times? To me it seems to require no explanation; the words 'pure' and 'purity' are used in the most unlimited sense, and no comparison whatever with any future period; and to give it in still more unequivocal terms, adding that they inviolably taught the faith delivered by the apostles, words which require no comment. Those sagacious opponents would not have made such a concession, had they the least ground for saying the fact was otherwise.

"'It has been,' says a celebrated divine of the established church, 'the common profession of Protestants to stand to the judgment of antiquity for the first 400 years and more, in all things; nay, we give the Romans the scope of the first 500 or 600 years.'—Bishop Morton's Appeal for Protestants, p. 354. * Yet to all the venerable writers of those times, which I cited as evidence of the faith of those ages, on the point in question, you declare that you are not obliged to submit to them, as you have never acknowledged their authority. You however add, that you will pay all due respect to the fathers in matters of fact, which came under their own observation, in so far as their account is consistent. This comes at once to the true nature of the question: I cited the fathers not as judges or expounders of the sense of Scripture, but as witnesses of the belief of the times in which they lived; those times which are declared to have taught the faith delivered by the apostles. Now as the sacred volume, in the point in question, as well as in many others, is liable to two interpretations, of a meaning directly opposite, what proof, I again ask, can we have which is the true one, but by referring to the belief of the Christian churches in those ages, which are allowed to have had the faith in the same purity as it was delivered? Therefore, as from the proofs I gave of the belief of the supremacy in those ages, it must be considered as the doctrine of apostles; and those testimonies are a farther confirmation of the plain course of our Saviour's words without the aid of any forced interpretation. But you would wish to know what proof there is that these are the genuine writings of the fathers. What proof has the learned world that the works ascribed to a Livy or a Xenophon are really the writings of these historians? The answer is generally known, and the cases are parallel. But then you assert that the Church of Rome found it convenient in 'the dark ages,' to make such erasures as were necessary to answer her own purposes. This you observe she could not so easily do with the New Testament, as the Greek church would be a check upon her. This subject, however, you promise to discuss at a future period. In the meantime, I may here ask a question, Had the Greek church none of the writings of the fathers? If she had, there was no doubt but she would preserve them from what you call the expurgatorian process of the Index, and be as much a check in the one case as in the other. As to the doctrines taught by the apostles, you deny that the fathers of the first ages had a better opportunity of knowing their true meaning than we ourselves have, seeing that they committed them to writing, which you observe we can understand as well as they could do. This might be true, if the inspired writings were so plain and simple as to be incapable of different interpretations; but as unhappily they are so subject to this abuse, it must be that the Christians of the first ages, living in times so near the apostles, and which continued to teach the faith pure, had better opportunities of knowing the true meaning, on doubtful points, than we have at this remote period, amidst so many contradictory explanations. On this point I will give you the opinion of one of the most eminent divines of the established church, of the present day. The Sacramental Catechism, a work in general estimation in the church of our own country, in page 6, after asking if the communion was to be of perpetual duration, and giving the words of 1 Cor. xi. 26. it adds, 'and because the Christians of the first ages, who enjoyed the best means of information, had this opinion of it.' The opinion that the earlier Christians enjoyed better opportunities for information on doubtful points, than we do, is by no means singular; but this specimen may be sufficient as coming from such a respectable source.

"You advise me to forsake the writings of saints and fathers, to pay attention to my Bible, and follow where I shall find it to lead. The advice to a certain extent is good. The Bible would doubtlessly be the only rule in matters of religion, if it were sufficiently plain on all points of Christian doctrine; but as unfortunately this is not the case, the inspired writer himself telling us, that there are many parts hard to be understood, which many wrest to their own destruction, and which we ourselves see made to answer the most opposite opinions. In these circumstances there surely can be no impropriety in referring to the writings of those who lived in purer times; not, however, as judges, but as witnesses of the faith of the Christian church, whilst it is declared to have taught the faith in the same purity as it had been delivered by the apostles.

"There are two or three points in my letter which have not been noticed. Perhaps they may not have been worthy of it, or perhaps it is a 'tacit admission' of their being correct. In it I observe the mistake of a word, p. 118, line 9, for interpretations read interpolations. I am sorry that this should have as little to boast of brevity as its predecessor: with all my endeavours I could not be more concise. I, however, trust you will excuse even a second intrusion on your patience. With your convenience, your remarks will truly oblige, yours, with respect, JUVENIS."

29*th Nov.* 1820, (under the Edinburgh post mark.)

From the explanation with which my correspondent has favoured me, in the first paragraph of the preceding extract, I am satisfied that he did not mean to concede that his church became impure after the fifth century. He shows in a very intelligible manner, that he confined his remarks to the first 500 years, in condescension to certain Protestant writers, who had acknowledged the purity of the church of Rome during this period; not that he admitted the fact of her subsequent departure from purity of faith; and therefore, I do most readily relieve him from the imputation which such an admission might be understood to imply. I understand him, therefore, to assert that, in his opinion, the church of Rome at this day, holds the faith delivered by the apostles, with as much purity as she did at the conclusion of the fifth century. I may, hereafter, show that she was not very pure even then; but in the meantime, I wish to call the attention of my correspondent, and of my readers in general, to my admission that she was then comparatively pure. In my CXXth Number, page 500, speaking of the Church of Rome, I admitted, that "she was not then defiled by the absurdity of transubstantiation, and the idolatry of the mass; nor was the worship of images then generally practised; nor were the clergy then forbidden to marry; nor was it then allowed to them to keep concubines; and there are fifty other abominable things which were not then countenanced, but which sprung up in the dark ages which followed, and are now so essentially incorporated with the system that they cannot be separated from it." These words immediately precede, and stand in the same page with those which Juvenis quotes at the beginning of the first paragraph of his letter above cited. He must, therefore, have read them, and been perfectly familiar with them. Whence then is it that he makes no reply, and not even the most distant allusion to them in his long letter? He finds that I had passed over some things in his former letter; and from this he infers, that I had considered them unworthy of notice, or that my passing them over was "a tacit admission of their being correct." Now this is the fact. I did consider those two or three points in Juvenis's letter, of which I took no notice, either as correct, or not worth the correcting. Juvenis will, therefore, allow me to find that, his passing over the above two or three points about transubstantiation, and the mass, and images, and clerical impurity, is "a tacit admission" that my statement is true; or else that the things are not worthy of notice. The latter he cannot do; for some of the articles here enumerated are the main pillars of Popery. He is then reduced, upon his own principles, to the alternative of acquiescing in my assertion, that the idolatrous and abominable things above mentioned were not known in his church at the conclusion of the fifth century. But what then becomes of his leading doctrine, that the Church of Rome at this day holds the very same faith, and is at this day as pure as she was then? If Juvenis thinks I do him any injustice, in inferring this acquiescence from his silence on the above points, I shall be glad to be informed by a writer so temperate as he is, what he really understands by transubstantiation and the sacrifice of the mass; upon what authority he worships images; and upon what principle of morality it is considered by his church better for a clergyman to live in secret impurity with a number of concubines, than openly in the state of honourable marriage.

Juvenis lays great stress upon the circumstance of certain Protestant writers having admitted the purity of the church of Rome during the first five centuries. This I consider of no value whatever. There are Protestants who maintain publicly, that the Church of Rome at the present day is sound in the fundamental articles of religion, and who recommend a union between her and the Protestant church of England, though the fundamental doctrinal articles of the latter are as much opposed to those of the former as language can make them; and were indeed originally intended to exhibit a standard directly opposed to the doctrinal errors of Rome. This being the fact, it is not surprising that Protestants should be found who maintain the purity of the Church of Rome, at a period when she was a thousand times less polluted than she is now. But I must tell my correspondent, that on a point of this kind, I pay no more regard to the authority of modern Protestants than to that of ancient fathers; and therefore all that he builds upon their admissions must go for nothing.

It is very possible for a Church to have a sound creed; there may not be one article of her public profession inconsistent with the Holy Scriptures. Thus doctrinally she may appear pure in the sight of other churches; and yet she may be internally a mass of impurity. The Jewish church at different periods of her history, while holding the soundest creed in the world—professing to receive and hold fast the law of Moses, which was dictated by God himself, was yet no better than a body having no soundness in it, but full of wounds and bruises and putrifying sores. There is no heresy so bad as practical immorality; and whatever the creed of a church may be, if the prevailing spirit of its members be infidel or immoral, it is an impure church. That this was the case with the Church of Rome long before the conclusion of the fifth century, I appeal to every history that relates to ecclesiastical affairs during that period.

But that I may not be accused of resting upon mere human testimony, I shall shortly advert to what the New Testament informs us of, with regard to the Christians in Rome. I have already said that we do not find them any where in the inspired record appearing as one organized body, under the title of the Church of Rome; but when Paul wrote his epistle to the Christians there, he had occasion to praise their faith, which no doubt was an acknowledgment of both its purity and stedfastness. But a sad change soon took place. The first fruits dropped one after another into the grave. The emperor Claudius had banished from the city all of them who were Jews by birth, Acts xviii. 2. Many were banished and suffered death in the reign of Nero; so that when Paul came to Rome, at least when he was first called to appear before the emperor, there does not appear to have been a faithful man among all the Christians in the city; at least not one whose faith was strong enough to enable him to stand by the venerable and grievously persecuted apostle in the hour of trial. Like a parcel of cowards they all forsook him and fled. "At my first answer," says he, "no man stood with me, but all men forsook me; I pray God that this may not be laid to their charge," 2 Tim. iv. 16. This is the last apostolic account that we have of the Christians in Rome. It presents them in the light of cowards and apostates; for abandoning an apostle of Christ in such circumstances was little, if any thing, short of abandoning Christ himself. Paul prayed for them that their great guilt might not be laid to their charge. It is hoped the prayer was heard in respect of many of them; but we have no evidence of the restoration of them as a body to that honourable character under which Paul first addressed them, Rom. i. 8. Who then will answer for their purity as a church during the four centuries which immediately followed?

We know upon the authority of the apostolic writings, that few of the primitive churches maintained purity of faith and practice even to the end of the apostolic age. The whole of the churches in Galatia became corrupted by the leaven of the Judaizing teachers, for which see Paul's epistle to them. The church in Corinth, besides abusing the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, tolerated very gross immorality in one of its members, for which see Paul's first epistle to that church, chapters v. and xi. Of the seven churches in the Lesser Asia, who were addressed by the head of the church, in epistles written to them by the apostle John, only two were found without blame; (Rev. ii. and iii.) all the rest were corrupted less or more, by the admission of erroneous principles, or the sufferance of immoral practices,—the latter being indeed the natural consequence of the former. Now I challenge the Church of Rome to show to the world upon what ground she claims the honour of not having erred, or rather the privilege of being incapable of error, for this is what she would have us believe she possesses. She cannot adduce a divine promise in her favour, which would not equally apply to the churches in Galatia, the church in Corinth, or the seven churches in Asia. When we convict the Church of Rome of gross errors in doctrine, and, if possible, of grosser immoralities in practice, instead of clearing herself of what is thus brought home to her, she shelters herself under Christ's promise to his spiritual body, that the gates of hell should never prevail against it; but the church of Rome has never been able to show, that this applied to her, any more than to the church in Corinth, or the churches in Galatia, and seeing we know the fact, that the gates of hell, or the influence of the devil, did prevail against them, we can see no reason, connected with this divine promise, why the same influence should not also have prevailed over the Church of Rome. It rests with Papists to produce the patent, under the broad seal of heaven, which invests their church with the privilege of indefectability; and until they can produce this, we must be allowed to believe that she is as liable to corruption as any other church that is acknowledged to have become corrupt; we must be allowed to give credit to the unequivocal testimony of history, that she became notoriously corrupt at no great distance of time from the period that other churches became so; and we must also be allowed to believe the testimony of our own senses, when we read the blasphemous doctrines which are taught, and witness the idolatries which are practised by Papists of the present day, which inevitably lead us to the conclusion, that she is the most corrupt communion that ever appeared in the world under the much-abused name of Christian. Juvenis merely hints en passant, a doubt whether it be consistent with the promises of Christ, to assert with the Homilist, that the whole of Christendom had been drowned in abominable idolatry, and that for the space of 800 years and more. But before he troubled himself with a doubt upon the subject, he ought first to have ascertained whether Christ had ever made any promise to what he calls, or what the Homilist calls, "Christendom?" There is certainly no such promise in the New Testament, nor any recognition of such a term as a designation of his kingdom; nay, there is no recognition of the thing meant by it, and therefore none of Christ's promises can justly be made to apply to it.

I have no objection to the word "Christendom" when it is used merely to distinguish the countries in which Christianity is generally professed, from those in which Mahomedanism or heathenism prevails. But Christ's spiritual kingdom consists not of all who live in what are called Christian countries; but only of such as are born again,—who are become new creatures through the divine influence of the gospel believed by them. These may be scattered through all the nations of "Christendom," and also among heathen nations. They cannot be all known to one another in this world; but they are all known to him who is their Head. They may be a million of visible bodies on earth, if they were to be counted; but they are all one body in Christ. These with the company already in heaven, are his church, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail. He will keep every one of them by his mighty power through faith unto salvation. Organized churches, such as those in Corinth, in Ephesus, in Philippi and elsewhere, were visible representations of Christ's spiritual body, or kingdom; but he gave a special promise of perpetuity to none of them; and it is certain that Rome cannot show that ever he made any such promise to her. She has, therefore, no right to argue from his promise to his spiritual body, that such a carnal body of corruption, as she is, shall never fall into error.

No. CXXXII.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 20TH, 1821.

JUVENIS is beyond comparison the most respectable antagonist who has entered the lists with THE PROTESTANT. I feel pleasure in replying to his objections, because I think he has both understanding to apprehend, and candour to admit the force of certain facts and arguments which I have brought to bear upon the controversy which I am maintaining against his Church. The fragment of his letter which I inserted in my last Number, gives me an opportunity of explaining, and entering more fully into the discussion of some important points than I have hitherto done, though I may have slightly touched upon them. Of this opportunity I gladly avail myself; and I hope the remarks which I am about to make, in addition to those in my last Number, will not be considered uninteresting or irrelevant.

I had professed myself ready to pay all due respect to the fathers, as witnesses of matters of fact which came under their own observation, so far as they gave a consistent testimony. "This," says Juvenis, "comes at once to the true nature of the question; I cited the fathers not as judges or expounders of the sense of scripture, but as witnesses of the belief of the times in which they lived; those times which are declared to have taught the faith delivered by the apostles." Before proceeding farther I must ask, who are they that have declared what I have given in italics at the conclusion of the last sentence? If I shall be referred to Bishop Morton, or any author of his age, or since his age, I must reject him, and all such, as incompetent witnesses. They declare what they have not seen with their eyes, or heard with their ears. They know nothing of the matter but what they have learned from the very fathers, who are themselves adduced as witnesses in the same cause, and they cannot add the weight of a straw to their testimony. If the fathers have written, merely in general terms, that the faith of the apostles was purely taught in their time, it is no more than any cardinal in Rome would assert, and swear to at this very day. We know what would be the value of such an assertion, even when confirmed by oath. The cardinal might sincerely believe what he swore, and the fathers no doubt wrote what they believed to be true: but they merely express what was their own opinion of the matter; and in weighing evidence on such a subject, their opinion ought to have no more weight than that of any Protestant peasant who asserts, perhaps truly, that his minister teaches the faith as it was delivered by the apostles.

If the fathers, instead of barely asserting that the faith of Christ was purely taught in their times, which is in fact asserting no more than that the system which they held was the predominant one;—If, I say, instead of this, they go into details, and give us a summary of the doctrines which were then generally taught, I hold them competent witnesses of the fact, when two or three of them in the same age, agree in asserting it. I hold this as sufficient evidence that such and such doctrines were generally believed, and such forms of worship as they describe generally practised in the ages to which they refer. I made considerable use of this sort of evidence when I attempted to show that transubstantiation was a novelty, by quoting passages from the ancient fathers, which clearly proved that they, and the churches in their time, had no idea of the substance of the bread in the Lord's Supper being converted into the real body and blood, soul and divinity, of Jesus Christ. This sort of argument, however, does not go to prove that transubstantiation is contrary to scripture, (which is proved by other arguments) but merely that it was unknown to the fathers and the primitive churches.

To know what the Church of Rome, or any other church held as matter of faith, in any age subsequent to that of the apostles, is interesting to us merely as a matter of history. That certain articles were believed by the Church of Rome, in the second, third, and fourth centuries, is no evidence that such articles were taught by the apostles, unless we have the apostles' own word for it, in their own writings; and, if we have this, we receive such articles as the truth of God independently of the authority of the church, and whether she believed them or not. From the apostle Paul himself we learn, that a prevalent doctrine, believed and taught in the churches in Galatia, was, that in order to salvation, it was necessary to be circumcised, and to keep the law of Moses. Here is an unimpeachable witness of the fact, that such a doctrine generally prevailed, not near the apostolic age merely, but while many of the apostles were yet alive; but the fact is adduced, not to prove the truth of the doctrine, but to show the defection of those churches from the faith of the gospel. Papists adduce many facts asserted by less credible witnesses, to prove that certain tenets were taught and generally believed, some ages after the apostles had gone to their rest; but admitting the testimony to be true, it proves only that the Christians of those ages had departed from the faith of Christ, not that the tenets so maintained belonged to this faith. When it is ascertained, that many churches departed from the simplicity of the gospel, while they were under the keen discerning eye of the inspired apostles, how much more must not this have been the case, in the course of ages, when not favoured with such superintendence, and when exposed to the silent intrusion, and malign influence of worldly men, who soon began to insinuate themselves into the churches, and who actually filled that of Rome whenever Christianity became respectable in the eyes of the world?

I hope Juvenis, on reflection, will be convinced that there is no wisdom in suffering his mind to be entangled by the traditions of the fathers, which, unless supported by scripture, are absolutely useless; and which, if even so supported, are of little use, because the authority of the word of God is enough without them.

I am sorry, however, to observe that Juvenis, like most persons of his communion, does not seem to regard the scriptures with the respect to which they are entitled. "As the sacred volume," says he, "in the point in question as well as in many others, is liable to two interpretations, of a meaning directly opposite, what proof, I again ask, can we have which is the true one, but by referring to the belief of the Christian churches in those ages which are allowed to have had the faith in the same purity as it was delivered?" This argument rests upon the assumption of its being allowed that there were churches in certain ages after the apostles, who held the faith as purely as the apostles delivered it. This, however, is not allowed, but positively denied. There were not many churches that remained pure during the apostolic age; and there is no evidence of any having done so for any considerable period thereafter. Therefore, the argument which Juvenis builds upon this assumption falls to the ground.

But I have a more serious complaint against my correspondent. He seems to consider the Bible as inferior, in point of perspicuity, and less to be depended upon, than the writings of uninspired men. It is liable, he says, to two interpretations, of a meaning directly opposite; and his words imply that the writings of the fathers are not liable to this abuse, seeing that from them can be learned without danger of mistake, what cannot be so learned from the Bible. His words must mean this, else they mean nothing in relation to the point in hand. Now I would seriously request the writer of this to reflect deliberately upon what his words imply, and consider whether they do not at least approach to the sin of blaspheming the Holy Ghost. I do not say in that sense in which it is declared that such a sin shall not be forgiven; but they certainly do appear to impeach the power and the fidelity of the Holy Spirit, in dictating to, and guiding the pens of inspired men. I am persuaded this thought never occurred to my correspondent, else he would not have suffered such words to flow from his pen. In him therefore, I hope, it is only a sin of ignorance or inadvertence.

All scripture is given by inspiration of God; and holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. This is the testimony of apostles on behalf of prophets and their writings; and that the apostles themselves wrote under the same influence is evident from Christ's promise of his Spirit to be with them, to lead them into all truth, so that they should infallibly speak and write the truth in his name. Now it would be the greatest blasphemy to say, that the Divine Spirit could not enable these men to write in language at least as plain and perspicuous as other men; and it would be as great blasphemy to say that he purposely dictated language susceptible of a double meaning; for this would be to counteract the gracious design of Christ, who commanded his gospel to be published for the instruction and salvation of the simple, the ignorant, the poor, and miserable. But how could the gospel produce this effect, if it were expressed in language so equivocal as to bear opposite meanings? This is the accusation which Juvenis brings against the inspired writings; and if it were true, it would set aside the authority and use of the Bible altogether.

In another part of his letter, Juvenis writes, "The Bible would doubtlessly be the only rule in matters of religion, if it were sufficiently plain on all points of Christian doctrine; but as unfortunately this is not the case, the inspired writer himself telling us, that there are many parts hard to be understood, which many wrest to their own destruction; and which we ourselves see made to answer the most opposite opinions; in these circumstances, there surely can be no impropriety in referring to the writings of those who lived in purer times," &c. I might here ask Juvenis what he means by purer times? I understood him to undertake the task of showing that his church is as pure now as ever she was. If she is not, he admits the necessity of a Reformation, for surely there can be nothing more proper; nay, there can be nothing more imperative on a church, than to return to the purity from which she has departed. But waving this for the present, I return to my correspondent's assertion about the insufficiency of the Bible as a rule in matters of religion. He plainly asserts, that it is not "sufficiently plain on all points of Christian doctrine." That is, in plain English, the Bible is not sufficient for the purpose intended by it. It is the word of God indeed; for this is not controverted. It declares itself able to make us wise unto salvation, —and to make the man of God perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works; and yet, says Juvenis, it is not sufficiently plain on all points of Christian doctrine. It declares itself sufficient for the salvation of sinners and the perfecting of saints; and what more would my correspondent have? If he means that it is not sufficient to make men Papists, it is readily granted; and then I have no more controversy with him on this point. I leave him engaged in a controversy with the Word of God; and woe to the man that striveth with his Maker! I suspect Juvenis, from his handwriting, to be a man of the law. If he should find an Act of Parliament not "sufficiently plain" to guide the decision of the Court of Session in a matter in which his property, or the property of his client was interested, would he not complain bitterly of the stupidity of our legislators? and yet, in matters which affect the eternal salvation of millions of human beings, he coolly declares the word of God not to be "sufficiently plain." This is an impeachment of the wisdom and goodness of his Creator, such as he would scarcely venture to make against a fellow-creature a little above him in civil authority.

The apostle Peter tells us, that in the epistles of Paul there are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned wrest to their own destruction; but these very words of Peter have been wrested more than any other passage in the Bible to the destruction of those who so wrest them. In all their books of controversy,—in all their catechisms,—in almost all the letters which I have received from Papists, and in this one of Juvenis among the rest, these words of the apostle are wrested to support a doctrine which he never meant to inculcate; namely, that the Bible is not a sufficient rule of faith and manners; but that we must add to it, in one form or another, the doctrines and traditions of men. For a full discussion of this subject, I refer the reader to No. XXXVI, page 169, in which I showed that certain things are "hard to be understood," not because the things themselves are unintelligible, but because some men's minds are so occupied with opposite things that they cannot receive them.

I expect Juvenis will reply to what I have said about his blasphemous assertion, that the words of the Holy Ghost are not sufficiently plain, by explaining himself thus;—that he did not mean to say that the words of the Bible are not plain enough; but that the things spoken of are so mysterious, and "hard to be understood," that the words used cannot convey an adequate idea of them to our minds. This, in reference to some points, will be granted. The Bible tells us of things which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, and which have not entered into the mind of man. But surely, if the words of the apostles, dictated by the Holy Ghost, be not "sufficiently plain" upon these things, whose words can be so? Juvenis will tell me, that we may come to the understanding of these things by reading the works of certain fathers who lived in purer times, and who have borne witness to the faith of the churches in those times. But if the things themselves were incapable of being so expressed by words as to make men understand them, how came the fathers to express them intelligibly? Where did they find words which apostles under divine inspiration could not find, to make men understand the "things hard to be understood?"

The truth is, the Bible is unspeakably more plain than the plainest and wisest of the fathers. He that comes to it with simplicity and singleness of heart, really desiring to know how he may obtain the pardon of his sins, and the salvation of his soul, shall soon find what he is seeking. Nothing can be plainer than the divine declaration, "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—"The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost."—And "It is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." Any one of these three sentences comprises the sum and substance of the whole Bible; and the meaning is so plain that it is impossible for any man who understands the terms, to make the words speak opposite meanings, without an artful and wilful perversion of them. The man, woman, or child, who believes the truth expressed by the above words, shall undoubtedly be saved: and if they are not "sufficiently plain," let Juvenis point out a passage in any of the fathers that is more so. Let it be remembered the grand business of a divinely taught religion, is the salvation of the soul. The Bible, from first to last, points to Jesus Christ and to none else; and to say that it is not "sufficiently plain" on this subject, is as absurd, and more impious, than to assert that the sun is not sufficiently bright to give light to the world. The writings of the fathers are full of a vain philosophy derived from the school of Plato, and other heathen sources, by means of which they corrupted the gospel, and prepared the way for all the errors that have defiled the church of Rome for more than fifteen hundred years. Juvenis, and all others of his communion, profess to have recourse to these writers, that they may learn what Christianity is, which is as foolish as to seek for the pure water of a fountain in the muddy streams of a river that has imbibed the filth of all the common sewers of a great city. By filtration, such water may, indeed, be rendered subservient to the ordinary purposes of life; and by a similar process, the writings of the fathers may be made to yield a few drops which manifest their relation to the fountain; but what wise man would be at the pains to filtrate so much impurity, when he has access every day and every hour to the pure fountain itself?

Juvenis represents me as wishing to know what proof there is that the writings referred to are the genuine writings of the fathers? But this is not putting the question fairly. I do not deny that there is as much evidence of the genuineness of Origen's, or Cyprian's, or any other father's writings, as there is of those of Livy and Xenophon. But I asked Juvenis, or rather suggested for his consideration, a doubt, whether the editions of the works of the fathers from which he quoted were genuine? And here I must remind him of a little deficiency of that candour which I expected from him. I stated a fact, that his church had mutilated the works of the fathers, by her Index Expurgatorius. He knows the fact as well as I do, else he must be a mere tyro in ecclesiastical history; but he has not the candour to acknowledge it; neither has he the boldness to deny it; but he tries to evade the question, by asking whether the Greek church had none of the writings of the fathers? and whether they would not have been as careful in preserving them from mutilation, and in being a check upon the Church of Rome, as much in regard to them as with regard to the Bible? Now it is enough for me to reply, that I do not know that the writings of the fathers, at least the Latin ones, were very generally possessed by the Greek churches; but supposing they were so, I do not know, and I do not believe, that these churches considered them of equal value with the Holy Scriptures, or of any value at all, and therefore they might give themselves little concern whether the Church of Rome mutilated them or not. It is a fact that this holy church did mutilate them, and expunge from them those passages which she considered unfavourable to her errors and usurpations. If Juvenis shall venture to deny this, I can refer him to some public libraries, in which he may witness with his own eyes that I speak the truth. But he knows the fact too well to deny it. Then, I ask, why does he put a case with regard to the Greek churches, which is evidently intended to throw a doubt upon the subject, as if he meant to deny it? This is not like the candour which we should expect to find in the advocates of a good cause.

Who the eminent divines of the Established Church, to whom Juvenis refers, are, I do not know; and of the merits of the catechism which he quotes, I am equally ignorant. But if there be a respectable divine of the Church of Scotland, who can seriously adduce the opinions of the Christians of the first ages, to prove the obligation of observing the Lord's Supper till the end of the world, I would tell him, that he practises the folly of those who seek from the living to the dead. The living Saviour commands his disciples to show forth his death until he come; and what authority can the opinions of Christians who died seventeen hundred years ago add to this injunction?

Juvenis adheres to his opinion, that the Christians of the first ages living in purer times, must have had better opportunities than we have of knowing the true meaning of the apostolic writings on doubtful points; but he does not reply to the remarks which I made on that subject, which must, therefore, be considered as unrefuted. He shows no reason why we of the present day may not understand a Greek sentence, or any number of Greek sentences, written by apostles in the first century, as easily as any number of Latin sentences written by any of the fathers in the following centuries. We must depend upon writing in either case; and according to approved rules of evidence, the first or earliest writing is most to be depended upon.

Here again Juvenis's good sense leads him to admit that the first ages of his church were "purer times" than the present; but how can he admit this, and deny the necessity of reformation? Luther and other reformers avowed it to be their purpose to return to the purity of the first ages; and every man who admits that these were purer ages, ought to applaud the attempt; though the bold undertakers did not succeed in every point, perhaps because they did not go far enough back.

After all, according to Juvenis, it is only "doubtful points," which those who lived in purer times had better opportunites of understanding than we have. But those parts of the Bible which directly regard the salvation of a sinner, and how he shall live to the glory of God, are not doubtful points, but very plain. And those parts which are most difficult or doubtful, regard chiefly the fulfilment of prophecy, which we certainly ought to understand much better than the most enlightened uninspired men of the first ages. Nay, it may be questioned whether the apostles themselves had such an understanding of some of the prophecies which they uttered and wrote, as the weakest Christian has since they have been fulfilled in the rise, and reign, and begun downfal of the Man of Sin. The possession of the prophetic spirit did not necessarily imply a full understanding of what was prophesied; see 1 Pet. i. 10—12, particularly v. 12.

No. CXXXIII.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 27TH, 1821.

I HAVE paid my correspondent, Juvenis, the compliment of devoting two Numbers to an extract of a letter from him, and remarks upon it. I think I have replied to every thing in that extract which called for particular notice; but there is a principle avowed in it, which, I think, requires to be discussed by itself; that is, the insufficiency of the word of God, as a rule of faith, worship, and manners. Juvenis repeatedly declares that he does not consider the Bible sufficiently plain to instruct him; and he pleads for the admission of human authority, or human teaching, to make him certain of what he ought to believe, and what to practise in the way of religious worship. In other words, he will not receive the Bible, but in the sense in which certain men who lived hundreds of years ago received it.

This is in fact subjecting the word of God to the authority of man. Those who are thus regarded as judges in the matter, are called fathers, and some of them have the word saint prefixed to their names. It is not pretended that they were inspired men like apostles and evangelists; and yet the Church of Rome sets them as judges over inspired men, insomuch that apostles and evangelists shall be allowed to speak only through their medium; and the words of the divine record shall not be allowed to have any meaning but such as they please to impose upon them.

Juvenis is not one of those who deny that the Bible is the word of God. In arguing with him, I have hitherto proceeded upon the assumption that this was admitted by him; but it is admitted in such a way as to show that it has little authority in his esteem. Every work of God is perfect in its kind, and fit for every purpose intended by it. I take this to be an axiom that does not require to be proved; and no man can deny it without landing himself in atheism. Now, God is said to have magnified his word above all his name, Psal. cxxxviii. 2. He has set his seal upon it, and given such displays of himself in it, as he has not done by any other medium, not even by the sun and the moon, which he hath ordained. These perfectly serve the purpose which he ordained them to serve, which is merely of a temporal nature; and shall it be seriously maintained, that his word is not sufficient to serve the infinitely more important purpose intended by it? Yes; Juvenis maintains this, and so far as I know, all Papists maintain it. In their esteem the word of God is not "sufficiently plain" to teach men the way of salvation. It is liable to misconstruction. It is made to speak different and even opposite meanings; and the inference is, that no dependence ought to be placed upon it, except so far as the fathers of the church have given it their sanction.

Now, let Papists cavil and shuffle as they may, this amounts to a virtual denial of the Bible as the word of God. To say that it is so, and in the same breath to say it is not "sufficiently plain," is such an impeachment of the divine wisdom and goodness, as we shall never hear but from the most hardened infidel, or from those who, like Juvenis, perhaps, have breathed the atmosphere of infidelity, and have become so familiar with its phraseology, as to make use of it without being aware of its import. Juvenis will spurn the idea of being classed with infidels; and nothing would have induced me to have associated him with them, but his attempt to disparage the word of God, which is most effectually to promote the cause of infidelity.

It does not properly belong to my plan to discuss the subject of the inspiration and divine authority of the holy Scriptures. This has been done of late years, to good purpose, by different authors; and none deserve more honourable mention than two divines of our own city. The names of Dick and Chalmers will instantly occur to every reader acquainted with the literature of the present age; and referring to the "Essay on the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures," by the former, and the "Evidence and Authority of the Christian Revelation," by the latter, I might confidently leave that question to the decision of every intelligent and candid reader. I have indeed, in general, proceeded upon the assumption that Papists admit the divine authority of the Bible; but the more intimately I have become acquainted with them, and the more closely I have come to grapple with their secret and avowed principles, I have been the more convinced that I have assumed what is not heartily conceded by them. The complaint of Juvenis, that the Bible is not sufficiently plain, has confirmed what I inferred from the writings of Mr Andrews and his correspondents, (who bewail the dreadful mischiefs which arise from Bible reading) namely, that the Bible itself is regarded by Papists, not with reverence as the word of God, but held in abhorrence as the most pernicious book in the world.

The last named author has repeatedly challenged me, in his "Catholic Vindicator" to tell him how I come to know the Bible to be the word of God; and the train of his reasoning, if such it can be called, is, to show that no man can know this but upon the authority of the Church of Rome. This holy church, it seems, claims the power of deciding infallibly what is the word of God, and what is not; or, which comes nearly to the same thing, she alone has power and authority to declare the true meaning of the Scriptures. In her infallible wisdom, she pretends to prove from the Bible that she possesses this authority, and yet the Bible itself has no authority or meaning but what she is pleased to allow it; which exemplifies the absurdity of proving a thing by itself, or two things mutually by one another. Juvenis is entitled to an apology for classing him with such a writer as Mr Andrews, whose name as an author is not worthy to appear on the same page; but as they are agreed in maintaining the insufficiency of the Bible, which I hold to be virtually the same thing as rejecting its inspiration, I shall, before entering upon another general topic of discussion, devote a Number or two to the answering of the question, how I know the Bible to be the word of God? I shall first, however, give the challenge itself, in the words of the Vindicator, from different parts of his work.

"As the accuser," says he, meaning the Protestant, "speaks positively to the Scriptures containing the word of God, will he permit me to inquire of him how he came by the information, and upon what authority he grounds his assertion? Has he been taken into the council of the Almighty, that he should know more of his will than other men?" (so it seems other men do not know that the Bible contains the word of God!) "Has he been favoured with a revelation from heaven in his private ear? Or has a heavenly messenger been sent to him, to inform him that the Bible is actually the word of God?" Cath. Vind. col. 233. Some of these expressions had been used by me, when inquiring how the Popish priests came to know the mind of God better than other men, independently of the Bible; and here the Vindicator makes use of my words to inquire how I came to know the truth of the Bible itself; from which it is evident that, in his opinion, there is no way of knowing it, but by the authority of his church, or by means of a private communication by an angelic messenger sent from heaven.

The author introduces a long extract from his infallible oracle Dr Milner, intended to show that Protestants cannot be certain with regard to any book in the Bible that it is genuine. The extract concludes thus:—"Granting, for example, that St Paul wrote an inspired epistle to the Romans, and another to the Ephesians, yet, as the former was intrusted to an individual, the Deaconess Phebe, to be conveyed by her to its destination, (Rom. xvi. see Calmet, &c.) and the latter to his disciple, Tychicus (Eph. vi. 21.) for the same purpose, it is impossible for you to entertain a rational conviction that these epistles, as they stand in your Testament, are exactly in the state in which they issued from the apostle's pen, or that they are his genuine epistles at all, without recurring to the tradition and authority of the Catholic Church concerning them," Ibid. col. 237. This is an argument truly worthy of a Popish vicar apostolic and bishop of the 19th century. Supposing Phebe to have been the bearer of the epistle to the Romans, and supposing her to have been sufficiently well acquainted with Greek learning, and such an expert penwoman as to imitate the hand-writing of Tertius in the body of the epistle, and of Paul in the salutation, so as to deceive the Christians in Rome, it may be asked, what motive she could have to make her practise such imposition? The venerable vicar apostolic means to insinuate, that for any thing we Protestants know, this said Phebe destroyed Paul's epistle, or having by accident lost it on the way, wrote one out of her own head, and palmed it upon the Christians in Rome as the genuine writing of the apostle, and that this is what we have in our New Testaments at this day! And truly if it were so, I would say that Phebe was a greater woman than the Virgin Mary, or any other woman that ever appeared in the world. But this is an argument, which, from its extreme absurdity, it is difficult to answer. If we were to allow the bishop's doubts in such a case as this to have any weight, we could not be sure of the genuineness of any writing,—we could not put faith in written documents of any kind. But to proceed with the Catholic Vindicator:—

"By what private stamp," says he, "or mark, does THE PROTESTANT learn that the Bible is the word of God? By what influence, and by what means, can he ascertain the accuracy of the Scriptures, but on the testimony of others, on the traditions of men, as he himself admits in the passage I have before quoted; unless, indeed, as I observed in a former Vindicator, he can show that he has been favoured with a copy from some heavenly messenger, in which case he would do well to present it to the Bible Society, for general distribution, with his own authenticated signature." Cath. Vind. col. 261. Here the Vindicator introduces me as admitting that I could not ascertain the accuracy of the Scriptures, but on the testimony of others,—on the traditions of men; and he professes to refer to my own words, which he had before quoted, as containing such admission; but he takes care not to refer to any page of his own work or mine in which such words are to be found; and the fact is, I never admitted any such thing. I do not reject human testimony in weighing what are called the external evidences of the authenticity of the Scriptures; but no words of mine express, or even imply such an admission as that which the Vindicator asserts; and this is one of the numberless impositions which he was pleased to practise upon his readers, in order to defend a cause which cannot be defended without having recourse to falsehood and imposition.

The hostility of Papists against the Bible will appear more evidently from the following extract. I had asserted that the Bible contains a complete revelation of the will of God for the salvation of our fallen race;—that it contains a proclamation of grace and pardon to the very chief of sinners; and that it ought to be accessible to all men. To this the Vindicator, after quoting our Lord's words (Go teach all nations, &c. Mat. xxviii. 20, 21) replies:—"Now here is no intimation of reading in these words of our Saviour, nor can THE PROTESTANT discover that the Son of God ever wrote his divine precepts previous to sending the apostles on their commission. Upon what grounds then can he fairly establish his position, that the Bible was intended to be accessible to all men? It was not accessible to all the Israelites; it was not accessible to all the Gentiles; it was not accessible to all the primitive Christians; it is not accessible to all men at the present day; nor will it be accessible to all men in future ages, notwithstanding the active but ill-judged labours of the Bible Societies to disseminate it. 'For,' says an article in The Times London Newspaper, of the 9th of April last, 'it is a curious fact, that supposing the British and Foreign Bible Society were to distribute as many copies of the Scriptures each year, as they have done during the last twelve years, wherein 1,675,994 copies have been circulated, it would still take four centuries to supply each individual in the world with a copy; and this is taking it for granted that the inhabitants of the countries called Christian are already supplied.' By this, (says the Vindicator,) the reader will see the groundlessness of the charge of withholding the Bible from the people, brought by

THE PROTESTANT against the Church of Rome, seeing that it is an act of impossibility to supply all men with copies of it, were she so inclined. Consequently, if restricting those from reading the Bible, who are likely to pervert the sense of it to their own destruction, which is all the fathers of the Council of Trent meditated, in the before-mentioned decree, be 'the same thing as granting permission to creatures to hear what the Almighty speaks to them;' if the Bible contains 'a complete revelation of his will for the salvation of our fallen race;' if 'it is a proclamation of grace and pardon to the very chief of sinners;' (what nonsense?) God himself must stand accused by THE PROTESTANT of denying the use of the Bible to the common people, and preventing 'fallen and miserable creatures from hearing what he says to them,' which I apprehend comes nearer to blasphemy than the words of my correspondent before alluded to, seeing he has ordained that the greater portion of mankind, from the creation to the present day, have been, are now, and will be deprived of the supposed blessing of reading this wonderful Protestant panacea, not only from their inability to procure a copy, but also from the want of a knowledge of letters." Cath. Vind. col. 240.

The above are the sentiments of the champion whom our Glasgow Papists engaged to defend them against the exposure which THE PROTESTANT was making of their Antichristian principles. They must of course be held as the sentiments of our Papists themselves until they disavow them. This is a fair specimen of Mr Andrews' mode of reasoning. He has scarcely a paragraph that contains better logic. I shall not analyze the passage at present; but I request such of my readers as have leisure, to try what they can make out of it. One thing appears certain upon the very face of it, that the circulation and general reading of the Bible is regarded with dread and abhorrence by our modern Papists, whatever some credulous Glasgow Protestants may say to the contrary.

I shall give an extract or two more from the Vindicator before I proceed to a particular reply; but I am afraid some of my readers will regard these quotations, which speak in such terms of the holy Scriptures, as no better than the filth of the Inquisition, with which I have lately treated them ad nauseam. I had said that the apostles committed to writing what was dictated by the Holy Ghost; and that the word of God thus written, they threw upon the world, and the providence of him who gave it, to supply the place of their voice, after they should be dead. To this the Vindicator replies:—"Now the transactions here related must have occurred near 1800 years ago; but what other evidence of his senses can THE PROTESTANT produce, as a voucher for this statement, than the Papist for his belief in transubstantiation?" THE PROTESTANT never spoke of the evidence of his senses in this matter; but the Vindicator assumes that he did, and proceeds upon the false assumption. "Did he see the Holy Spirit guide the pens of the writers? What evidence of his senses has he to produce, that the apostles wrote the books of the New Testament, or that they were written under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit? A Bible is placed before him, which in itself is a mere book; how then does he know that it is a divine book? I have shown that this book is liable to be corrupted—that it has been corrupted—that the unfaithfulness of the Protestant translations is notorious, not only for the multitude, but the grossness of their infidelities: how then can he assert upon the evidence of his senses," (which he never did) "that the Bible IS the word of God, which is immutable, and not subject to variation? 'Heaven and earth shall pass away,' says our Saviour, 'but my words shall not pass away.' We have the evidence of our senses that the translations of the Bible by Protestants vary with each other, and in many places even to the perverting of the meaning: by what means then, I call upon my adversary to state, is he enabled to prove that the Bible is the word of God, according to the evidence of his senses? How can he verify the genuine from the adulterated version?" (This is another question, artfully thrown in to lead away the reader's mind from the main point, about how we come to know the Bible to be the word of God.) "He says, the apostles committed the word of God to writing, because their living voice could not reach the millions of men scattered over the face of the earth, and therefore they were inspired to write the whole truth of God for the salvation of sinners and the edification of those who, by means of it, should be saved from their sins. This word, thus written, they threw upon the world. Now the concurring testimony of all ages contradicts this assertion of THE PROTESTANT, as I have shown in my 17th Vindicator, col. 263, by proving that the millions of men scattered over the face of the earth, were favoured with the truths of the gospel by the preaching of men, who succeeded the apostles in their ministry, and not by the written epistles which some of the latter left behind them. But if it was the intention of our divine Saviour, that his words should be thrown promiscuously upon the world, after the death of the apostles, how did it happen that only five of them, who were personally chosen by himself, left written documents behind them? Two of the Gospels, and the Acts of the Apostles, were written by men who were not members of the sacred college; and one of them, St Luke, acknowledges that he wrote from hearsay. What evidence then has THE PROTESTANT to show other than his bare assertion, for the accuracy of his statement? Again, he says, they committed the word to writing, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, who guided their pens as he did their tongues, to declare the WHOLE TRUTH of God; and yet one of the apostles, St John, concludes his gospel with this truly important declaration, well worthy the consideration of those who contend that the Bible, and the Bible only, is their rule of faith, namely, 'there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books which should be written.'" —Cath. Vind. col. 326—328.

I suppose ordinary readers will not be able to perceive what relation these words of the apostle John have to the subject; or why the words which Jesus spoke, and which his apostles wrote, should not be the only rule of faith, in connection with those of Moses and the prophets, because all the things which Jesus did were not written down.

As I cannot conveniently enter upon an answer to the challenge of the Vindicator at the conclusion of a Number, I must reserve it for my next: and I shall conclude the present one with a specimen of the manner in which the translators of the Bible into English are said, according to Mr Andrews, to have corrupted the word of God; and by means of which, to use his own language, they have made it "the word of the devil," see Cath. Vind. col. 282. His remarks refer chiefly to the translations made in the reign of Elizabeth; and his first complaint is that the word "Catholic," which is a Greek word, signifying universal, or general, has not been retained in the title of certain epistles, but has been translated into English, as the general epistle of James, &c. This, it seems, is a grievous corruption of the New Testament. The Vindicator finds that it would not have served the purpose of the Reformers to expel the word "Catholic" from the New Testament, if they allowed the word "Church" to remain; therefore, he finds that in the edition of 1560, the word church never appeared, but congregation was uniformly used. He does not know, I suppose, that the Greek word εκκλησια literally signifies congregation as well as church; and that the words are synonymous. Be this as it may, the latter word "church" was restored to its place by the translators of our present authorized version; and therefore our English Bible is not corrupt in this respect. The following are the very words of the Vindicator, in reference to other corruptions:—"As they obliterated the Catholic Church, so did they also the name of priest, turning it into elder, and the priesthood into eldership. As in St James v. 14, 'If any be diseased among you, let him call for the elders of the congregation.' (Bible 1560.) Acts xiv. 23. 'When they had ordained them elders by election in every congregation.' (Bible, 1560.) These words, by election, were thrust into the text by Tindal, in King Henry VIII.th's time, and retained in it by Cranmer, and all the pretended reformers of King Edward VI.th's reign: so here in Queen Elizabeth's Bibles, as may be seen in these editions of 1560, 1577, 1579, 1598, 1599. Nor were they obliterated till King James I. made a new translation."—Cath. Vind. col. 286. Let it be admitted that the words "by election" were an unnecessary supplement, the thing was corrected by the translators of the present version, and ought not now to be laid to the charge of English Protestants: but when did the Church of Rome ever correct a mistake into which she had fallen? Other great corruptions alleged against our translators are, that they have used the word gift instead of grace in several places; that in reference to Christ's "benediction or consecration of the holy sacrament," instead of blessed or blessing, the words "gave thanks" are used. Instead of "confess your sins," our translators have said "acknowledge your faults," which is another great corruption, and tends to set aside the sacrament of confession. Repentance has been put in the place of penance. "To dishonour and disgrace our blessed Lady the mother of God," says Mr Andrews, "they turn the angel's salutation, St Luke, i. 28, which was, Hail, full of grace, into Hail, thou art freely beloved." Instead of idols, our translators have inserted images, in a number of passages, which is another horrible corruption. Other corruptions are the use of the word grave instead of hell in some passages; ordinances and instructions instead of traditions; love instead of charity. For sacrament, they have substituted mystery; for baptism, washing; for angel, messenger; for apostle, ambassador; for Christ, anointed; for Holy Ghost, holy wind.

The above is a complete catalogue of the corruptions which our modern champion of Popery has been able to muster, in his 18th Number, to discredit our English translation of the Bible, and prove it to be not the word of God, but "the word of the devil." In some subsequent Numbers he gives a few more cases of equal but not greater importance. I cannot imagine a greater compliment to our translation than this. In most of the cases, what he calls corruptions and mistranslations, are really true renderings of the original Greek; but though it were otherwise, the things are so unimportant, that the mistranslations, had they been such, could have led no man into error, either in doctrine or practice. And we may be sure that had the Vindicator, or his oracle and patron, Bishop Milner, been able to point out any really mischievous errors in our translation, it would have been done. Any biblical scholar may be able to point out more important mistakes than any of the above, in the best translation of the Bible that was ever made, not excepting the infallible Vulgate; and yet no one of these mistakes,—not even the whole taken together, will be found to affect any Christian doctrine or ordinance of Christian worship.

No. CXXXIV.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3D, 1821.

PAPISTS maintain that we do not know the Bible to be the word of God, but upon the testimony of the Church of Rome: but this church is so much given to lying, that I would question the truth of any thing that was made to rest upon her sole authority. Liars are suspected even when they speak the truth; and if the authenticity of the sacred writings depended upon the assertion of the Church of Rome, I suspect there are many who would reject them on that account alone, without inquiring into the merits, or considering the excellence of the writings themselves. This, however, would not be fair. The writings of the apostles were possessed by the churches in general at a very early period. The Church of Rome, like other churches, came into the possession of them; and it is granted that she preserved them in a Latin version, locked up from the view of the profane vulgar, for several hundred years. Some of her refractory children, such as Wickliffe and Luther, compelled her at last to acknowledge that she had such writings in her possession. They had seen them; they began to give versions of them in the language of the common people; and the church at last was obliged to bring them out to public view, but, at first, in a Latin version only, with an authoritative canon, declaring this to be equal to the Greek original. And, from the circumstance of having been so long in the undisturbed possession of the book, she began to claim it as her own, and so gave it out as her own; and hence it is that she now pretends to dictate with supreme authority with regard to its meaning, and even whether it be the word of God or not.

This reminds me of what was remarked of Phebe in my last Number. She is said to have been the bearer of the epistle which Paul wrote to the Christians in Rome. Now, supposing she had kept the epistle in her own possession for a great number of years, and had at last, in her old age, after Paul was dead, brought it forth to public view; and supposing she had insisted upon the believers in Rome receiving it upon her bare word, what does the reader suppose would have been the consequence? The Christians would probably have felt very indignant; they would have expressed great displeasure against the said Phebe, for having kept them so long in the dark with regard to such a valuable document; and they would, perhaps, have told her that she had done so ill, by keeping back the letter, that they would not take her bare word for any thing. They take the letter however; they examine the seal, and the hand-writing of Tertius, with whom some of them had been acquainted, and the hand-writing of Paul himself in the salutation, which was his token in every epistle; and, above all, they examine the contents, and compare them with other writings of the same apostle, and with what they had heard from his own mouth; they unanimously conclude that the epistle is the genuine production of him whose name it bears, and they receive it as such. Phebe might boast that it had been received on her sole authority; but this would have exposed her to the derision of every Christian in Rome, and would have rendered her own Christianity somewhat doubtful. Now, admitting the highest that the Church of Rome can justly claim on this subject, she was merely for a time one of the depositaries of the scriptures; and when she was pleased, or rather compelled, to bring them forth to public view, she could add nothing to their authority, any more than the bearer of a letter can add to the authority of its contents, of the authenticity of which the person addressed is, on other grounds, perfectly satisfied.

These remarks, I hope, will be considered a sufficient reply to what Papists advance with regard to their church being invested with the power of deciding infallibly what is, and what is not, the word of God. If they could show that the Church of Rome had received some special grant of authority on this subject, from the Head of the church, it would become every Christian to submit to it: but as nothing of the kind has been shown, I shall continue to consider the decision of the Church of Rome of no more weight than the opinion of Jack or Tom, or any self-sufficient pedant who may pretend to understand all mysteries, and to possess all knowledge.

The works to which I referred in my last Number prove, in the most convincing manner, according to the laws of moral and literary evidence, that the Holy Scriptures are what they profess to be; namely, the testimony of God, conveyed to men by the ministry of his accredited ambassadors. The arguments of such authors are sufficient to silence every objector; to prevail upon every candid mind to give the Bible a fair hearing, by perusing it with serious attention; and if this does not lead to an acknowledgement that it is the word of God, the failure will be found to arise, not from the want of evidence, but from a certain indisposition of the mind and heart, by which many disqualify themselves from attending to the evidence which is presented. And it is possible for a man to be overcome by such evidence, so far as to acknowledge the Bible to be the word of God,—to have a rational conviction that it is what it professes to be,—and yet, in an evangelical sense, not to "know the truth;" or be able to satisfy others, or even himself, when he is required to say upon what grounds he knows the Bible to be the word of God. The Catholic Vindicator seems to believe that no man can know this, unless he were to receive a Bible directly from the hand of his Maker, or see the Holy Spirit guide the pens of the men that wrote it; for which, see my last Number. It is not probable that any thing that I can write will have much weight with such men as he; but for the information of others, I shall proceed to show how any man may, and how every Christian does, know the Bible to be the word of God, independently of the authority of any man, or of any church, in the world.

Men are the offspring of God, and his workmanship; and he has endowed them with certain faculties, by which they are enabled to perceive his work where it appears before their eyes, or is presented to their minds. I grant that by sin these faculties have become extremely depraved; insomuch, that it is doubtful whether they would be able, without revelation, to discover, from the works of creation, that there is a God. It is true, indeed, that most, if not all the savage tribes that have yet been discovered, have some rude notions of a Supreme Being who made all things; but no man can say how much this is the effect of traditionary communication, handed down from age to age. This tradition may have sprung originally from a divine revelation, the light of which was not suffered to be entirely extinguished among the heathen: and where it existed in the faintest degree, men would acknowledge the existence of a Supreme Being, and regard the works of creation as a proof of it, though they should not have been able by means of them to make the original discovery.

Be this as it may, I consider myself entitled to take advantage of the enlightened state of society with which it is my happiness to be connected, and within the sphere of which this controversy is carried on. No man can apply his mind to the study of astronomy, or any branch of natural science taught in our schools, without perceiving abundant demonstration of the existence of a Supreme Intelligence—a Being of infinite wisdom, goodness, and power; insomuch, that it is reasonably doubted whether there be such a creature as a speculative atheist in the kingdom. Now, I do not hesitate to affirm, that if any man will apply himself as honestly and sincerely to the study of the Scriptures, as scientific men apply themselves to the study of science, he will find the Bible demonstrate itself to be the word of God, as clearly as the solar system demonstrates itself to be the work of God. By honesty and sincerity in this connection, I mean, that persons applying themselves to the study of the Bible be no more indisposed to the knowledge which the Bible teaches, than they are to that which astronomy teaches:—in other words, that they be ready to give as cordial a reception to the truth in the one case as in the other.

I am aware that such an honest, sincere, favourable disposition of mind towards what the Bible teaches, does not universally, or even generally, exist with men who are favourably enough disposed towards what natural science teaches. Creation presents the Divine Being in certain characters or attributes; the Bible presents him under the very same characters, with the addition of certain others, which do not appear from the works of creation. Now, when the human mind comes into contact with those attributes which are exhibited in the Bible only, it feels such an opposition to its own state and character as to be hurt and offended; and, in thousands of instances, repelled from the study of a subject so disagreeable. It will be understood that I am speaking of the human mind as a carnal mind. How it became such is not the present question. I stop not here to show that it is so naturally. I claim only to have it admitted, which I think none will deny, that men in general are practically carnal; that is, they are sinners: and having this conceded, I plead the fact of a certain innate revolting of the human mind against those traits of the divine character which are discovered only in the Bible, as a proof that the Bible has proceeded from a pure and holy Being; from a Being whose character is the reverse of what we see to be the character of carnal men; that is, from God himself: and thus we come to know that the Bible is the word of God, from the circumstance of its being the very thing which, above all others, provokes the enmity of the carnal mind.

I grant that this is not an argument calculated to impress the mind of an untutored savage; and perhaps it may have little weight with our almost equally untutored Papists. But I consider myself as addressing wise men, who are able to judge of what I say. Suppose, then, I am in possession of a cabinet of the most curious workmanship; that I alone, as I suppose, am in possession of the key; that the wards of the lock are so complicated, that I can defy the world to open it; and that, in fact, it is found impossible to gain access to it without the real key:—I have not said or supposed from whom I received this cabinet, but merely supposed it in my possession. Suppose then, farther, that a stranger comes to me, with a key in his hand that opens it at once; and that he tells me that he received the key from the very person who made the cabinet and constructed the lock, I feel myself constrained to believe the testimony of this stranger; his report brings with it such evidence that no reasonable man can refuse to yield to it.

Now, without pursuing the figure farther, I affirm that this cabinet is my own heart. I defy the whole world to have access to it, or to know what is in it; but when I read the Bible, I find it tells me what is in my heart. I know then, that He who made the cabinet made also the key: in other words, that the author of my being is the author of the Bible. The woman whom Christ met at the well in Samaria, argued upon the most philosophical and rational principles, when she said, "Come, see a man who told me all things that ever I did; is not this the Christ?" She had been reminded of certain events in her own history, which she believed no living creature knew; hence, she was constrained to acknowledge the divine inspiration of the person who had honoured her with an interview. Upon the same principle, any man who will carefully apply his mind to the reading of the Scriptures, will find them a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. They will tell him what is in his heart, and thus prove themselves to be the word of God. If Mr Andrews shall say, that this is nothing to him; that it does not convince him that the Bible is the word of God; I have only to reply, that his conviction is not the work which I undertook. The question was not how he might know, but how I know, the Bible to be the word of God. I have here told him a part, and I shall tell him more before I have done: and if he does not shut his eyes against the truth, he may know it as well as I.

Independently of the saving knowledge of the truth of divine revelation, which is the effect of a divine influence on the heart, and which can be produced by nothing short of this influence,—there are certain rational considerations which may, and ought to produce a rational conviction of the truth. On this subject, I gladly avail myself of a passage in the introduction to a pamphlet just published, by Thomas Erskine, Esq. Advocate, entitled, "Remarks on the Internal Evidence of the Truth of Revealed Religion." I have never met with any work that comprises, in so small a compass, so complete an answer to the question which I am attempting to answer; namely, How we know the Bible to be the word of God. If any of my readers shall be induced, from this short recommendation, to procure and read the work, I am persuaded they will thank me for it. * As a specimen of his mode of illustration, and as bearing directly upon the point in hand, I quote the following:

"When we are once convinced of the existence of a cause, and are acquainted with its ordinary mode of operation, we are prepared to give a certain degree of credit to a history of other effects attributed to it, provided we can trace the connection between them. As an illustration of this, I shall suppose, that the steam-engine, and the application of it to the movement of vessels, was known in China in the days of Archimedes; and that a foolish lying traveller had found his way from Sicily to China, and had there seen an exhibition of a steam-boat, and had been admitted to examine the mechanical apparatus of it,—and, upon his return home, had, among many palpable fables, related the true particulars of this exhibition; what feeling would this relation have probably excited in his audience? The fact itself was a strange one, and different in appearance from any thing with which they were acquainted. It was also associated with other stories that seemed to have falsehood stamped on the very face of them. What means, then, had the hearers of distinguishing the true from the false? Some of the rabble might probably give a stupid and wondering kind of credit to the whole; whilst the judicious but unscientific hearers would reject the whole. Now, supposing the relation had come to the ears of Archimedes, and that he had sent for the man, and interrogated him; and, from his unorderly and unscientific, but accurate specification of boilers, and cylinders, and pipes, and furnaces, and wheels, had drawn out the mechanical theory of the steam-boat, —he might have told his friends, 'The traveller may be a liar, but this is a truth. I have a stronger evidence for it than his testimony, or the testimony of any man. It is a truth in the nature of things. The effect which the man has described is the legitimate and certain result of the apparatus which he has described. If he has fabricated this account he must be a great philosopher. At all events, his narrative is founded on an unquestionable general truth.'" Pages 2, 3.

The application of this to the point in hand is extremely easy. Archimedes was a mathematician. He was acquainted with the operation, and could comprehend the result of certain mechanical powers. There were many things connected with mechanics which he did not know, for they were not discovered for ages after his time: but supposing them to have been discovered, and reported to him, he was in the knowledge of certain fundamental truths, which enabled him to decide, with infallible certainty, that certain causes put into operation, would produce certain effects; and supposing him to have received information of certain results which he had not thought of before, but demonstrably proceeding from established principles, he would believe the report, independently of the character of the medium through which it was conveyed to him. If the reporter were an honest man, he might, if he pleased, throw the weight of this into the scale of evidence; but it would add nothing to the fulness of his conviction.

* There is an excellent work by Dr Owen on the same subject, entitled, "The Reason of Faith in the Holy Scriptures;" of which an edition was published in Glasgow, in 1800. Like the other writings of that eminent divine—indeed, like most writings of his age—this work wants compression; but it will richly repay the labour of a patient reading.

Now, there are fundamental principles in morals and religion, believed by those who understand them, as firmly as any mathematical truth whatever. They are not demonstrated to the eye by visible representations, but the impression of their truth upon the mind is as distinct as if they were. One of these principles is, that a pure and perfect system of legislation cannot proceed from an impure source. Suppose, then, a man as well acquainted with the law laid down in the Bible, and the whole procedure of the lawgiver therein related, as Archimedes was with the mechanical powers (and surely there are many men in the world of whom this may be predicated), such a man would most undoubtedly conclude and declare, that this is a system that could not emanate from the father of lies: that being a system of perfect purity and equity, it must have proceeded from the Father of Lights, whose word it professes to be. Suppose he is told that this book was concealed for many ages by the Church of Rome; that now she has allowed it to see the light, because she has been compelled to do so; that she says we must believe its authenticity upon her bare word, for we can have no higher authority for it; and that she has practised so many impositions upon the world, and told so many lies, that we ought to be cautious with regard to what she tells us, and look upon this book with some degree of jealousy;—suppose all these things to be objected against the Bible, the intelligent student of its contents would reply, I do not care a straw for what the Church of Rome may say either for or against this book; it proves itself to be of divine origin by its incomparable purity, sublimity, and harmony. It is, in short, the very thing that such a corrupt and impure body as the Church of Rome would wish to keep out of view, because it testified against her impurities: and the fact of her having concealed it until its publication was extorted from her, is an evidence that there is a divinity in it with which her carnality did not choose to come into visible contact.

After all, the knowledge of which I am speaking must be matter of individual consciousness. Every Christian must know experimentally that the Bible is the word of God, else he cannot enjoy the peace and comfort which it imparts to all who really know the truth. The sun in the heavens is known only by his own light; and He who made the sun is known only by his. The Holy Scriptures are that light by which alone God makes himself known as the Saviour of sinners; and by the illumination of his Spirit, he makes the light of his word as evident to the heart and conscience of them that believe, as the light of the sun is to them that see.

When a sinner becomes seriously concerned about his character, state, and prospects; and when, in such a state of mind, he reads the Bible he finds, at first, that it is all against him: by the holy law of God he is convicted and condemned; and he is conscious of a power and divinity in the word of condemnation, that makes him feel that it is the word of God. But the Holy Ghost, who has thus convinced him of sin, may be graciously pleased to convince him also of righteousness; that is, by the gospel show him the way of salvation, which is fully made known in the Scriptures. The sinner so convinced will recognize this to be the word of God, for he perceives in it that which answers the demands of the law, which condemned him. There is a power also in this word that proves itself to be divine. It removes the sentence of condemnation: and he who was before under a fearful apprehension of suffering the punishment of his sins, sees now all his sins taken away by the sufferings of the divine Saviour, as related in the Holy Scriptures.

From this there arises a peace and joy in believing, of which no unbeliever can have any conception. It is a matter of individual consciousness. A Christian, under the broadest possible view of his own guilt, and with the fullest conviction that God hates sin with a perfect hatred, is yet enabled, under the influence of the gospel, to enjoy perfect peace even in the prospect of death, judgment, and eternity, because he knows that Christ hath made peace by the blood of his cross. This he enjoys as his own peace; he has a personal individual interest in it. This is conveyed to his mind by the word of the gospel; and this he knows to be the word of God, from the effect which it produces in him, and has upon him in the whole tenor of his life and conversation.

That must be of God which is the instrument of making men like God; that is, which turns them from sin to holiness. Every sinner who has been so turned from his sins unto God, possesses a consciousness of the power of the word, which weighs more in his mind than a thousand arguments drawn from the external evidence of the truth of the Bible. His consciousness will not be held as sufficient evidence to others that the Bible is the word of God; but if he was formerly a notoriously wicked person, and if he is now a sober and holy man, devoting his time and talents to the good of his fellow-creatures and the glory of God; and if it is manifest that the change was produced by the Bible, every candid person who shall know the fact will be constrained to acknowledge, that truly the Bible is the word of God. I have put this case hypothetically, but there are many Christians alive whose history would demonstrate the fact that I mean to establish; namely, that the Bible proves itself to be the word of God, by affording peace to the troubled conscience; by teaching and enabling men to forsake a life of sin, and to live a holy life, and to rest in the full assurance of a blessed immortality.

No. CXXXV.

SATURDAY, February 10th, 1821.

In my last Number but one, I gave a catalogue of what the "Catholic Vindicator" calls corruptions of the Bible by Protestant translators; which corruptions, however, do not appear to have been discovered by himself, as he gives them on the authority of Ward, who was just such a Catholic vindicator in the 17th century, as Andrews is in the 19th; with this difference, that the former seems to have had more learning than the latter. As a companion to this catalogue of Protestant corruptions, or mistranslations, I shall insert here some curious information relative to the Popish mode of ascertaining the true meaning of passages of Scripture which have been differently translated. For this, I am indebted to a reverend gentleman of the established church in the sister island, who refers to a book which I have not seen.

"I spoke," says he, "of the Bellum Papale, by Dr James, Bodleian librarian, a century back. If you can get the book, and his defence afterwards, they will give you much information on the state of the Scriptures after the Council of Trent. After the decree of that council, that the Vulgate edition was the only true, genuine, and canonical copy of the Scriptures, and that none other should be read or acknowledged by the faithful, Sixtus V. wished to publish an edition; but he found all the copies in such a state of corruption, that he declared them to be any thing but the Scriptures. He set at work with his learned men, cardinals, doctors, &c. &c.; revised and corrected every page, which was collated again and again, with all the most approved copies. He himself carefully examined every page before it was printed; and afterwards, when the book was printed, he went over it, and, where there was an error, amended it by pasting words over words, and sentences over sentences. He then published it with a bull, declaring it, after a long preamble of all the pains and labours of doctors, &c., the only true and genuine Scriptures; and denouncing with the greater excommunication, any person who should dare to change the smallest particle, in minima particula, not even to be absolved by the Pope. There was infallibility enough here to make light darkness, and darkness light; and this infallibility remained during Gregory's, Urban's, and Innocent's reigns, for near three years, (short reigns they were,) until Clement VIII. was raised to the chair: but he being a Pope himself, was not afraid to take the bull by the horns, and turn it over to the Index Expurgatorius, where it was quite harmless; for he boldly declared, in the face of the greater excommunication, that it was not in minima particula (i. e. small matters) in which Sixtus' Bible was erroneous, but in 2000 principal errors, and innumerable smaller ones, which he would not mention, lest it should produce too much scandal; he condemned it, and published the present Clementine edition. So much for the infallibility of the Popes; for the preservative care of the Scriptures by the church that is the pillar and ground of truth; and the purity of the only genuine copy of the word of God."

I shall finish my miscellaneous matter for the present, with the following letter from a correspondent in Ireland:—

TO THE PROTESTANT.

Sir,—Having lately read in your Paper, your just conclusions as to the effects which must follow the granting of promises of pardon and indulgences, by Popes and priests, to men, on the mere private acknowledgement of past crime, and a promise of future amendment, without any idea of that inward change of heart, producing heartfelt grief for, and real detestation of sin,—and those purifying influences of the Holy Spirit, inseparably connected with the Scripture promises of pardon, upon the footing of what Christ has done and suffered;—and, as facts are the best proofs of positions, I shall state, from my own knowledge, some of those effects which are the result of such pretended remittance of sins. Living some years ago in a small town in the south of Ireland, and being intimately acquainted with the parish priest, and with others, both priests and laity, of the Roman Catholic communion, I could not be unacquainted with many of their practices, and their system of worship. As some of your English readers are not acquainted with many circumstances relative to the system of Popery in Ireland, it being more unfettered here than in England, I shall first give you some account of those things they call Stations for Confessing, and conclude with other miscellaneous matter.

It was formerly the custom, at whatever house these stations were held, to require that a dinner be provided for the priest: and as the host would not set the priest down by himself, it was always the practice to invite fifteen or twenty of the neighbouring farmers, and their wives, who were expected to attend at confession, and who would ask them in return. I have frequently seen purchased for these occasions, meat, several gallons of whisky, &c., and always a bottle of wine for the priest's own drinking. This, you will say, was paying pretty well for the honour of his company: but this was not all; there was a tax of five shillings on the landlord for saying the mass, who was made to believe that a temporal and spiritual blessing would follow. Besides this, it was expected that each confessed person would pay something for absolution.—For causes best known to themselves, these dinner parties were, of late years, changed for breakfasts; which were more convenient for the priest, as he had to return home, when these stations were held in the country, perhaps some miles, and he might not so clearly see his way. Some simple people have said, that they were changed to do away those drunken revels which always followed these dinners; but this was not the case, as the following facts will show. I lived opposite to an industrious couple of the Romish religion, the man a cooper by trade, and his was one of those houses set down in the priest's book for a station (for the priests like to follow industry, hoping to partake more largely of those temporal blessings which may rationally be expected from it): I had, therefore, frequent opportunities of observing the effects of station confessions at this man's house. I have seen some of the company invited come out quite intoxicated; and on asking how they could get so beastly drunk, they stammered out that they were only at a station.

As the priest is seldom ready before twelve o'clock, these breakfasts usually commence about that time. The bill of fare is as follows: tea, a hot griddle-cake, butter, eggs, &c. &c., with decanters of whisky, placed on the breakfast-table: and as the Irish have a great affection for the native, as they call whisky, these decanters are frequently replenished, and the feast prolonged for the remainder of the day. It may be said that this is an unfair construction put upon the society of fifteen or twenty persons, invited to meet the priest at a station breakfast; that although some may outstep the limits of sobriety, the rest should not be charged with it; that these poor souls, for ought I knew, were, after pardon received from the priest, making pious resolutions of future amendment—laying down plans for moralizing their relatives and acquaintances—or devising how they may promote the moral and religious education of the rising generation, by the introduction of the Bible into schools, as the great and only fountain of divine revelation to man; showing him his lost estate both by nature and practice, and the necessity of coming to God for real pardon, peace, and holiness;—and that, at all events, surely their drinking bouts could not be fairly charged upon the priest. Whoever argues thus, does not know what Popery is. How sure its doctrines lead to licentiousness; how cruel and intolerant are its principles; and how much opposed to every effort to promote the moral and religious education of the poor children in its communion, I shall hereafter show: indeed, with them the proverb, that "Ignorance is the mother of devotion," is held as true, and more current, than any of the Proverbs of Solomon.

But to return to the subject of the stations —The writer was present at the settlement of an account with the spirit-dealer, for the whisky drank at but one breakfast station for confession at his opposite neighbour's house, where the whole company, men, women, and children, could not have exceeded twenty-four persons; when the bill, admitted to be correct and paid for, was seven half gallons of whisky, at 16*s.* per gallon; a liquor considerably stronger than either brandy or rum. It may be objected, that this was too particular a case to be taken for a general rule; and that the master of the house might be a very dissipated character himself, and have been too pressing with his guests. With regard to this man's general character, he passed among his neighbours for an industrious, sober man, in general: and as to his character with the priest, I assure you that both he and his wife were in several holy orders, as they are called in Ireland. So that taking this man's character, I am convinced that I take a standard much too high as an example of the good effects following confession stations; for were I to select those stations which are held at publicans' houses, it would far exceed what I have detailed.

It is the practice for the priest to publish from the altar, at certain periods of the year —I believe before Christmas and before Lent —that he will hold stations for confession at certain houses, then and there named. These houses are selected without previous liberty obtained from the owners, perhaps lest they may make objections, which many of them would most certainly do, if not thus publicly given out from the altar. The individuals thus selected make the necessary preparations (a general bill of the fare I have already presented to your readers): and as it has been a prevailing opinion from the time of the Jews, that the publicans (formerly tax-gatherers) were the greatest sinners, and consequently required most mending, I have observed that they are more frequently selected: nay, I have observed that those who have most business are particularly selected by the priest; it being reasonable to suppose, that the chief amongst the publicans must be chief amongst the sinners. As the liquor on these occasions is drawn from the cock, it is not so easy to calculate the expenditure; but as they ask their best customers, it would be natural to believe that the landlord is not backward in recommending his liquor, nor his guests in trying its strength, not having the usual reckoning to pay, and having previously quit scores with the priest.—As it may be alleged that the priest does not countenance these practices, I shall mention a fact. A female, invited to one of these confessional coteries, mentioned to some others how very polite the priest was at breakfast to the woman, pressing the bashful ones to take whisky in their tea. "Faith," says her husband, "it was very easy to prevail on them to take it, and for him to offer what was not out of his own pocket." The wife replied, "You dare not tell him so at your next confession."

Thus you may see, Sir, how much the moral principle is degraded by such a system, and even by the priests; a system which holds out to its deluded followers a yearly, or half-yearly, acquittal for sin. Well may that truth applied by our Saviour to the Scribes and Pharisees, be applied to them: "Ye encompass sea and land to gain one proselyte; and when ye have gained him, ye make him twofold more a child of the devil."

That this system is equally opposed to every attempt to promote the moral and religious education of the poor children, I shall show by the following fact. A country gentleman of my acquaintance, of landed property, often deplored the wretched state of ignorance and wickedness in which his tenants' children were brought up; and more especially the profanation of the Lord's day, by every species of mischief, plundering orchards, breaking down young trees, gambling, dancing, drinking, &c. —conceived that some good might be done if these children could be brought into a Sunday school, and kept from idleness. Accordingly he sent and received from the Hibernian School Society, sets of Moral Lessons for Children; he provided a house with two rooms; one for boys, the other for girls; and at no inconsiderable expense, had every thing prepared for opening the school on the most liberal plan; and lest the Bible should give any offence, it was not to be introduced. Having thus prepared his plans, he desired his tenants to send their children there for two hours every Sunday morning, and the same in the evening. Sunday morning came, and about sixty of the finest open-faced children attended, all anxious to learn to read. Information of this soon reached the priest's ears. He immediately cursed from the altar every person who would presume to send a child to the school to be instructed by a heretic; and fearing this would not deter them, he declared he would not give the rites of the church to any person when dying, who would, after this injunction, attempt to send a child there. Thus was an establishment, calculated merely to convey moral instruction, with the knowledge of reading and spelling, broken up: and although the gentleman himself waited on the priest, and assured him there was not the least wish to proselyte a single child, requesting he would personally visit the school, and begging the co-operation of any of his flock who would attend,—the priest was inexorable, and told him, he could not consent that Protestants should interfere with the education of his people. I could adduce many more instances of the uncongenial nature of Popery, to every thing connected with the improvement of the degraded condition of the poor in that community, in this kingdom. They act on right views of the subject, no doubt; because it is impossible that the Roman Catholics, as a body, could be so priest-ridden, if the scale of moral and intellectual improvement were advanced. Masses are so common in Ireland, that the price of them is very cheap, considering the advantages stated to be received from them. Now, a pious son of the church can get a promise from the priest of saying as many masses for the souls of his dear relatives in purgatory, as will bring them clear and clean out, at half-a-crown each mass: for it is laid down as an invariable rule, that to make a mass efficacious, it must be paid for. Indeed, the priests are willing to say masses over the brute creation; as in cases of murrain among cattle, the rot among sheep, and the measles, &c. among pigs. I dare say you will hardly credit this; but I assure you, I knew of masses being said over a parcel of pigs who had got some distemper!

Having alluded to the orders instituted amongst the Romish laity, I shall endeavour to give you some idea of them. From amongst the most devoted to the priest, and of those most frequent at masses, stations, &c., the priest selects a certain number of both sexes, who, on payment of certain fees, and the performance of certain ceremonies, are decorated with the badges of the particular orders they are initiated into: such as the Order of the Virgin, (one of the highest, if not the highest,) the Order of St Bridget, of St Francis, St Benedict, &c. &c. These badges, or amulets, are worn inside, out of public view; and as they are first consecrated by the priest or bishop, the favourite devotee thinks him or herself placed under the immediate protection of that saint as a titular deity. These fraternities make a collection among themselves for particular masses, on these saints' days. I saw one of the rituals of one of these orders, which stated, "That as nothing in heaven or in earth was so meritorious in the sight of God as the celebration of the mass, in each of which the sacrifice of Christ is as truly and really performed as when he died on Calvary; and as the frequent repetition of the same was recommended and enjoined to all the faithful, it seemed good to the bishop to create and appoint a certain confraternity of holy brothers and sisters, in such a place, under the patronage of such a saint," &c. &c.: next followed the rules. These fraternities are not confined at all, or prevented from carrying on their trades and several callings. But although the above is stated to be the ostensible cause for forming these fraternities, yet there are private rules and instructions given to them, by which they are bound to be under the immediate direction, and in strict obedience to the priest; to inform him of every thing done in his parish, which affects himself or the Roman Catholic cause; and, in general, to be the tale-bearers of the parish. They thus act as so many emissaries or spies, and are a great restraint on the people. Woe betide the person who dare speak disrespectfully of the priest, even if he should deserve it; or who attempts to read the Bible, or to eat meat on a fish day (but he may get drunk as often as he pleases, without any reprimand). The account is brought in triumph by one of these his emissaries, and the party accused immediately cited, and condemned to pay a fine, and undergo a heavy penance; which if he should refuse, he is threatened with excommunication, and the thunders of the church. I never knew an instance of resistance to such penance by the poorer sort, although I have amongst some few of the rich and more independent: and I have observed, that, in the latter cases, the priest did not follow up his threat.

But this is not all the service required from these confraternities. They are required to offer themselves to attend the sick Protestants, and the poorer classes particularly. If their services be received, they are directed to try every persuasive: first, by seeming compassion for their souls; and, if that is not strong enough, then by promises of temporal assistance; next, by endeavours to frighten them by frightful tales of apparitions, visions, &c. &c., of the damned spirits of Protestants, or the revelations of saints, particularly the Virgin. In the meanwhile, the priest's housekeeper is seen frequently calling to know how the patient is, and bringing tea, whey, &c.; although, if the patient prove finally obstinate in refusing the priest's assistance, he may starve for him. The consequence is, as you may suppose, that, in many cases, they thus succeed, and then trumpet their success through the different parishes. Many other causes contribute to their success; sometimes the want of a resident clergyman of the Church of England; and the natural bias of the unregenerate mind to lean to Popery, on the opinion that good works, with a little assistance, will help them into heaven. The Papist even dares to tell them, that though men may live Protestants, they wish to die Papists. Thus, they sometimes prevail by assiduity, affected kindness, and constant application, with the poor dying patient, who often does not know the principles of the new religion he is introduced into, and when his strength, and often his faculties, are exhausted. I shall now give you one example out of many. A poor Protestant, in the above town, was dying; his daughter having previously married a Papist, and turned to mass, exhorted, and pressed, and entreated him to have the priest sent for, but all to no purpose. His Bible was then taken from him, as that was supposed a hinderance. Next, his own daughter took the bed her poor dying father was lying on from under him, saying to him, that straw was good enough for a heretic to die on. Every attempt was made by some of the fraternity, brought in by the daughter, to cajole or frighten him into a compliance, but all to no purpose. He begged a Protestant neighbour, who accidentally called to see him, to whom he related the above, (and who informed the writer,) to sit by him; the poor man saying, that he did not know what they might do to him before he died. This man sat beside him until he became speechless, and was in the agonies of death. He could bear the scene no longer. You may reasonably conclude he would now be allowed to die in peace; the Protestant neighbour at least thought so, and left him; but no! Papists are not so easily foiled. A messenger was now sent to the priest, who was waiting up at night to be called, to say that now the coast was clear. He comes and speaks to the man in the agonies of death, and asks him if he will die a good Catholic? No answer. He baptizes and anoints the man in this state; and, taking him by the hand, desires him to give a proof of his dying in the Catholic faith; and he calls out, O how he squeezes my hand! The fraternity publish this conversion, as they call it, with many things connected with it, which had no foundation in fact.

I said the religion of Papists was intolerant and cruel. The above specimen will confirm this sentiment: and this is only one instance out of many of the practices which Papists are convicted of. It was of no consequence what may be the feelings of the dying man under the above operation, or whether he had any feeling at all: dead men cannot tell tales; and therefore they may invent as many stories of conversion of Protestants as they please.

J. A.

The above presents Popery in a truly fiend-like character. Under the influence of this delusion, filial affection, and every other amiable affection of human nature, is set at defiance. No matter what the living or the dying may suffer, in body or in mind, if the cause of holy church be promoted, and if the priests can persuade people to believe their lie. A man who submits to have the consecrated oil applied to parts of his body by the hand of a priest, or whether he submit to it or not, if it be but applied, as in the above instance, is understood to die in the true faith, and the devil can have no power over him; whereas, with-cut such anointing, he would be in danger,—nay, would certainly be lost. This will form the subject of the next, and some following Numbers.

No. CXXXVI.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17TH, 1821.

AT the beginning of my last Number, I gave an extract of a letter which I had received from a clergyman of the established church, in Ireland, relating to the miserably corrupted state of that edition of the Holy Scriptures, which the Council of Trent declared to be the only authentic and true version. The following is another extract from the same letter, which will serve to introduce the next general head of discussion.

"But the ceremony of anointing," says my correspondent, "has done more mischief here than any other tenet, if I may except the claim of Peter, and of one church; for the epistle of James seems to make it so completely an ordinance of the church, that when it is read, and the words (chap. v. 14, 15,) put strongly to the consciences of dying Protestants, it has caused multitudes of them to send for a priest, fearing to die without the benefit of it. Were it to end here, it would not be a matter of much consequence, as an unbeliever may as well be deceived by that, as by the partaking of bread and wine, which is the viaticum of all the Protestants, who know not the truth as it is in Jesus. But the system among them is, when an ignorant dying Protestant is worked on by a Popish friend, and they are ever on the watch for such, and that a priest is sent for, if he finds the person under any alarm, and the conscience weak, after he has spoken for some time, he says, that he will not absolve, or administer the holy oil, unless not only the dying person is baptized into the church, but also the whole family; and this, too, often succeeds, and is the principal cause of the sad relapse to Popery, which has been so great within thirty years back, that more than two-thirds of the lower orders of the southern Protestants have gone over to the Church of Rome." This short and interesting statement, by a native Irishman, and a minister of the established church, who knows his country well, and has travelled over a great part of it, might lead to many serious reflections; but I have used it only as an introduction to the subject of Extreme Unction, which the Church of Rome puts in the list of her sacraments; and by means of which, along with her other impositions, she deceives so many souls to their destruction.

I shall, as usual, lay down the doctrine of the Church of Rome respecting this sacrament, in the very express words of her own approved authors, including the canon of the council of Trent.

Quest. "What," says Bishop Hay, is the end and design of the sacrament of extreme unction? Ans. The Council of Trent declares it in these words: 'Our most merciful Redeemer, who desired that his servants should at all times be provided with wholesome remedies against all the darts of their enemies, as in the other sacraments he gave Christians the greatest helps, to enable them to pass their lives in a Christian manner, and free from any grievous spiritual detriment, so he hath fortified the latter end of our life with the most powerful protection of the sacrament of extreme unction. For, though our adversary seeks, and seizes, during our whole life, every possible occasion of ruining our souls, yet there is no time wherein he more vehemently exerts all his strength and art to ruin us entirely, and destroy, if possible, our confidence in the mercy of God, than when he sees the last moment of life approaching.' Sess. XIV. in doct. de Extr. Unct. By this we see, that the intention of our blessed Saviour, in instituting this sacrament, is to be the means of fortifying our souls against all the violent attacks and snares of our spiritual enemies at our last moments, and to enable us to make a holy death, and secure a happy eternity.

"Quest. Does the devil attack souls with more violence than ordinary in their last moments? Ans. He certainly does so, as this general council declares, and as experience itself assures us." [The grave bishop does not say how he knew this by experience.] "For though, at all times, he goeth about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour, 1 Pet. v. 8, yet he redoubles all his force, and all his art, when we come to our last moments, knowing that if he can gain us then, we will be his for ever; but if he lose us then, he loses us for ever; according to that of the Revelation, when St John heard a loud voice, saying, 'Wo to the earth and to the sea, because the devil is come down to you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time,' Rev. xii. 12. When the soul is in her last agony, hovering betwixt time and eternity, and on the point of leaving the body, the devil then knows there is but a short time to stay, and therefore he redoubles all his assaults against her; for, as another scripture says, 'There are spirits that are created for vengeance, and in the time of destruction they will pour out their force,' Ecclus. xxxix. 33; like a king, who, being at war with his enemies, when he comes to a decisive battle on the event of which his crown depends, calls out all his army on that day, and exerts the utmost of his power in order to insure the victory. Now, when the poor soul comes to this last and dreadful battle, what can she do?—if left to herself, she will surely perish. This our blessed Saviour well knowing, was pleased, out of his infinite goodness, to institute the holy sacrament of extreme unction; by which he purifies the soul, still more and more, from all the remains of sin that may be in her, and which would give the devil more power and advantage over her; and he also raises her up above her own strength, endowing her with power from on high, to enable her to fight manfully against all the assaults of Satan, and come off with the victory.

"Quest. Is extreme unction, then, a true and real sacrament of the new law? Ans. It is, and has all the three things necessary for that purpose.

"Quest. 4. What is the outward visible sign used in extreme unction? Ans. It is the anointing the different organs of our senses with holy oil, blessed in a particular manner by the bishop for this purpose, accompanied by prayer.

"Quest. 5. What is the inward grace this brings to the soul? Ans. Both the sanctifying grace of God, by which any stain of sin that may be in the soul is washed away, and forgiven; and also the actual grace of God, by which the soul is fortified and strengthened to resist all the assaults of Satan in her last moments. It also sometimes brings health to the body, when Almighty God sees that to be expedient for the good of the soul.

"Quest. 6. How is this outward action a sign of inward grace? Ans. The oil with which the sick person is anointed represents the grace of God, which is poured down into the soul; and the prayer used at time of anointing, expresses the remission of sins thereby granted to the sick person; for the prayer is this, 'By this holy unction, and his own most pious mercy, may the Almighty God forgive you whatever sins thou hast committed by the sight,' when the eyes are anointed; 'by the hearing,' when the ears are anointed, and so of the other senses.

"Quest. 7. Where is the sacrament laid down in the Holy Scriptures? Ans. It is explained at large, in all its parts, and commanded to be used by the holy apostle St James, in these clear and express terms: 'Is any one sick among you? Let him bring in the priests of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord.' See here the outward action of the sacrament, anointing with oil, accompanied with prayer; the inward grace immediately follows, 'and the prayer of faith shall save the sick man, and the Lord shall raise him up; and, if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him,' James v. 14. 'Our Lord shall raise him up' above his own strength, fortifying his soul with his assisting grace; and, 'if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him,' by the sanctifying grace of God, which will wash and purify his soul from all the stains of sin that may remain in it, so that he may appear with joy before his Lord." Sincere Christian Instructed, Vol. II. Chap. xxv.

The next question and answer relate to the effects of this sacrament; and then we have a repetition of the same things over and over again, under about half a dozen more questions and answers, in which the principal thing to be noted is, that this sacrament is to be administered by the priests of the church, and that this is a branch of the priestly office.

After reading the above exposition of the Romish doctrine, one of the first reflections which will occur to the intelligent reader, will be, what a strange idea must papists have of the state of a dying Christian! The bishop may be allowed to speak mere harmless nonsense, when he adduces his own living experience to show what is the state of dying persons, and what are their peculiar sufferings and temptations; but when he represents a dying Christian as assailed by all the power and craft of the devil; when he, at the same time, represents the soul of such a one under a female character, enabled by power from on high to fight manfully against all the assaults of Satan; and when it is made to appear that this power is imparted by means of the application of oil, blessed by a bishop, to the eyes, ears, nose, &c. of the dying person, the thing assumes too much of the ludicrous to admit of its being regarded as a divine ordinance, or even of having its absurdity seriously exposed.

A blind man will not talk long about colours, or a deaf man about music, until he make it appear that he knows little or nothing of what he is talking about. This remark will be found to apply to what Bishop Hay has written, —nay, to what the Council of Trent has decreed about the state and condition of a dying Christian. I do not profess, like Bishop Hay, to speak from experience on this subject; but I know from the Holy Scriptures, that Christ does not leave his people, in their last moments, to fight with the devil in their own strength, or in the strength of consecrated oil, applied to different parts of their bodies by a mere creature like themselves. Those who believe in Christ—that is, those who are really Christians—are kept by the mighty power of God, through faith unto salvation. Their whole Christian life is a state of warfare against sin, and Satan, and the present evil world; and although the contest does not finally terminate till death, there is no scriptural reason to conclude that it is necessarily, or even usually, most severe at the approach of death. It will not be denied that many Christians have been filled with dismay when they contemplated the near approach of the last enemy; but it is certain that others have waited his approach with the utmost composure, and even with a degree of triumph which appeared strange to persons in good health. In the degree of peace and comfort which Christ is pleased to impart to his people in the hour of death, he dispenses to every one according to his own good pleasure; but one thing is certain, they shall all be conquerors, and more than conquerors, through him that hath loved them; and they shall be able to say, "Though I walk through the valley and shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me, and thy rod and staff they comfort me."

When a Christian comes to die, he is not entering upon a scene entirely new to him. From the hour of his first believing, he became dead to the world, and the things of the world. It became part of his daily exercise to realize, by familiar contemplation, his transition from this world to the next; and his every-day reflections, so far as he is enabled to live up to his new character and state, are reflections suitable to the last day and hour of his life. Committing the keeping of his soul to his Creator in well-doing, every day, he fears not that he will be left alone to fight with his enemy the devil, when he comes to his last day; and when that day does arrive, he feels not the want of any new operation or process to pass upon either his soul or his body, to prepare him for death. He stands complete in his Saviour's righteousness; and knowing in whom he has believed, he commits his soul to him, in the sure and certain hope of being found with him in peace when he shall appear to judge the world in righteousness.

But the Popish doctrine represents a dying Christian in a state quite new, and as unprovided for, as if it had been unexpected. The Council of Trent speaks of the powerful protection of the sacrament of extreme unction as necessary to fortify the latter end of our life; and it is to be used only when that period is understood to have arrived. Christ appointed no means of fortifying the soul at the end of life, but such as a Christian ought to make use of every day of his life, because he requires his people to consider every day as if it were their last: but the Church of Rome has a sacrament intended for the dying only, and which she applies for the salvation of persons, many of whom never thought of salvation before; who were living in sin, and who hope to be saved from its punishment by the virtue of this sacrament, which, like all the rest, is sold to them for money. In this article alone, though there was nothing else against her, the Church of Rome appears in a character so diabolical, as to point her out as the very Antichrist; the blasphemer of God, and the destroyer of the souls of men.

Christ gives his people the most ample assurance of his presence and protection in the most critical circumstances, which, no doubt, include those incident to our last moments. "Fear thou not; for I am with thee: be not dismayed; for I am thy God: I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burnt; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee;" Isa. xli. 10, and xliii. 2. Thus he assures his people, that, in every trying hour, he will be with them, so that no plague shall befal them, or evil come near them. Christ took our nature, that, through death, he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage; Heb. ii 14, 15. The Christian believing this, can say, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ;" 1 Cor. xv. 56—58. Such are the views of death which a Christian learns to entertain according to the word of God; and every example which the Bible furnishes of the last hours of holy men, corresponds with this representation. But the Church of Rome represents the last hours of her Christians as invariably, if not necessarily, a period of the most dreadful alarm, and of the most severe conflict with the devil. When his strength is gone, and when just a-dying, the Papist has to encounter all the power and craft of the devil, raised to their highest degree of excitement; he must, in short, enter the lists with Satan, as if he were his equal in strength; and he is not taught to seek assistance from any higher power than a fellow-creature, with a phial of consecrated oil, which he believes to be sufficient to frighten the devil away from him. Every child who understands the terms must see, that the religion which teaches this is not Christianity, but a mere, and a very absurd, modification of heathenism.

According to the Popish doctrine, as laid down by Bishop Hay, when a Christian comes to die, it is still doubtful whether the devil shall have him or not. Whether he shall go to heaven or hell, must depend upon his being able to "fight manfully" against the devil, and that, too, when he is in the agonies of death; and this ability to fight manfully is made to depend upon his being previously anointed with the holy oil; this depends upon the intention of the Bishop who consecrated the oil, and of the priest who applies it; and having gone round this circle, we arrive at the point to which every popish ceremony tends, namely, that the salvation of a Papist depends entirely on his priest. All that Christ did and suffered for the salvation of sinners, goes for nothing with a Papist, unless his priest be allowed to have the honour of making it available. Thus, extreme unction is not a vain ceremony, or a mere absurdity, which, when it has excited a sufficient degree of ridicule, may be left to the peaceable enjoyment of those who are in love with it. It is in itself a real Antichrist. It occupies the place of Christ in the ministrations of Popish priests, and in the thoughts of dying Papists. Christ himself is the only ground of hope in the hour of death. He is as accessible at the last minute of the eleventh hour, as he is in the first hour; and it is the duty of every Christian who may be called to attend the dying-bed of a sinner, to tell him of Christ as the almighty and the only Saviour, who is able to save unto the uttermost all that come to God by him: and this truth brought to his ears, may be so imprest upon his heart by the Holy Spirit, as to effect his conversion. I do not say it shall be so; for, in general men are left to die as they have lived; but I say, it may be so, because Christ has not instructed his servants to prescribe limits to the exercise of his mercy towards sinners in the present life. But the Popish doctrine of extreme unction leaves Christ quite out of the view of a dying sinner; and the priest, and the anointing, are put in his place. Accordingly when a Papist is supposed to be dying, his great, his only concern, is to have the priest, with his holy oil; and to have this applied to all the members of his body, by means of which he may have committed sin; and to the organs of sight and hearing, by which sin may have found its way into the heart. Here Christ is not thought of at all. The priest and the oil are the saviour in which he confides. He ventures his eternity upon a deception; goes down to the grave with a lie in his right hand; and, while he perishes, the guilt of his murder lies at the door of the church that deceived and ruined him.

Bishop Hay has ventured to quote one passage from the Bible, and another from the Apocrypha, to support his view of the state of the souls of Christians in their last moments. The former is Rev. xii. 12: "Wo to the earth, and to the sea; because the devil is come down to you, having great wrath, knowing that he hath but a short time." It did not suit the bishop's purpose to give the true meaning of the passage, and to show what the earth and the sea have to do with the state of an individual Christian at the hour of his death; and, in general, it will be found, that when a Papist has recourse to the Bible, it is for the purpose of misapplying and abusing it. The words seem to refer to the great wrath of Satan, when he perceived the progress of the gospel among the nations of the world, which, through the influence of the truth, were about to throw off his yoke: and, no doubt, his wrath will be more manifest than ever, when the nations shall throw off the yoke which he has long bound about their necks, by the instrumentality of the Church of Rome. "Wo to the earth and to the sea;" that is, the kingdoms of the world, more particularly of Europe, when this shall happen! for the devil will not likely quit the throne which he has occupied for many hundred years, without such a struggle as will shake all the kingdoms of the civilized world to their very foundations. The more I see or hear of the devil raging among the Papists; that is, the more falsehoods I hear them propagating against the government that tolerates and protects them; the more I hear them crying out, that they are objects of the most sanguinary and unrelenting persecution that ever aggrieved a Christian people;—the more convinced I am, that the devil has begun to suspect that his reign is drawing to a termination; nay, I believe, he knows the fact; and in his great wrath, he will, no doubt, muster all his forces for the contest. He will have all the Papists, and an innumerable host of infidels, and merely nominal Christians, on his side. These have all along been opposed to the spiritual kingdom of Christ in the world; some of them have been more, others less conspicuous, in the ranks of opposition: but if it be so, as I suppose it is, that the reign of Antichrist—that is, the reign of the devil upon the earth—is now to be of short duration, the adversary will muster all his hosts for the battle; then, "wo to the inhabitants of the earth, and of the sea!" for then shall be days of tribulation such as the nations of Europe have never yet experienced.

Real Christians would be apt to despond with such a prospect before them, and to fear that the church of Christ would perish in the conflict: and indeed she would, if HE were not in the midst of her, and if his almighty power were not pledged for her preservation; but God is the refuge and the strength of his people. He will preserve them. He will disperse his enemies like chaff before the wind. He will consume the Man of sin with the spirit of his mouth, and destroy him with the brightness of his coming. He will establish his reign over the whole earth, and make his church an eternal excellency, a joy of many generations.

I have been led into this short digression, by Bishop Hay's absurd misapplication of a prophetic passage of the Revelation. In my next Number, I shall resume the subject of extreme unction.

As for the bishop's quotation from the Apocrypha, "There are spirits that are created for vengeance," &c., I do not profess to understand its meaning, or to know whether it has any meaning at all. I rather suspect that it has none: but whether it be so or not is of no importance, seeing the writer of the book called Ecclesiasticus, is no higher authority than Bishop Hay himself.

No. CXXXVII.

SATURDAY, February 24th, 1821.

In my last Number, it was laid down upon the authority of the Council of Trent, as adduced and expounded by Bishop Hay, that a Christian in his last moments is, more than at any other period of his life, exposed to the rage of the devil. It is the Romish Christian of whom the council and the bishop are speaking; and I more than suspect, that the worst thing the devil can do to such persons, in the hour of death, is to let them alone, and leave them to the priests, who will do his work more effectually than he could do by appearing in his own person. If it were true that the devil really made an assault upon dying persons; that he reminded them of their sins, and filled their minds with alarming apprehensions of the coming judgment; some of them might be led to think of the gospel which they had heard or read, and might even flee for refuge to the hope which it sets before them, and so they would be saved from the wrath to come. But the worst possible state of a dying sinner is to be without alarm; to think that he is at peace with God, when he is an enemy of God. There is delusion enough in the heart of every unregenerate man to think this of himself, if there have been nothing particularly atrocious in his conduct; as if it were not so, the Church of Rome steps forward with a pretended sacrament, called extreme unction, by which she professes to give peace to the conscience of the dying sinner, and thus, as I have said, she does the devil's work most effectually,—so that he has no occasion to come down with great wrath, as Bishop Hay would have us believe, as if it were to torment his subjects before the time, or engage in a personal contest with them. It was the curse of the false prophets of old, that they healed the hurt of the Lord's people slightly; that is, they applied as a medicine what could not cure their wound, but gave only a momentary relief. The Romish priests are in the same condemnation, under circumstances of more heinous wickedness; for their pretended sacrament diverts the mind of a dying sinner from the only efficacious remedy; and after teaching him to trust in a lie, they sell him, for money, perhaps an hour of peace, to be followed by an eternity of unspeakable misery.

It is time now to enter upon a serious examination of the arguments by which the Church of Rome maintains her dogma about extreme unction. It must be allowed, that there is something in the sound of the words of the apostle James that seems to give countenance to the Popish practice; and hence it is, that, as a correspondent says in my last Number, ill-taught Protestants are easily imposed upon, and persuaded to submit, in their dying hours, to have themselves anointed, under a sort of half persuasion that the thing can do no harm, and may do them good. But we ought to remember, that it is not the sound of certain words, taken out of their connection, by which we are to understand what the Holy Spirit says in the Scriptures. It is the meaning of the words, taking in the whole of what is said upon any particular subject, by which our faith and practice are to be regulated. The words, James v. 14, 15, are, in our translation, "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let him pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him." Here we certainly have "sickness," and "sending for the elders," (or priest as the Douay version has it). Here we have "praying over the sick person," and "anointing him with oil," and "saving him," and "raising him up," and "having his sins forgiven." Taking these expressions in this detached manner, the Church of Rome would seem to have more foundation for this sacrament, than for almost any other of her impositions: and yet, the arguments deduced from them have no more weight than that of a bacchanalian, who should plead for the lawfulness of getting drunk, from certain words in the prophecy of Jeremiah; "Drink ye, and be drunken; and fall, and rise no more." Chap. xxv. 27. *

Anointing with oil was a ceremony in common use among the Jews. It was divinely appointed to be applied to persons who were set apart for certain offices; and the application of it was often, if not usually, followed by a miraculous change in the character and conduct of those to whom it was applied. It was after being anointed with oil by Samuel, that Saul manifested those new traits of character that gave rise to the proverb, "Is Saul also among the prophets?" It was after Jehu had received a similar anointing, that he displayed his zeal for the Lord of hosts; though it does not appear that either his zeal, or Saul's prophesying, was really sanctified to the service of God in a spiritual manner. The sign, however, was a common one, by which a divine and miraculous influence upon the body, or the soul, or both, was pointed out. This appeared by what the apostles did, when Christ first sent them out to preach the gospel. He gave them power, on that occasion, over unclean spirits, to cast them out. He gave them power also to heal the sick. This was certainly a miraculous power; and we are assured, by the divine record, that it was connected with the anointing with oil. "They cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them." Mark vi. 13. It does not appear very clearly to us, what connection there was between the anointing and the healing, but it was enough for the time then being, if it had a signification calculated to make an impression upon the minds of the Jews, or to illustrate any part of their ritual.

* These words are really in the Bible, and certainly they have a strange sound when detached from the context; but if any person will read the whole passage, he will see that the words have no relation to persons getting drunk, but to certain national judgments, by means of which, people should be so overwhelmed and stupified as to resemble the state of drunken men.

The power of casting out devils, and healing the sick, and even raising the dead, was continued to the apostles after Christ had gone to heaven; and there were others admitted to a participation of some, at least, of these powers. The apostles had not only received the heavenly unction themselves, but they had also the power of imparting the Holy Ghost to those on whom they laid their hands for that purpose. Persons thus endowed would become, by the choice of their brethren, elders of churches, just as those who were first chosen to the deacons' office are declared to have been men full of faith and of the Holy Ghost.

James addressed his epistle to Christians who were Jews by birth. It was inscribed to the twelve tribes which were scattered abroad: and he informs them that the divine influence with which persons of their nation had been favoured from the beginning, was still continued in the persons of men who were their overseers in the Lord, who were endowed with certain miraculous powers; and that the exercise of these powers was accompanied by the ancient sign, that of anointing with oil. However unimportant this ceremony may appear to us, it would have great significance in the mind of a Jew, as reminding him of many important events in the history of his nation, and of the most distinguished persons who had belonged to it, and especially as reminding him of the grand promise, which had been the hope of his fathers, of the coming of Him who is called the Messiah, or the Anointed One.

The apostle James, addressing Christians and churches whose elders, overseers, or bishops, (for it makes no difference which word we use,) were the first fruits of the preaching of the apostles among their brethren according to the flesh, and who had received the extraordinary gift, or power, of working miracles,—exhorts his brethren to take the benefit of this extraordinary power while it was continued among them; just as he would have advised any Jew, in the time of Christ's personal ministry, if in sickness, to apply for healing to the Master, if he had access to him; or to the disciples, if he had not: for they, in their Master's name, "anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them."

The saving of the sick, in the words of the apostle James, evidently means the healing of them, or the removing of their disease, whatever it might be; for it is immediately added, "The Lord shall raise him up," that is, from his sickness. Here, then, it appears, that the thing prescribed by the apostle was essentially different from the Popish sacrament of extreme unction. This is never administered but to persons supposed to be at the point of death. It is not intended for healing them, or raising them up to health, but to enable them to go down to the grave fighting manfully with the devil.

If there were powers and privileges belonging to the primitive churches, while under the oversight of men endowed with miraculous gifts, I am inclined to think there were also diseases connected with that state, which were inflicted as a visible testimony of divine displeasure against certain transgressors. The church in Corinth had sinned grievously in their abuse of the Lord's supper; and, "for this cause," says Paul, "many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep." 1 Cor. xi. 30. These words, I think, throw some light on those of James. He speaks of sickness, in connection with having committed sins; and of healing, in connection with having sins forgiven. Now, we know, that when Christ cured men's bodies, he usually pardoned their sins too; and the words of the apostle James establish the same connection; which seems clearly to intimate, that the anointing and the healing, where the former was practised and the latter effected, were a fulfilment of what Christ promised to his apostles when he was about to leave them. Mark xvi. 17, 18, "These signs shall follow them that believe: In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues: they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover." Here Christ does not say to his apostles, you shall do so and so, as if they were to have exclusively, the privileges mentioned. He speaks of them that should believe their testimony; they shall cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; they shall not be hurt by any deadly thing that they may drink; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover. All these things belonged to the state of the church, while under the oversight of men miraculously endowed; and such were the elders of whom James speaks, in the passage on which the Church of Rome builds her sacrament of extreme unction. If I shall be asked to show why the priests of the church have not now the same powers, I shall, in reply, ask them to show me if they can cast out devils, and handle serpents, and drink poison without being hurt by it, and heal the sick by laying their hands on them. If they can do these things, then they may practise the sign of anointing, with which they were connected; if they cannot perform the things, they had better let the sign alone.

Here the trickery of the priests appears in a very striking light. They know that the cure of men's bodies is a thing that men can judge of. This, therefore, they do not pretend to do by their sacrament, though it is the very thing to which the anointing of the apostle James refers; but no man can see whether or not their anointing produces any effect upon the soul; this, therefore, is that which they say is done. It takes away the stain of sin from the soul, and fortifies it with divine grace; which cannot be an object of sense, therefore the priests are secure from detection. If it should at any time procure bodily health, it is only by accident: and as the priest does not promise this, he is not liable to have his power called in question. But let us hear what Bishop Hay says on this subject. After explaining seven different things which are effected by extreme unction, he proceeds:—

"Quest. Are all these effects certainly produced by the grace of this sacrament? Ans. All those which regard the soul never fail to be produced by the grace of this sacrament, unless the sick person put a hinderance to them by his indisposition; for the Scripture expressly affirms, that when it is administered, 'Our Lord shall raise him up, and his sins shall be forgiven him.' So that God, who is faithful to his word, will never fail, on his part, to bestow these graces on the sick person, if he be properly disposed to receive them; and the more perfectly he is disposed, the more abundant portion he will receive of them. But what regards the health of the body is not always granted, being only an accidental effect, and not essential to the sacrament, and is only given when the good of the soul requires it."

Thus, it seems the virtue of this sacrament depends entirely upon the disposition of the person to whom it is administered; and the degree of the benefit is according to the perfection of the disposition of the dying person. I grant, that even a divine ordinance will not benefit a man who is indisposed to it: but if extreme unction could be of any use at all, it ought to be without regard to disposition; for persons in the agonies of death are in general incapable of disposing their minds one way or another, or of being certain how, or in what degree, they are disposed; so that though this sacrament is declared never to fail in its effects upon the soul with but one exception, no man can be sure that the exception does not apply to him. "The grace of this sacrament," therefore, turns out to be no grace at all. It gives no security to any dying person that he shall be saved; so the priests and their holy oil are the most miserable of all comforters. Nothing can give true peace to the soul, in life or in death, but a believing view of the death of Christ, by which the sting of death is taken away: and every thing that tends to divert the mind from this point is of the devil, though it should be an attempt to define too minutely what is meant by a believing view of Christ's death; * by perplexing themselves about which, men may have their minds diverted from Christ himself, as much as by the imposing rite of anointing with holy oil, by priestly hands.

The following extract will show still more distinctly, what a broken reed Papists have to depend upon, when they put their trust in this sacrament. It is, in fact, of no avail without another sacrament which must go before it, except in certain excepted cases, which must be extremely perplexing to a dying person, if he is able to attend to the subject at all. The fourth of the seven effects of extreme unction, is expressed by Bishop Hay as follows: "It also cleanses the soul even from the guilt of mortal sin, in certain circumstances, where the sick person cannot have recourse to the sacrament of penance; for, where this sacrament of penance can be had, it must always be applied to, for the remission of mortal sin; but in dying persons it may sometimes happen that this cannot be done. As, for example, if their mortal sins were not forgiven in confession, for want of proper dispositions, though unknown to the person himself; or were committed after being at the sacrament of penance, but had quite escaped his memory; or, if being suddenly deprived of his senses, he could not confess them, but had a sincere sorrow for them. In these, or such like cases, even the guilt of mortal sins will be cleansed from the soul, by the grace of extreme unction." Here are so many ifs and buts, to use a vulgar expression, that no man can be certain what benefit he will derive from this sacrament, or even from that of penance, or whether he will derive any benefit at all from one or both of them. One is apt to conclude from this, that what has been called in Scotland the "glorious

* It is unquestionably of great importance to think and speak correctly about believing in Christ, as well as upon every other religious subject; but I have seen persons, both in health and in sickness, who seemed to have more anxiety about believing rightly, than about believing the right thing. But unless Christ, and him crucified, be the chief, I had almost said the exclusive object of contemplation, we shall derive little benefit from analyzing the exercise of our own minds with regard to him. I do not say that this is unnecessary or unimportant; but it ought to be secondary and subordinate. The mind that is exercised chiefly about Christ, will come to understand the nature of its own exercise; but the mind that is exercised chiefly about its own operations, may never come to the knowledge of Christ; and in this way, Satan may deceive souls to their ruin. A man may have his eyes open towards the most beautiful object in nature, but he will derive no pleasure from it; nay, perhaps he will not really see it, if he is thinking only of the faculty of vision. So it is possible to fail of believing in Christ, while thinking and disputing about the nature of believing.

uncertainty of the law," has been transferred to the Popish gospel: for, as the priests are the sole expounders of this gospel, which, in their phraseology, is called "the new law," they are able to extort immense sums of money from dying persons, and their friends, in order to obtain a favourable interpretation of all the doubtful points, which can easily be made to apply to the case of any man that ever lived or died. I request my readers to view Popery in the light of extreme unction alone, as thus expounded by a late Scottish bishop, and let them say, if it does not exhibit a system of opposition to the gospel of Jesus Christ, as prominent and mischievous as Antichrist can possibly be.

I shall conclude this subject, by showing that this pretended sacrament is a mere novelty of the dark ages, and that it was entirely unknown to the Christians of the earlier ages. I have already shown, that the words of the apostle James relate to the healing of the sick, or their restoration to health; and that, therefore, they furnish no authority for anointing the dying, solely with a view to their death. We read of many instances of persons being anointed, while in sickness, during the first four or five centuries; but all these instances seem to have been connected with the hope of restoration to health; and there is reason to think that the practice was superstitiously continued, after the miraculous power of healing had ceased: but as a sacrament, to be administered to the dying for their spiritual benefit, we read nothing of it for the first thousand years of the Christian era. There is not the least mention of it in Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, or Cyprian, or any of the writers of the first three centuries, who yet discourse frequently and plainly of the discipline and sacraments of the church; and therefore it was not known to them. Neither was it known to the fourth century, which afforded so many Christian writers, since not one of them mentions it, not even when writing of the sacraments and rites of the church. Epiphanius treats largely of the doctrine, and discipline, and rites of the church, in his work against heresies, but not a word of extreme unction. The counterfeit Dionysius, in his Ecclesiastical History, lays down, with wonderful particularity, all the mysteries of the church, from the baptism to the burial of the faithful; but of extreme unction he is altogether silent. And so is the author of "Apostolical Institutions," in his eighth book, in which he undertakes to declare all ecclesiastical forms whatever.

The literature of the first six centuries consists, in a great measure, of narratives of the life and death of many extraordinary persons and eminent saints; yet there is not the least intimation that any one of them underwent the process of extreme unction. I have before me above a score of names of great persons, whose biography is furnished, with less or more minuteness, by Eusebius; but not one of them is said to have been favoured with this sacrament. St Augustine writes many things of his excellent mother, Monica, but nothing of her being anointed; and the biographer of St Augustine himself, is equally silent with regard to him.

Now, this seems extremely strange and unaccountable, had such a sacrament been then known in the church; especially when we consider that, in later ages, the writers of the lives of the saints seldom omit the circumstance; but usually give it as a prominent part of their history, that they had received anointing of the holy oil. I have before me also a list of great men of whom this is recorded, among whom I observe the angelic doctor St Thomas Aquinas, and the no less famous St Dominic, founder of the Inquisition, and of the order that bears his name. No other reasonable account can be given why this, so very material a circumstance, should be perpetually omitted in describing the deaths of the ancient Christians, and hardly ever omitted by Roman writers of later times,—but that as the thing itself is now constantly practised in the Church of Rome, so it was utterly unknown to the ancient church.

From the fifth to the ninth century, the biographers of distinguished persons very frequently mention their receiving the eucharist, never that they received extreme unction, before their departure out of this life; which is proved by many instances out of Bede and Surius. But had extreme unction been used in those times, no reason can be given why the mention of this should be perpetually omitted, which is surely as worthy of being remembered as the other. See these things more in detail, and an immense mass of matter on the subject in general, in the Preservative against Popery, folio, vol. ii. Tit. vii. pp. 72—101.

No. CXXXVIII.

SATURDAY, March 3d, 1821.

Having despatched the subject of extreme unction, I should now proceed to the next general head of discussion, which falls to be the history and character of the Jesuits. Here I could find matter enough to fill some volumes; but I shall, as usual, endeavour to compress it, as far as is consistent with giving a fair view of the subject: and, before entering seriously upon it, I shall introduce some miscellaneous matter connected with it.

In the following extract of a letter from a gentleman in England, to his friend in Ireland, both The Protestant and the Jesuits are introduced. I do not know the name of either the writer or the writee, (if I may be allowed to coin a word, which will be understood by my mercantile readers, as well as those in the law profession,) but the extract was forwarded by a person of the first respectability in Ireland, to a gentleman of this city, with a request that it should be communicated to THE PROTESTANT. I am perfectly satisfied with the negative praise of being no bad reasoner; but I am mortified to think that there are Popish champions for whom I am "far from being a match;" I mean, with the word of God in my hand; for I have no other weapon, and I confess myself to be nothing without it. The extract is as follows:

"The writer of THE PROTESTANT is a clear-sighted, energetic penman, and no bad reasoner; but I assure you, my dear Robert, he is far from being a match for the Popish theologians who have lately thrown down the gauntlet, such as Berrington, Thake, Lingard, &c. &c.: to remove the impressions likely to be made on the more reflecting part of the community, by such writers as these, would require the talents and erudition of a Sankey or a Magee; and, in my opinion, no time should be lost. It is now, I believe, five years since Berrington and Thake published their joint work, entitled, 'The Faith of Catholics supported by Scripture, and by the writings of the Fathers of the Greek and Latin Churches, during the first five centuries,'—and yet no Protestant divine has attempted to answer it. The Roman Catholics have increased in this country (England) within the last thirty-six years, especially since the establishment of the Jesuits at Stoneyhurst. They are very numerous in Scotland; and, I may say, multitudinous in the districts of London and Lancashire: especially the latter, where the Jesuits are most favourably received. They are likewise to be found in considerable numbers in Yorkshire, Wiltshire, Warwickshire, and Staffordshire. About thirty years ago, they were found, by actual computation, to amount to 69,376; they are now computed, by their own writers, to amount to about 500,000: * and I feel persuaded, that this number will be doubled in a very few years. Indeed, I think no person can entertain a contrary opinion, but one who is totally incapable of foreseeing the effects naturally producible by the various existing circumstances, calculated to promote this increase. Their colleges, schools, &c. have been increased from three to fifty; and their chapels from a small number to nine hundred: their clergy are exceedingly numerous—many of them supported by old rent-charges on the estates of noblemen—have small congregations, and, consequently, much leisure, which they never fail to turn to account in the way of making proselytes, either by writing or conversation. The rural people of England, of the lower order, when not under the superintendence of evangelical clergymen, are easily entrapped by artful Jesuits: witness the almost incredibly numerous conversions in Lancashire; many of the higher orders, as was lately intimated to me by a most sensible and pious person who knows them well, are not indisposed to the religion of the Church of Rome. The Jesuits have several newspapers, and many periodical publications, either partially or wholly under their control. Their affectedly liberal sentiments; their professedly exclusive hatred of dissenters, methodists, &c.; their insinuating, affable, conciliatory, submissive conduct; their decorous manners, conviviality, and diversified learning,—have given them a footing in almost every society where true religion does not predominate, and quieted the apprehensions of thousands. When all this is considered, and when it is recollected that no Protestant converted to Popery can ever after be reclaimed—being either persuasively or authoritatively restrained from perusing such controversial works as might tend to refute the sophistry by which he was ensnared—is there not abundant reason for apprehending, that the growth of Popery here will be, at least, as rapid as I have said, if not much more so; is it not then the duty, the bounden duty, of every true follower of Christ, not only to deprecate, but to endeavour to become instrumental in preventing its growth? Vital Christianity and Popery are naturally repulsive; they never can be amalgamated; they are essentially incompatible; they are as opposite as the poles. The latter, supported as it has been by the utmost exertions of human ingenuity, and, indeed, peculiarly captivating to all whose minds are not preoccupied and impressed by the word of God, presents an almost insuperable barrier to the extension of the pure religion of Jesus. Inveterate heathenism may be overcome by vital Christianity: this, I trust, we shall soon, with the divine blessing, see proved in Hindostan. Philosophical infidelity may be overcome by it: this was proved during the three first centuries, at Athens, Alexandria, and Rome; and has been farther proved, in individual instances, in our days.

"But what has been the progress of vital Christianity, in opposition to Popery, throughout Europe, since the establishment of Loyola's fraternity in the sixteenth century? There have not been wanting, in every country, intrepid followers of the Lord Jesus, ready to address their Popish opponents in the words of

* This is the number estimated by the Papists themselves; and their propensity to overrate their strength is well known. The writer, in part of a sentence which I have omitted, gives it as his opinion, that they are much more numerous; in which, however, I think he must be mistaken: and the reason why I do not insert his own words, is, that I do not choose to give currency to a statement which I consider greatly exaggerated. PROT.

St Paul to the sorcerer Elymas—"Oh, full of all subtlety," &c. "will you not cease to pervert," &c.: but how far have they been instrumental in bringing from darkness to light? Vital Christianity, thanks be to God, begins to dawn on the Popish states of Germany; but see how the clouds of Popery are thickening around it, by the never-ceasing wind that blows from the Vatican. It once slightly dawned in Spain and Portugal, but it has long since been invisible there. Unassisted man may despair of rendering vital Christianity triumphant over the idolatry and other abominations of Popery; but my Bible inclines me to cherish a persuasion, that man will not much longer be unassisted in the glorious work; the arm of the Lord seems to be actually abroad; and it is the duty of his people to seize the present opportunity to fight in his cause. Papal darkness is fast overspreading the land; but as, in the natural world, darkness is the harbinger of light, so the darkness I have been lamenting may soon be succeeded, and, I believe, will be succeeded, by an unprecedented blaze of light."

Every Christian will readily say Amen to these highly important remarks, and truly Christian anticipations. I feel myself at one with this writer, in almost every thing that he has said; and I should be much obliged to him if he would inform me where I may find these wonderful champions of Popery, who cannot be successfully opposed but by men of such talents as Magee, who is well known to be one of the first literary characters of the age. One who does not pretend to much learning, beyond what a mercantile education furnishes, might reasonably be excused from entering the lists with authors, with whom none but such literary and controversial giants as the Bishop of Raphoe are worthy to contend; yet, if any one will tell me where Berrington, and Thake, and Lingard, are to be found, I shall be glad to try a hand with them. I do not mean to set out a Quixotting, to break a lance upon their skulls, or to have one broken upon mine; but if any person will send me, or tell me where I may procure their books, I shall try their strength. I have read or heard somewhere, of the name of Lingard; but Berrington and Thake never met my eye or my ear before. I have read and heard much of the great and "unanswerable Milner, than whom a more firm and orthodox divine never breathed," according to Mr Andrews, and I have found no difficulty in answering some of his sophisms and blasphemies; so that I should have no apprehension of a defeat when contending with meaner men.

The remissness of our Protestant divines is truly deplorable, if they have suffered such a work as the above writer mentions, to remain five years without attempting to answer it; especially if it be so formidable as it is represented. As I am not what the schoolmen would call a "theologian," it is not to be expected that I should be able to grapple with such a work in true theological style; but taking a plain common-sense view of the matter, I venture to undertake the refutation of it before seeing it. It contains the principle of its own destruction in its very title: "The Faith of Catholics supported by Scripture, and by the writings of the Fathers of the Greek and Latin Churches, during the five first centuries." An arch that rests one end upon a rock, and the other upon sand, will be swept away by the first flood that assails it, as completely as if the foundation had been sand at both extremities; and so shall the system of religion that is built partly on divine, and partly on human authority. The boasted system of Berrington and Thake is supported equally by Scripture and by human writings. Such a system the Head of the church disclaims altogether. It cannot be His religion; for he commands his disciples to call no man on earth master; that is, to acknowledge no authority but his own in matters of faith and worship. "The Lord is our Judge, the Lord is our Lawgiver;" and whatever He is to his people, he is that exclusively. He admits no partnership in authority, any more than in worship: and the very attempt to associate the writings of men with the word of God, in support of a religious system, is such a disparagement to the divine word, as is equal to a rejection of it. Thus, I convict the system of Berrington aad Thake of opposition to the religion of Christ, from the very title of their book; and if I shall have the good fortune to procure the book itself, I have no doubt I shall be able to confirm the verdict, by a hundred instances of opposition to the doctrine of the Bible. I shall confine myself to writers of the first century, leaving all the rest of the five to them; though, by their mode of expression, it may not be easy to say which of the five should have the precedence, seeing they are all first centuries; and they may urge a claim for precedence on behalf of any one of the five that suits them best. To put the matter, therefore, beyond a doubt, I shall keep by the apostles, and leave the whole host of the fathers to them.

I suspect that there are many of the lower, as well as of the "higher orders," in England, who "are not indisposed to the religion of the Church of Rome;" because it is a system which supplies, by a few ceremonies, the place of that change of heart, and reformation of life, which are essential to true Christianity, but to which men in love with sin are ever indisposed. The religion that encourages men to continue in sin, from a persuasion that they can obtain absolution from a priest, for a few shillings, commends itself to wicked men of all ranks; and it wants nothing but general respectability and popularity, to make it very generally embraced. I lately expressed my opinion, that the reign of Antichrist was drawing towards its termination: but this is perfectly consistent with the fact, that Popery is greatly on the increase. It may even obtain a temporary re-establishment in Protestant countries; but this will only be giving the Man of Sin a momentary elevation, that he may fall with the greater violence, like a great millstone cast into the sea by the hand of a mighty angel.

From the above extract, we see what the Jesuits in England are doing. They are proceeding like their master, "with all subtlety." To the high churchman they profess, what, I believe, they really feel, great abhorrence of dissenters: and to the dissenters they use soft words and fair speeches, calling them "our dissenting brethren," with a view to bespeak their aid in obtaining what they call "Catholic emancipation;" giving them reason to hope, that when they have got into Parliament, they will procure the same benefit to dissenters in general. And, strange as it may seem, there are some birds so simple as to be caught by this chaff; as appears by a petition to the House of Commons, by some Independent dissenters in the west of England; who humbly entreat the "honourable house to take into consideration the claims of our Catholic brethren for universal emancipation, and to extend to them those rights and immunities to which they are justly entitled, as a loyal and pious portion of the British empire." Thus, having asked for the Papists that "to which they are justly entitled," the petitioners modestly, and as if it were a secondary matter, entreat, of the "candour and bounty of the house, the extension of civil immunities, and political honours, to all the subjects of the crown of Great Britain, without respect to their religious opinions." In plain English, these Independent Protestant dissenters demand for Papists as a right, what they themselves are willing to receive as a matter of bounty;* and it is a bounty that they shall never receive from a Parliament containing Popish members. These would kick away the ladder that raised them to place; they would throw their whole weight into the scale of any intolerant party that does, or may hereafter, exist in the established church, and the severities of Bonnar and Laud would be acted over again. This our dissenters would find out when too late to help themselves; as would also certain leading men in our Scotch establishment, who at present cannot understand why we should apprehend any danger to arise from granting to Papists all that they demand.

But to return to the English Jesuits: they become literally all things to all men, that they may gain some. They can be grave with the serious, and lively with the gay; pray with the pious, and scoff with the profane; they can fast with the abstemious, and drink with the drunken; not that they themselves are in the habit of getting drunk, like the priests of meaner order in Ireland and elsewhere. The Jesuits are too good politicians to let themselves down to the derision of the people by such beastly manners; but they know how to indulge persons, whom they are striving to gain, in all manner of conviviality, though it should reach to the greatest degree of excess. They will modestly hint that such things are not right, but they know all the excuses that good-fellowship suggests; they will allow them all the weight to which they are entitled; they will make the most ample allowance for time, and company, and circumstances; insomuch, that no man shall need to feel much anxiety on account of his irregularities, seeing the priest connives at them; and, at any rate, can grant absolution when it is necessary. Thus, the Jesuits are most pleasant companions; and Popery is the most delightful religion in the world: no wonder that menof pleasure, of all ranks, should be ready to fall into it.

A correspondent has favoured me with a long letter on the character and principles of

* Perhaps justice to the parties requires that I should give the petition entire. I shall, therefore, bring it in here. It is, besides, a document worth preserving in such a work as THE PROTESTANT. It is introduced in the Orthodox Journal for July last, by the editor, in the following manner; "We copy, with sincere satisfaction, the following petition of the dissenters of Cockermouth, in favour of civil and religious liberty."

"The humble Petition of the undersigned Protestant Dissenters, of the Independent denomination, residing in the Town and neighbourhood of the Borough of Cockermouth, "SHEWETH,—That, with confidence, relying on the justice and liberality of the British senate, your petitioners beg leave humbly to lay before your honourable house the unmerited stigma which has long been impressed on a body of subjects, whose loyalty and fidelity have yet been constantly demonstrated. That, in the imposition of civil disabilities upon account of religious opinions, your petitioners deprecate an infringement of the primary law of mental freedom; the right of each to worship God according to the unbiassed dictates of his conscience. That, considered apart from the great law of native freedom, the present restriction of the Catholic Christians is evidently injurious to the best interests of the country, by the partial exclusion of men of integrity from offices of state; and by causing dissensions and invidious distinctions between the several denominations of religious creeds in the British empire, at a time when the prevalence and triumph of deism and infidelity demand the united energies of all persuasions in the defence of truth. Nor can the limitation of religious liberty be defended on the ground of policy, since loyalty and attachment to the constitution of the land were declared, on inquiry, by the Catholic universities of Louvaine, Douay, Alcala, Salamanca, Valadolid, and the Sorbonne, to be incumbent on those who profess the communion of Rome; and the antiquated absurdity of their keeping no faith with heretics, has been positively and indignantly disavowed by the college of cardinals de propaganda, under the immediate sanction of Pope Pius VI., as well as by Catholics of the united kingdom.

"That your petitioners should consider themselves unworthy the names of Protestants and Dissenters, could the Jesuits, from which I give only the following extract, as I cannot afford room for the whole in the present Number :—

"I could wish, now that you candidly confess that you see the danger of conceding to the Papists those high places of power and trust, from which, in consequence of direful necessity, they have been excluded, that you had shown, at some length, the obviously infallible results of such concession. It is, in some measure, to remedy this inadvertency, or neglect, that I now address myself to you.

"I confess that my feelings were so shocked by the horrible story of the Inquisition seraglio, that I could not compose my mind to sleep during the whole night after I read it. It appears to me to tally so completely with the doctrine of the Jesuits, that it is lawful to destroy females that have it in their power to expose the wickedness of the priests, that I feel the fullest conviction, that these villanies have been for many ages practised, on a large scale, wherever circumstances favoured it. For, let it be observed that Loyola's rules for the Jesuits did not originate with himself, but were drawn out and compendized from the standing morality of the Popish communion. In proof of which, it is only necessary to notice the readiness and alacrity with which some outrages upon common sense and decency were at once received, and the irresistible power and efficacy with which they became established, wherever the Romish superstition prevailed."

The writer proceeds to show how Jesuitism co-operated with infidelity in originating the French Revolution; and how it is partly, if not wholly, chargeable with all the miseries that followed; for much of the philosophical infidelity with which Europe was annoyed about the middle of the last century, may be traced to the morals taught and practised by the Jesuits, and other Popish absurdities and abominations. The advocates of the Jesuits, in the present day, stoutly maintain, that they are the best supporters of thrones; and that, if the order had not been suppressed, the French Revolution would not have happened. To prove a negative is indeed a bold undertaking; but Popish writers have, in general, little to do with proof. With them assertion is enough; and I have learned, that the more strongly they assert any thing, the more ought they to be suspected of falsehood.

SATURDAY, March 10th, 1821.

In my last Number, I gave an extract of a letter relating the great activity of the Jesuits in England, their success in making proselytes to Popery, and the culpable supineness of the Protestant clergy, who are suffering their people to be deceived and ruined, without making any vigorous effort to defend the truth, and impede the progress of error. There are, however, a few honourable exceptions.

they for one moment deny to Anglicians and Romanists, that sacred liberty which they hold to be the birth-right of man, and for which our fathers suffered by the prison, the axe, and the faggot!

"That your petitioners, therefore, beg leave humbly to entreat your honourable house to take into consideration the claims of our Catholic brethren for universal emancipation, and to extend to them those rights and immunities to which they are justly entitled, as a loyal and pious portion of the British empire; and thereby to conciliate the affections of a large proportion of his Majesty's subjects, in these portentous times of political ferment.

"That while your petitioners pray your honourable house to grant that liberty to the Church of Rome which is the right of Englishmen, the distinction which severs the Protestant dissenters from the great body of the people, cannot but excite them to entreat, of your candour and bounty, the extension of civil immunities, and political honours, to all the subjects of the Crown of Great Britain, without respect to their religious opinions—since a loyal and constitutional disposition has ever been characteristic of those men, to whom the historian * attributes the preservation of that liberty, which should ever be dear to the freemen of Britain!"

There is so much in the style and manner of the above that resembles the writings of Papists, that I suspected it to be a piece of Jesuit manufacture; in which, however, I did them injustice for once; for on application, by letter, to a gentleman in Cockermouth, I had the mortification to learn that it was a bona fide petition of the persons whose designation it bears. The gentleman to whom I wrote, handed my letter to the gentleman who was the author, and had been the chief promoter of the petition; and from him I received a polite and prompt reply, acknowledging and justifying the procedure on the ground of its being a petition for "universal emancipation," not that of Catholics only. But it does not appear to have been so understood by Mr Curwen, who presented it to the House. In his letter, acknowledging receipt of it he says, "The truly Christian and enlightened sentiments your petition expresses, accord with what I have ever felt upon the subject. Mr Grattan's motion shall have my cordial support." Now, Mr Grattan's motion was not for "universal emancipation," but for that of Papists only: and suppose Papists were as harmless, and loyal, and pious, as the Independents themselves, to give them precedence and priority in admission to places of power and trust, would be making an unjust and invidious distinction, to which no one sect is entitled more than another, and certainly Papists least of all, from their well-known hostility, not merely to another faith than their own, but to the persons of those who refuse to embrace their errors, and practise their idolatries and superstitions.

Candour requires me to express my conviction, that the Independents in Cockermouth, in honest simplicity, make use of the language furnished for them by Popish writers, about the declaration and disavowal of the "Catholic universities," and of "the college of cardinals de propaganda," but if they were as well acquainted with Popery as their fathers of the 17th century were, they would use very different language; and they would, perhaps, not even desire political power for themselves, if it was to be at the dreadful risk of having Papists brought into power along with them. The wolf may tell the sheep that he has laid aside his claws and his teeth, or that he never had any; and that, therefore, they may safely break down the fence and let him into their fold; but they would be silly sheep, indeed, that would believe his fair speeches, and comply with his request.

In particular, the Editor of the "Protestant Advocate," a clergyman in Essex, has distinguished himself as a staunch defender of the Reformation. His motto is, No peace with Rome:—no compromise:—no truce with the insidious Jesuits, whose wily arts he well knows,—"arts which caused them to be expelled from all the Popish states in Europe scarcely fifty years ago," when they found an asylum in the heart of England, where they continue to this day, increasing their numbers, and extending their influence. The Protestant Advocate not only wields his own pen to great purpose; but he does what in him lies to rouse his brethren to exert themselves in the cause of Christianity against Antichrist. His efforts have not yet produced the desired effect among the established clergy in Lancashire, where their labours are most wanted; but he makes honourable mention of some dissenters in that county who have taken up the cause, and are pursuing it with vigour. A society was lately formed there for the defence of Protestant principles, which circumstance was communicated to me, first by a private letter from Preston, and afterwards by a printed circular, detailing the design and object of the society. As I think this letter will be interesting to my readers, I shall insert it here. It is inserted also in the Protestant Advocate for December last.

"PRESTON, Nov. 27th, 1820.

"SIR,—The unceasing efforts of the Romish priesthood and their adherents in this county to extend their influence, and to make proselytes of the ignorant and unwary, cannot, we presume, have altogether escaped your notice, though perhaps you may not be fully aware of the extent of the evil.

"In Preston, the proportion of the Roman Catholics is unusually great, and its proximity to the Jesuit college at Stoneyhurst, (an institution, the influence of which on the surrounding country is most powerful and pernicious) renders it more easy for the leaders of the Catholic body to PRACTISE AND PROSPER here. They already possess two large chapels, which are filled by crowded congregations, and have erected a spacious school, which, in various ways, is made subservient to the grand design of proselyting to the Church of Rome. For several years past, lectures on the distinguishing tenets of Popery, which have been attended by great numbers of Protestants of different denominations, have been delivered by one or other of their priests, thrice a week during Lent, in their principal chapel; the great object of which is to represent the Church of Rome as the only ark of salvation. Experience proves that such a representation has its influence on weak and uninformed minds.

"Very little opposition has hitherto been made to these attempts of the Roman Catholics to propagate their principles in this town and its vicinity. One vigorous effort of the late curate of our parish church appeared to have a beneficial influence. With a view to confute the errors of the Romish church, he delivered a course of lectures on Sunday evenings, which were very numerously attended, and which induced the priests to propose a truce, engaging that they would omit their usual lectures in Lent, if he would suspend his attacks on their system: and for one year these conditions were observed. The above clergyman, however, having left Preston more than three years ago, the Lent lectures have been renewed with greater zeal than ever; and as there does not appear any probability that a similar attempt will be made in the same quarter to resist these bold attacks on the Protestant religion, there seems to be a very urgent call on others to employ effective means for this purpose.

"It has therefore been thought expedient by several friends to general Protestantism, that a course of lectures in opposition to the tenets of the Roman Catholic religion should be delivered at some place of worship in this town, by able and zealous ministers from various parts of the county; to commence early in the ensuing year, and to be continued once a fortnight during three or four months. And that at the same time the very popular and useful tracts edited by Mr M'Gavin, a respectable merchant in Glasgow, under the title of 'THE PROTESTANT,' should be put into general circulation.

"It is hoped that this attempt will not be considered as entirely a LOCAL business: but that it will be generally countenanced by all zealous friends to the cause of truth throughout the county; and that beginning as it were at the centre, the impulse will be felt on all sides, and lead to similar efforts wherever they may appear to be necessary.

"Conceiving that the intelligence contained in this circular will not be uninteresting; and that so far as circumstances may admit, you will be disposed to co-operate with us,—we have taken the liberty, Sir, to address these lines to you.

"Signed on behalf of the society for the support and diffusion of Protestant principles in Preston and its vicinity,

"W. M. WALKER,
"W. HOPE, } Secretaries."

By a letter received from the Secretaries a few days ago, I have the pleasure of learning, to use their own words, that "the lectures here against Popery, as detailed in the circular we had the pleasure to hand you, are very well attended: and the tracts meet with a ready and extensive sale." I have the pleasure to learn also that these said tracts, or paper Protestants, have already excited great wrath among the Preston Papists; and certain steps have been taken, preparatory, I presume, to an attempt to put them down by force of law, seeing they cannot meet them on the ground of reason and argument: at least I cannot otherwise account for the fact, which has come to my knowledge, of two Papists, with a legal adviser, going before a magistrate in Preston, and making oath that they had bought No. I. and II. of THE PROTESTANT from the bookseller, Mrs Agnes Walker, of that town, which two Numbers they had appended to their affidavits. Perhaps, indeed, it was merely an attempt to frighten the good lady from selling the work; and the fact confirms a statement by the author of the History of the Jesuits, that "such is the influence of the Jesuits in Preston, that the Protestant booksellers are afraid to sell publicly, or expose for sale, any books against Popery; and yet there is a Popish bookseller in the town, whose windows and shop are crowded with all the poison of Popery," vol. i. page 335. This is the manner in which Papists propagate and defend their principles, while under civil disabilities: we may then form a judgment of what they would do, if possessed of power. Circumscribed as their influence is, they are able by means of it, to obstruct the exercise of free discussion, in places where they have become numerous; and should the period ever arrive when such men shall get into parliament, or even into the magistracy of such a town as Preston, it will be seen what havoc they will make of the boasted liberties of Englishmen.

With all their boasting and bluster, the Jesuits (for the name is proper to the English Papists in general,) are the greatest controversial cowards in the world. This is evident from their conduct in Preston. When they supposed there was no Protestant clergyman that would be at the pains to enter the lists with them, they boldly proclaimed the peculiarities of their system, and attacked the established religion, which they held up to the scorn of the ignorant and besotted multitudes who listened to their harangues; but whenever a Protestant clergyman took up the cause, and had begun to turn the tide of public opinion against them, they begged for quarter. They know perfectly well that argument is not a weapon for them. By bold assertion and downright lying, they will succeed for a time, where no opposition is made; but let the question be brought to the test of plain fact and of common sense, and there is not a Papist in the world who will be able to maintain his ground for five minutes.

Had the Preston Jesuits been really convinced in their own consciences that their cause was good, they would not have proposed such a truce as that mentioned in the letter above inserted; and had the curate of the parish been duly impressed with the importance of the questions at issue, he would not have consented to the truce which was proposed. No doubt the priests of Diana, and of other idols, would gladly have purchased the silence of Paul with regard to Jesus of Nazareth, at the expense of not praising their holy images while the apostle remained among them; but had such a proposal been made to him, he would have spurned it with holy indignation:—"We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard," would have been his reasoning for continuing to preach the truth, whether men would hear, or whether they would forbear. I speak this upon the supposition that the idol priests had proposed a truce to him; but what would any man think, if he were told that Paul had made such a proposal to the idol priests?—If he had said,—Cease to inculcate the worship of Jupiter and Diana, and I shall say no more about Jesus Christ, what could any man infer, but that he felt no real interest in Christ or his religion? Yet this is the very thing that our Preston Jesuits did. They will maintain, that theirs is the only true religion, and that ours is a false one; and that the one is as much opposed to the other, as the worship of Christ is to the worship of an idol: and yet they, who thus claim to be of the only true religion, voluntarily proposed to give up the public defence of it, if the professors of a false religion would give up the defence of theirs! This is the fidelity of modern Jesuits to their holy church, which is the mother and mistress of all churches! The fact, however, is a striking one, and an encouraging one to all who undertake the exposure of Popish error, idolatry, and superstition. It is an admission, and a public acknowledgment by the leading Papists themselves, that their cause cannot be defended by fair argument, that it shrinks from public discussion, and that they are content to hold their faith in secret and in silence, where there are men able and willing to expose the deformity of the system when it is obtruded upon the view of the public. I recollect, that soon after my controversy with the Papists commenced, and while it was confined to the Glasgow Chronicle, a sort of roundabout proposal was made, that if I would give it up, my opponents would do the same; but I felt no inclination to accept the proposal. I had not, like Hannibal, taken an oath of perpetual hostility to Rome; but I had by that time seen enough of her abominations to determine me to persevere in laying them open to the view of the world, that my highly favoured country might at least be warned of the danger of cherishing in her bosom the most insidious enemies of both her civil and religious privileges. And I soon found that no truce was necessary. My opponents have left me in undisputed possession of the field for a long period. Not one of them has the courage to draw a pen in defence of their holy and infallible church. Let the society in Preston persevere, and they shall have the same triumph. Let them not relax their efforts for a single day. Let them hold up to the world, by preaching and writing, the true system of Popery in its naked deformity. Let them exhibit in plain, intelligible, and forcible language, its ridiculous fooleries, its monstrous absurdities, and horrible impieties, and I venture to predict that the Jesuits, though not ashamed, for that they cannot be, will be glad to hold their peace, and wait a more favourable opportunity for putting forward their claims to public notice.

The vast wealth of the Jesuits' college in Lancashire has enabled them to extend their influence over a considerable part of the county; and from the little opposition they have met with, their impudence has become equal to their influence. "The influence of the Jesuits in the adjacent country is incredible. The Manor and surrounding district being their own, they are more or less the accredited heads of the neighbourhood; they are at once bold and indefatigable in making proselytes"—"Before the establishment of this college, there were not half a dozen Papists about Stonyhurst, but now the greater part of the population in that part of the country are Papists, to the amount of many thousands. From this Jesuits' college all the Roman Catholic chapels in that part of the kingdom (which are nearly as numerous as the Protestant churches) are filled with priests of the order of Jesuits, though they are unwilling that it should be known that they are any other than ordinary Romish priests. There are several Jesuit priests stationed in Preston, who frequently travel from thence to Ireland; and, since the last peace, they have great intercourse with France, and other parts of the continent."—

"The subtlety with which the Jesuits insinuate themselves into Protestant families of fortune is very remarkable, but quite in unison with their whole history: there is scarcely a single Protestant family of respectability which is not in a greater or less degree under the influence of the Jesuits. The bishop of the diocese himself has not escaped the vortex of their influence; and a relative of his, who is a beneficed clergyman, at no great distance from the college, is openly boasted of by the Jesuits as their patron and ally; to this list may be added some of the established clergy of Preston and its vicinity. The Jesuits rule the magistrates of that place and the Mayor himself is in their interest." History of the Jesuits, London, 1816, Vol. 1. pages 344—345.

The following will show the countenance which they receive from Protestants in Manchester, in the same county:—"On the 27th of September last, a magnificent chapel, dedicated to St Augustin, was consecrated with high mass at Manchester. After consecration there was a public dinner, when, among other toasts, were drank, 'Our Protestant friends, who have so liberally and generously contributed to the erection of St Augustin's chapel.' Then, 'The Protestant visitors who attended St Augustin's, and those who now honour us with their presence.'" And we are told that a "Mr Wm. Townend (perhaps a misprint for Townsend, in a very appropriate manner, returned thanks on behalf of himself and the other Protestants alluded to; and with the liberality worthy of a Christian whose faith is built on rational principles, gave credit to those whose mode of faith was different, though drawn from the same source. It was a gratification to him to have witnessed the sight which had occupied his attention this day, and he hoped that the difference in the modes of faith would never be a barrier to prevent Catholics and Protestants stepping forward to promote the welfare of a fellow-creature." Such it seems is the state of favour with which Papists are regarded in Manchester, that Protestants contribute to build their chapels, grace their consecration by their presence, and then honour the triumph of Popery by attending a commemorative dinner, where they receive compliments from the Jesuits for their liberality, and express the gratification which the superstitious and idolatrous consecration of a Popish chapel has afforded them. The Jesuits would no doubt affect to be greatly delighted with such an effusion of Protestant liberality as the above; but they would despise both the speech and the speaker in their hearts. They are acute enough to perceive that he is not truly a Protestant who can speak of his own faith and that of Rome as drawn from the same source, and, "built upon rational principles:" and in their own minds they would set him down as belonging to the infidel school, though they would profess to regard him as an enlightened and liberal Christian. I am far from saying or insinuating that Protestant principles are irrational, though they have neither their origin nor foundation in reason, but in divine revelation; but while Popery sets all sense and reason at defiance, and does so openly and avowedly in some of her fundamental doctrines, the Jesuits could not without gross hypocrisy acquiesce in the very liberal declaration of Mr Townsend.

While such sentiments as this gentleman avows prevail among Protestants, who would not be alarmed by the increase of Popery? Merely nominal Protestants, like Mr T. are already Papists at heart; and, as it is to be feared, the number of such is not small, in both England and Scotland, we have reason to fear that whenever it shall become necessary for every man to take a side, the Church of Rome will muster on her side the greater part, if not all those who do not particularly interest themselves in religious matters. Such persons look upon the care of their souls as a painful drudgery; and they are very willing to pay a reasonable commission to any man who will take the work off their hands, and be answerable for them. The Romish priests offer their services for this very purpose. They make themselves responsible for the salvation of every soul that confides in their spiritual powers. By their sacraments, they can regenerate, and even absolve the vilest sinners without putting them to the painful necessity of hating sin and loving holiness. Now this is such a convenient system of religion, that every unregenerate man who can prevail upon himself to believe in the power of the priests, will most heartily embrace it; and therefore as I have often said, whenever Popery shall become fashionable, and popular, the greater part of our fashionable population will fall into it.

Mr Townsend seems to have been put forward, or to have thrust himself forward, on this occasion, as the organ of Manchester Protestants; and if it be lawful to use the language of merchants on so grave a subject, I would say, if such be the sample, what must be the state and character of the stock? Mr T. speaks of the difference between his own religion and that of Papists, as only different modes of faith:—He "gave credit to those whose mode of faith was different, though drawn from the same source." It is really very difficult to speak of nonsense in a sensible manner; and therefore, I may be excused, if I shall not be able to apprehend and illustrate distinctly what the speaker means. By "modes of faith," I suppose is meant, if the phrase mean any thing, different ways of believing some truth or some falsehood. I know the phrase has been sanctioned, consecrated, if you will, by a Popish infidel:—

"For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight:—
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

But Alexander Pope's faith was not founded on the word of God; and though this celebrated aphorism of his, taken in the most favourable light, expresses a mere truism, * it is not of authority enough to impart sense to nonsense. They must be "graceless zealots" indeed who fight about "modes of faith;" that is, the manner in which they should believe, without knowing what it is that they are to believe.

Now I shall agree with our Manchester Protestants so far as to admit, that the difference between the Protestant and Popish mode of faith is not worth disputing about, unless we take into account the object of faith. If, for instance, the question be, How, or in what mode we shall believe that the Virgin Mary hears, and is able to answer the prayers of millions of worshippers;—how, or in what mode we shall believe that a divine power resides in holy images and holy relics;—how, and in what mode we shall believe that what we see to be a wafer is the God that made us;—how, and in what mode we shall believe that a fellow-creature, and one whom we know to be a sinful creature, has the power of absolving us from our sins;—how, and in what mode we shall believe in the divine efficacy of the sacraments of penance and extreme unction, so as to assure us of salvation by their means:—If, I say, the question be, What is the mode or manner of our faith with regard to these, and all such things; that is, whether we believe them with a great faith or a little faith; a believing faith, or a doubting faith, I shall cheerfully admit that the thing is of no importance whatever. All the supposable modes of faith about such objects are not worth disputing about, or of being compared with one another.

But if the question be with regard to any matter of divine revelation,—such, for instance, as the divine testimony about Jesus Christ as the only Saviour of sinners, I think there is no room for "modes of faith" in relation to it. Those to whom the truth is presented in the Bible, either believe it or they do not. If they believe it, they become Christians in the Bible sense of the word; if they do not believe it, they are not Christians; that is, they have no interest in Christ; but continue in their sins, though they may be called by his name. This is the order which Christ himself has established:—"He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him," John iii. ult. And there can be nothing more just and proper, than that one who does not believe a message of good news should derive no benefit from it, especially when his disbelief implies a malignant rejection of the good thing contained in the message. This good thing is the gospel, which is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation; and though there is no merit in the belief of it, it is the established order in the divine administration, that he who believes it shall be saved. Now we read nothing in the Bible of different modes of believing, or "modes of faith," which is the same thing. There are some strong, and some weak in the faith; but this does not imply different modes of faith, any more than a state of childhood and a state of manhood suppose different modes of existence.

* That his faith cannot be wrong whose life is in the right, is undoubtedly true, though not in the sense intended by the poet. He meant to represent a man's faith, or "mode of faith," as of little importance, provided his life were good, which he supposed it might be, whatever might be his faith, which is a great and dangerous error. For a man's life to be right requires entire submission of heart and conduct to the will of God; now this is His will that we believe on him whom he hath sent. Without this, a man's life cannot be right, however blameless or even benevolent it may appear before the world, for he is destitute of the principle from which alone obedience, acceptable to God, can proceed: but with this faith in Christ, both a man's heart and life will be right before God, and his conduct before men will make it appear that his faith is genuine.

A friend has kindly handed me the Popish book mentioned in my last. The true title of it is, "The faith of Catholics confirmed by Scripture, and attested by the Fathers of the five first centuries." The authors are Benington and Kirk, not Thake, as the word seemed to be in the manuscript.

No. CXL.

SATURDAY, MARCH 17TH, 1821.

THE impudence of the Jesuits appears in the very name which they assume. Other Orders are content to be called after the name of their respective founders, such as St Francis and St Dominic; but nothing less will please the disciples of Loyola than the name of Jesus, who was so named because he was to save his people from their sins. The system of Jesuitism is founded on falsehood, and supported in every department of it by imposition, part of which consists in giving the best names to the worst things, and thus a confraternity, established for the purpose of opposing truth and maintaining error and idolatry, acted quite in character when they called themselves "the Society of Jesus."

This society, which was formed for the express purpose of opposing the Reformation which had begun under Luther, originated with a Spaniard of the name of Ignatius Loyola. He had been a soldier, and had seen a good deal of service. He was of a romantic and enthusiastic cast of mind, and had his imagination heated by reading the lives of saints and heroes, particularly the Adventures of Amadis de Gaul, which makes such a conspicuous figure in the exploits and adventures of the far-famed Don Quixote; and the effect upon the mind of Ignatius seems to have been in reality, what it is fictitiously represented to have been in the case of the renowned Knight of La Mancha. Ignatius hesitated a long time before he could determine whether he should become a knight errant, or a saint errant; but considering at length that he was lame of one leg, from a wound which he had received in the wars, and was in consequence unable to make an upright knightly figure among ladies of quality, he resolved to abandon the path of military glory, and follow that of St Francis, and other great fathers of the church. Still however he had a hankering after the practices and the rules of knighthood, one of the most essential of which is, that he should have a lady of incomparable beauty, who should be the object of his devotions, and who should receive the glory of all his victories and triumphs. It cost Don Quixote a whole week to satisfy himself that Dulcinea del Toboso was a fit object for him; but we are not informed how long it took for Ignatius to fix his mind upon the Virgin Mary. This, however, was the result of his cogitations; for he prostrated himself one night before her image, and consecrated himself to her service, and that of her Son; vowed inviolable fidelity to her; made her his protectress, and ever after esteemed himself bound to her by all the laws of knighthood.

This solemn engagement made it imperative on him to knock any man on the head who should speak a word in disparagement of any of the real or supposed qualities of his mistress: and he had soon an opportunity of proving his fidelity; for riding on a pilgrimage to Montserrat, he fell in with a Moor, who stoutly disputed with him the immaculate conception of the blessed Virgin; and history saith, that the Moor had the better of the argument. It immediately occurred to Ignatius that he ought to kill him; but as the Moors were stout and warlike men, it perhaps occurred to Ignatius, that unless he received assistance from the Virgin or some other saint, the Moor might kill him. He rode on, expecting some revelation or impulse, but nothing of the kind was forthcoming. At last, the Moor's path separated from his; and he, receiving no revelation from above, resolved to seek one from below, namely, from the ass that walked under him; * for he laid the bridle loose upon the beast's neck, resolving within himself, that if the ass took the same path with the Moor, he should follow and kill him; and if he took the other path, he would consider it as a supernatural intimation not to shed blood at that time. Happily the ass turned away from the road the Moor had taken, and Ignatius was prevented from committing murder, or being murdered, for it has never yet been proved which of the two would have happened. The writers of his life call this a miracle; and it is indeed as good as most of the incidents which Papists call miraculous. See Extracts from his Life by Bohours, in a work entitled, The Enthusiasm of the Church of Rome, 4to, p. 29.

* I hope no Papist will accuse me of profane levity for supposing that inspiration might enter into such a saint as Ignatius from below, through the medium of his saddle; for let it be remembered, it is the only way that infallibility finds access into a Pope. It is all communicated from the chair of St Peter, when, with due solemnity, he has set himself down upon it.

My readers will probably be of opinion that such a mad enthusiast was more fit for bedlam, than for being at the head of a powerful sect that was destined to govern the greater part of the civilized world, and even to establish a great empire among the savages of South America. Ignatius at first found some difficulty in getting his order established. The Pope himself was at first unfriendly to the measure; but "Loyola removed all his scruples by an offer which it was impossible for any Pope to resist. He proposed that besides the three vows of poverty, chastity, and monastic obedience, which are common to all the monastic orders, the members of his society should take a fourth vow of obedience to the Pope, binding themselves to go whithersoever he should command for the service of religion; and without requiring any thing of the Holy See for their support. At a time when the papal authority had received such a shock by the revolt of so many nations from the Roman Church; at a time when every part of the popish system was attacked with so much violence and success, the acquisition of such a body of men, thus peculiarly devoted to the See of Rome, and whom it might set in opposition to all its enemies, was an object of the highest consequence. Paul, instantly conceiving this, confirmed the institution of the Jesuits by a bull; granted the most ample privileges to the members of the society; and appointed Loyola to be the first general of the Order. The event hath fully justified Paul's discernment in expecting such beneficial consequences to the See of Rome from this institution. In less than half a century, the society obtained establishments in every country that adhered to the Roman Catholic Church; its power and wealth increased amazingly; the number of its members became great; their character and accomplishments were still greater; and the Jesuits were celebrated by the friends, and dreaded by the enemies of the Romish faith, as the most able and enterprising order in the church.

"The constitution and laws of the society were perfected by Laynez and Aquaviva, the two generals who succeeded Loyola, men far superior to their master in abilities, and in the science of government. They framed that system of profound and artful policy which distinguishes the Order."—"From their first institution they considered the education of youth as their peculiar province; they aimed at being spiritual guides and confessors; they preached frequently in order to instruct the people; they set out as missionaries to convert unbelieving nations. The novelty of the institution, as well as the singularity of its objects, procured the Order many admirers and patrons. The governors of the society had the address to avail themselves of every circumstance in its favour, and in a short time, the number as well as the influence of its members increased wonderfully. Before the expiration of the sixteenth century, the Jesuits had obtained the chief direction of the education of youth in every Catholic country in Europe. They had become the confessors of almost all its monarchs, a function of no small importance in any reign, but under a weak prince, superior even to that of minister. They were the spiritual guides of almost every person eminent for rank or power. They possessed the highest degree of confidence and interest with the papal court, as the most able and zealous champions for its authority. The advantages which an active and enterprising body of men might derive from all these circumstances are obvious. They formed the minds of men in their youth. They retained an ascendant over them in their advanced years. They possessed at different periods the direction of the most considerable courts in Europe. They mingled in all affairs. They took part in every intrigue and revolution. The general by means of the extensive intelligence which he received could regulate the operations of the Order with the most perfect discernment, and by means of his absolute power could carry them on with the utmost vigour and effect."

"Unhappily for mankind, the vast influence which the Order of Jesuits acquired by all these different means, has been often exerted with the most pernicious effect. Such was the tendency of that discipline observed by the society in forming its members, and such the fundamental maxims in their constitution, that every Jesuit was taught to regard the interest of the Order as the capital object, to which every consideration was to be sacrificed. The spirit of attachment to their Order, the most ardent perhaps that ever influenced any body of men, is the characteristic principle of the Jesuits, and serves as a key to the genius of their policy, and to the peculiarities of their sentiments and conduct.

"As it was for the honour and advantage of the society, that its members should possess an ascendant over persons of high rank and great power, the desire of acquiring and preserving such a direction of their conduct, with greater facility, has led the Jesuits to propagate a system of relaxed and pliant morality, which accommodates itself to the passions of men, which justifies their vices, which tolerates their imperfections, and authorises almost every action that the most audacious or crafty politician would wish to perpetrate."—"They have published such tenets concerning the duty of opposing princes who were enemies of the Catholic faith, as countenanced the most atrocious crimes, and tended to dissolve all the ties which connect subjects with their rulers." Robertson's Charles V. Book VI. I refer to this elegant historian for a more particular account of the principles on which the society was founded; and the power, influence, and wealth which it acquired.

After this short sketch of the Order by a Protestant historian, it is but fair to insert what their own writers have to say in their behalf. It is admitted on all hands, that the great object of the institution of the Jesuits was the overthrow of the Reformation. The following extract from VILLERS will set this matter in its true light. I quote from a recent publication—"The History of the Jesuits," vol. i. p. 371—374.

"The sixteenth century saw LUTHER and LOYOLA arise almost at the same moment: the one in the north, the other in the south, of Europe; the latter, a Spaniard, appeared to be a natural product of the soil and spirit of the country where he was reared. A century earlier, he would probably only have founded an Order, like so many others, a fraternity of worshippers of the Virgin, to whom his devotion was particularly addressed. The religious innovations, however, which then threatened the existence of the Romish Church, gave to the enthusiasm of the pious and warlike Ignatius another direction. He conceived the idea of a sort of spiritual crusade against heresy. His scheme was eagerly adopted at Rome after some hesitation; and the design was seriously formed of converting the new society into a formidable phalanx, which might be employed against the boldest champions of the Reformation. To the reaction, therefore, excited by that event, may be ascribed the origin of the Society of Jesus. It may be satisfactory to read the words of TOLLENARIUS, in his Imago Primi Seculi Soc. Jesu, p. 19.*

"In the same year 1521, LUTHER, with consummate wickedness, openly declared war against the church:—wounded in the fortress of Pampeluna, renovated and strengthened by his accident, IGNATIUS raised the standard in defence of religion.

"LUTHER attacks the chair of St Peter with abuse and blasphemy: IGNATIUS is miraculously cured by St Peter in order to become his defender. *

"LUTHER, tempted by rage, ambition, and lust, abandons the religious life: IGNATIUS, eagerly obeying the call of God, quits the profane for the religious life.

"Luther, with the guilt of sacrilege, contracts an incestuous marriage, with a virgin of the Lord: IGNATIUS binds himself with the vow of perpetual continence.

"LUTHER despises all authority of superiors: the first precepts of IGNATIUS, full of Christian humility, are to submit and obey.

"LUTHER, like a madman, declaims against the Apostolic See: IGNATIUS every where undertakes its defence.

"LUTHER withdraws from it as many as he can: as many as he can, IGNATIUS reconciles and restores to it.

"All the devices and efforts of LUTHER are directed against it: IGNATIUS consecrates to it, by a special vow, all his own labours, and all those of his companions.

"LUTHER has stripped the sacred rites of the church of all their venerable solemnity: IGNATIUS studies to procure them reverence.

"The Sacrifice of the Mass, the Eucharist, the Virgin Mother of God, the Guardian Angels, and the Indulgences of Popes, which LUTHER attacks with so much fury, are the objects which IGNATIUS and his companions exert themselves continually to celebrate with new inventions and indefatigable industry.

"To LUTHER, that disgrace of Germany, that Epicurean Swine, that curse of Europe, that monster destructive to the whole earth, hateful to God and man, &c., God by his eternal decree has opposed IGNATIUS.

"In truth, the new society acquitted itself faithfully in the new service to which it was destined from its origin. A great number of Catholic associations and fraternities, to which the general movement of the human mind gave rise at that period, appeared and eclipsed one another without glory—like those meteors which shine for a short time in the atmosphere, and leave no trace behind them. The Society of Jesus, however, rose above the horizon, like an awful comet, which scatters terror among the nations. While it was scarcely yet established, it rendered important service to the Holy See, during the sitting of the Council of Trent, and powerfully influenced the decrees of that assembly. The ancient Orders, especially the Mendicant, conceived great envy against these new-comers, who set out with so much celebrity, and attracted all consideration and all favours. This emulation redoubled the activity of all such as were not Jesuits, and in particular of the Dominicans, who wielded in a more terrible manner than ever the sword of the Inquisition, entrusted to their hands. The Jesuits however outstripped all their rivals, acquired the unlimited favour of the Pontiffs, and an immense power through the whole Catholic world. To them, and to the Popes, missions were the same as colonies to political governments, a source of wealth and power."

* There is a little mistake here; for Ignatius was not properly cured at all. His leg was never made straight, which, as we have seen, was the reason why he despaired of making a genteel figure among ladies. Now we never read in the Bible of miraculous cures being incomplete; and we may very reasonably conclude, that the apostle Peter had no hand in the setting of this saint's leg, which was done in such an insufficient manner.

The reader will perceive that a great part of the above is a panegyric upon the Order of Jesuits and their founder; and their excellence is represented as consisting almost exclusively in the support which they have afforded to the Church and See of Rome. Every one, therefore, who believes the Church of Rome to be Antichrist, (and what Protestant does not?) must be convinced that the Jesuits are the active agents of the prince of darkness—the sworn enemies of real Christianity, and of every real follower of Christ: and it must necessarily follow, that wherever they have power and influence, these will be exercised to put down the religion of the Bible, and establish idolatry and superstition in its place. They are actually under a solemn vow to effect this by all possible means; and their efforts are the more likely to succeed, from their affected liberality, and plausible manners, and from their taking care never to divulge their real and ultimate design in any measure which they take to obtain a footing and extend their influence in Protestant countries.

No other Order in the Church of Rome increased with so much rapidity to wealth and power, or made such a figure in the world as the Jesuits. "When Loyola, in the year 1540, petitioned the Pope to authorise the institution of the Order, he had only ten disciples. But in the year 1608, sixty-eight years after the first institution, the number of Jesuits had increased to 10,581. In the year 1710, the Order possessed 24 professed houses; 59 houses of probation; 340 residences; 612 colleges; 200 missions; 150 seminaries and boarding schools; and consisted of 19,998 Jesuits." Robertson's Charles V. Book VI.

These were actually so many incendiaries sent forth to embroil the nations of the world —to set them, and to keep them fighting with one another. From being the confessors of kings, and of their mistresses, and of ministers of state, they became acquainted with the secrets of every cabinet. These were communicated to their general at Rome, who was either a tool of the Pope, or had the Pope as a tool of his; and thus he had the command of a machine by which he could influence, and often even guide the measures of every court in Europe, * except those who had renounced the Pope, and thrown off his yoke; and even some of these were more influenced by the Jesuits than the world knew at the time. Their influence in England was most pernicious, and was uninterrupted from the accession of Elizabeth to the revolution in 1688; for it was their incessant plotting against the life and government of that princess, that laid her under the necessity of having recourse to certain rigorous and arbitrary measures, which considerably diminish the respect due to her memory, and laid the foundation of those discontents which agitated the country during the reign of succeeding princes. In Elizabeth's time, it was the practice of Jesuits to assume the character of zealous Protestant preachers; and thus to insinuate themselves into the confidence of the people, that they might the more effectually practise their treasonable arts. I shall at present relate only one instance of this, which may be verified by reference to the registry of the Episcopal See of Rochester, in the book which begins, Anno 2 & 3 Phil. & Mar. and continued to the 15 Eliz. I abridge the narrative from a volume entitled, "Foxes and Fire-brands," † the title of which seems to have been intended to point out the character of the Jesuits.

In the year 1568, one Thomas Heth came to the Dean of Rochester, and pretending to be a poor minister, requested the dean's influence with the bishop for some preferment. The dean very properly desired to hear him preach before he would recommend him. Accordingly he did preach in the cathedral church; and while doing so, on pulling out his handkerchief, he pulled out also a letter which, unobserved by him, fell to the bottom of the pulpit, and was afterwards picked up by the sexton, and carried to the dean. This letter was addressed to Heth, under the name of Thomas Fine, and subscribed by Samuel Malt, a notorious English Jesuit, at that time in Madrid. The entire letter is given in the work before me, from which it appears that money had been sent along with it, to be distributed by Heth wherever he thought it might be done to advantage. The writer acknowledges having heard of his popularity as a preacher, and advises him to persevere, with certain cautions not to overdo the work; and he is encouraged by the information that three of his brethren had been sent into Germany, to sow dissension among the heretics there. This letter being shown to the bishop, he ordered Heth to be apprehended; and he was brought to an examination, in which he shuffled not a little. "After his examination," says my author, "it was resolved to send to Heth's lodgings, at the Queen's Arms in Rochester, where, upon search, in one of his boots were found his beads, and several papers, among which was a license from the fraternity of the Jesuits, and a bull dated the first of Pius Quintus, to preach what doctrine that society pleased for the dividing of Protestants, particularly naming the English Protestants by the name of heretics. In his trunk were found several books for denying baptism to infants, with several other horrid blasphemies, which being brought before the whole assembly then present, the bishop adjourned the court, appointing another day for farther investigation, till they had acquainted her Majesty and her honourable council with these passages, and sent for farther instructions how to proceed in the affair. In the meantime Heth was committed a close prisoner, and manacled, till order came from the board."

When Heth was called again into court, the bishop addressed him in a very solemn manner, pointing out the wickedness of his conduct. It appeared by the evidence of the persons with whom he had lodged, that, in order to remove suspicion of his being a Jesuit, he spake against that Order; and by his own confession, it was his practice to preach against Rome, by which he knew he would readily command a hearing; yet all this was with a view to subvert the Reformation and restore Popery. The poor man suffered the reward of his treachery by being three days exposed on the pillory at Rochester, and being subjected to other cruel indignities, which I would not wish the most wicked Jesuit of the present age to suffer. He was condemned to perpetual imprisonment; but he died in the course of a few months. Here I cannot forbear quoting the concluding part of the bishop's address to the court, on the conviction of this Jesuit, as the words seem not inapplicable to our own times. "Therefore, my brethren, consider the condition of your souls. If you start aside once from your principles, having the right way so plainly set before you, you will not only run into Popish slavery again, but be in peril of a total confusion of soul and body; and if Rome get once her foot upon these dominions again, not only yourselves and your children, but your princes and nobles shall become slaves to her idolatry."

No. CXLI.

SATURDAY, March 24th, 1821.

My last Number gave a short sketch of the rise, progress, character, and power of the Jesuits. I might go a great deal more into detail in these matters; but this is the less necessary, seeing a work has lately been published, which affords the most ample information on the subject. It is entitled, "A History of the Jesuits: to which is prefixed, a Reply to Mr Dallas' Defence of that Order," in two volumes, London, 1816. Who Mr Dallas is, I do not know, but from the extracts of his work, which are given in the reply, I suppose he is himself a Jesuit. He does, in a most Jesuitical manner, slur over every thing that militates against the character of the society, and endeavours to make them appear the most meritorious body that ever was in the world. The task which he undertook was sufficiently arduous, and one in which no ordinary man could be expected to succeed; and Mr Dallas himself found it impossible to succeed in it, without applying a spunge to almost all that has been written for two hundred and fifty years on the ecclesiastical, and even the civil affairs of Europe, except what was written by the Jesuits, and their admirers. This is one of the ways in which Papists endeavour to screen themselves from the scorn and contempt of the world. They deny every historical fact recorded by Protestant historians that bears the least reflection upon their Church; and though the names of fifty witnesses were adduced, all must go for nothing, because they are enemies of the "Catholic faith." This, in the opinion of the Jesuits, disqualifies any man from giving a true or credible testimony; and thus, by denying the truth of all history, except what it suits himself to admit, Mr Dallas finds the Jesuits a most meritorious, and much injured body of men.

I come now to relate the story of the decline and fall of this powerful body, together with their recent restoration by the present Pope, and before I have done with them, I may give a sketch of their morals from their Secreta Monita. "Though the power of the Jesuits had become so extensive, and though their interests generally prospered during a period of more than two centuries, their progress was by no means uninterrupted; and by their own misconduct, they soon excited the most formidable counteractions. Scarcely had they effected their establishment in France, in defiance of the parliaments and universities, when their existence was endangered by the fanaticism of their own members. John Chastel, one of their pupils, made an attempt upon the life of Henry IV.; and father Guiscard, another of the Order, was convicted of composing writings favourable to regicide."

"Their power was brought to a very low ebb, when the war of 1756 broke out, which occasioned the famous law-suit that led to their final overthrow. By that time the society had indicated many symptoms of decay, both in point of talents and activity, and had rendered themselves at once contemptible and odious. They had disgusted the court by their scruples, irritated the philosophers by their clamours, exasperated the other religious orders by their persecutions, and alienated the public by their long and insolent domination. A reasonable pretext was all that was wanted to put down a sect, which had long ceased to be either popular or formidable. The opportunity was soon furnished by their own imprudent obstinacy. The war recently commenced, had occasioned great losses in their trade with Martinico, (for the Jesuits were merchants upon a very great scale) the weight of which would have fallen in part upon the society's correspondents at Lyons and Marseilles. The merchants, however, alleged that the Jesuits in France were responsible for the debts of their missionaries in America, and insisted upon being indemnified from the funds of the Order. The claim was resisted and a law-suit commenced, which the Jesuits, by virtue of their privilege, removed from the provincial parliament to the great chamber at Paris. This measure rendered the dispute, and their defeat, subjects of more general notoriety. They were condemned to pay large sums to the adverse party, and prohibited thenceforth from meddling in commercial concerns. The sources of their wealth were thus diminished, and their enemies encouraged to renewed attacks. The questions at issue in the commercial dispute, had given the magistrates a plausible occasion for demanding to inspect the constitutions of the society; and in a luckless hour for themselves, they consented to produce their books. The parliament instantly saw, and seized the advantage which they had gained, and resolved to effect the destruction of the Order."

"In March 1762, the French court received intelligence of the capture of Martinico by the British; and dreading the storm of public indignation, resolved to divert the exasperated feelings of the nation, by yielding the Jesuits to their impending fate."—I must confess that this itself was very like a Jesuitical trick. It would have been more honourable for the French government to have condemned the Jesuits upon the ground of their own demerits, than to have made them a sacrifice to appease popular clamour; but this is a point which Papists may settle among themselves. "On the 6th of August, 1762, their (the Jesuits') institute was condemned by the parliament, as contrary to the laws of the state, to the obedience due to the sovereign, and to the welfare of the kingdom. The Order was dissolved, and their effects alienated. But still the members, though no longer dressed in their religious habit, continued to hover about the court; and, had they preserved their original cautious and prudent policy, might have succeeded in recovering their privileges. But former successes inspired them with a fatal confidence. One of the archbishops, indignant that the parliament should presume to dispense with ecclesiastical vows, issued a mandate in favour of the Jesuits; and the fathers were accused of having employed themselves too industriously in the circulation of this paper. The parliament took the alarm, and pronounced a decree, that every Jesuit, whether professor or novice, should, within eight days, make oath that he renounced the institution, or quit the kingdom. In a body whose moral principles were so relaxed, and whose members, while it existed, scrupled no subtleties in promoting its interests, it is a remarkable circumstance, that, as secularized individuals, they acted in this instance with strict integrity, and refused the alternative of the oath. They were, therefore, ordered to quit the kingdom, and this judgment was executed with the utmost rigour. The poor, the aged, the sick, were included in the general proscription. But in certain quarters where the provincial parliaments had not decided against them, Jesuits still subsisted; and a royal edict was afterwards promulgated, which formally abolished the society in France, but permitted its members to reside within the kingdom with certain restrictions.

"In Spain, where they conceived their establishment to be perfectly secure, they experienced an overthrow equally complete, and more unexpected." "The example of the king of Spain was immediately followed by Ferdinand VI. of Naples, and soon after by the princes of Parma. They had been expelled from England in 1604; from Venice in 1606; and from Portugal in 1759, upon the charge of having instigated the families of Tavora and D'Aveiro to assassinate king Joseph I. Frederick the Great of Prussia was the only monarch who showed a disposition to afford them protection; but in 1773, the Order was entirely suppressed by Pope Clement XIV. who is supposed to have fallen a victim to their vengeance. It was long a current story at Rome, that this Pontiff was accustomed to withdraw in the course of the grand mass to take some refreshment; and that a young priest, on one of these occasions, brought chocolate to his holiness, and immediately withdrew; that the proper officiating priest soon after appeared with another cup, the Pope shook his head, as conscious of having received a fatal potion; that he pined from that day of lingering disease which reduced his body to the appearance of a skeleton; and that he was known to have said, in allusion to the secret cause of his death, 'I am going to eternity, and I know for what!'"—Edin. Ency. Art. Jesuits.

"The history of the Jesuits, from the period of their suppression to their revival by the present Pope, lies within a very narrow compass. That they have by any means ceased to exist as individuals, although they have done so as a body, will hardly have been imagined for a moment, even by those who possess the fewest means of information on the subject.

They have still survived, in obscurity—the ghosts of their departed greatness—in reduced numbers—with diminished resources, and an exhausted credit; hating, indeed, to look back upon their former flourishing condition, but not without hope that, so long as Popery should maintain her footing in the world, and especially, if ever she should resume any considerable portion of her ancient power, they could not fail to be recognized by all who were not thoroughly acquainted with their history, as the most vigilant and active friends of the Church of Rome. The event has shown that they have not been disappointed. In spite of all the quarrels of that Church with the Jesuits; in spite of the mutual struggle for pre-eminence which has been ever maintained between them; their agency is still too important to be overlooked or despised by that mystical woman of the Apocalypse, who has her seat upon the seven mountains. There is still too much in common between the two systems: their corruptions are too nearly allied, and their interests too closely interwoven, to render it a matter of small import whether the Jesuits shall be again invoked by Papal Rome as her auxiliaries, or not: the influence of light in the world is too strong—the diffusion of the Bible has become too general—and the increase of true religion, in consequence, is too certain to permit a church which loves darkness rather than light, to neglect all the means which lie within her reach, to establish and perpetuate her own system of ignorance and error, by those friends and agents, whose interests are in the main identified with her own.

"The present Pope could not be ignorant that the same causes which led to the formation of the society, were at this moment in active operation throughout the world, and therefore appeared to require the application of the same remedy. 'The Order of Jesuits,' says Villers, 'the most important of all the Orders, was placed in opposition to the Reformation, and it acquired a preponderance proportioned to the enormous mass which it was intended to counterbalance.' It is with reference to the same great object of opposing the Reformation, that the present Pope has declared that he should 'deem himself guilty of a great crime towards God, if, amidst the dangers of the Christian Republic,' (in other words, the cause of Popery), 'he should neglect to employ the aids which the special providence of God had put in his power, and, if placed in the bark of St Peter, and tossed by continual storms, he should refuse to employ the vigorous and experienced Rowers who volunteer their services!!!' It is in vain that the advocates of his holiness will contend that he desired the aid of the Jesuits against infidelity; for where is the danger to be apprehended from infidelity now? It is against the Protestant Church and cause that the Jesuits, those 'experienced Rowers,' have now embarked afresh, and it is chiefly with reference to their assistance in making head against the vessel of the Reformation that the Pope has availed himself of their services."—Hist. Jesuits, vol. ii. p. 395.

It is not difficult to perceive that the Pope, by the restoration of the Order of Jesuits, meant no favour to those Protestant powers, particularly Great Britain, who had been the chief instrument of his preservation, in the days of his humiliation, under the iron yoke of Buonaparte. It belongs to the nature of Popery not to feel grateful for favours received from heretics. The fact is, there is nothing that heretics can confer upon Papists that will be considered as a favour. Papists consider themselves the lords of the soil wherever they have at any time had an establishment; and whatever service Protestants may render them, it is never considered as a favour, but as a debt which was justly due. Thus for all the kindness which was exercised in making provision for Romish priests in this country, on the breaking out of the French Revolution, when they were banished from their homes, we have been requited by an establishment of Jesuits in the heart of the country; and, as if this were not enough, his holiness issues a Bull restoring the Order, which in every country in Europe, had been suppressed as an insufferable nuisance, to all their former powers and privileges, that they may promote Popery in England, and wherever else they may obtain a footing. The Pope will say that this is for the good of those countries, and of England in particular, and thus he may acquit himself of the charge of ingratitude; but persons who understand the subject will consider the affected benevolence of his holiness, as resembling the good will of a wolf, who has a great affection for a flock of sheep.

The Pope says he would think himself guilty of a crime if he were not to enlist, in the service of the Church, those "experienced Rowers, who volunteer their services;"—that is, who offer themselves voluntarily, to go into all the world, particularly into Britain and Ireland, to endeavour to overturn the Protestant religion, which is the same thing as true Christianity, and to establish, instead of it, the abominable superstition and idolatry of Rome. This is the object of these "experienced Rowers." The society was originally formed for the express purpose of putting down the Reformation; and its restoration, after being dormant for half a century, is for the purpose of extirpating what remains of real Christianity in Protestant countries.

Much as England was annoyed by the Jesuits, in the reign of Elizabeth, and for nearly a century thereafter, the impression of the evil is almost effaced from our minds. We have seen little of the Order with our own eyes, and we have felt little of their impertinent interference in our personal and domestic affairs; and therefore, we are apt to think lightly of them, as no more dangerous to our peace and comfort than those ideal beings the Brownies and Fairies, of whom we used to read and hear wonderful stories in our childhood. But persons who live nearer the seat of their power, and who have perhaps personal recollections of what they were in the days of their glory, feel more acutely on the subject of their restoration. This appears from the following fact, which I give from the Orthodox Journal, for October 1818, the editor of which is the avowed panegyrist of the Jesuits:—

"The most gratifying information we have to communicate this month to our readers, and to every friend of religion and virtue, is the restoration of the learned and eminent society of Jesuits in the canton of Friburg, in Switzerland, which example Soleure is expected to follow. The particulars of this pleasing intelligence will be found in the annexed article, extracted from the foreign papers." Then follow the particulars, relating to the establishment, privileges, and provision which the canton makes for the society: after which we have the following information:—"The Paris papers of the 18th instant, state, that 'the discontent at Friburg was so great, in consequence of the resolution of the great council for restoring the Jesuits, that several of the inhabitants are preparing to abandon the country, and to emigrate to America.'" The alarm excited in the minds of these honest Friburgers was perfectly natural, considering the well-known character of the men who were to obtain a legal establishment among them, with many great privileges, and much wealth, which would be employed to bring every family and every individual into bondage; but the Orthodox editor, who seems to be a Jesuit himself, treats their fears in the following taunting and unfeeling manner. "Surely there must be something tremendously hideous and terrifying in the visage and character of a Jesuit, that these Friburgers prefer abandoning their relatives and country rather than behold the countenance of one of these monsters." Surely, I say, it is so, there is something tremendously hideous, not in the countenance, but in the character of "these monsters" of deceit, and this is not the less terrifying that it does not appear in the countenance, but lies hid in the heart, which is full of rancour and hatred of the truth, and of those who profess it; and will show itself in active hostility, whenever there is a favourable opportunity.

But, says Mr Andrews, "to what part of America these Jesuit haters mean to brush, the French journalists have not informed us. If they go to the United States, they will verify the old proverb, 'out of the frying-pan into the fire;' since there is not a state, we believe, out of the whole thirteen, in which the Jesuits are restricted from exercising their extraordinary and useful abilities. The American government, soaring above that narrow and grovelling passion which rules the enemies of the Jesuits, have granted to their college of Georgetown, in Maryland, all the privileges of a University; a favour highly creditable to the bestowed, and honourable to the bestowers." Thus it seems the Jesuits are spreading over the face of the earth like locusts; and wherever they shall make a lodgement, they will have a most deadly influence on all that is vital and sound in Christianity.

The editor of the Orthodox Journal is evidently the advocate and organ of the Jesuits in England; and since I have a volume of his work before me, I shall give a quotation which lets us into the secret of the manner in which the Jesuits satisfy their consciences that they may lawfully take the oath of supremacy; that is, swear that the king is head of the Church of England. The words are those of a correspondent; but the editor gives them without animadversion, from which we may infer that the sentiments are his own, and those of the body whose cause he advocates:—

"Our hopes in the last Parliament, (that of 1819) are entirely blasted; but we ought not, therefore, wholly to despair, but make one noble effort yet, by the next session. In order to render our endeavours the more hopeful, let us be as condescending as possible, and conscience will in any wise allow. You seem afraid, had Lord Grey's motion succeeded, that some of our great ones might, without scruple, acknowledge the supremacy. But why not within the proper sphere? What harm can be therein? Our kings have always, since Harry's days, claimed it; their Church all along owned it in them, and I think we have no reason or motive to dispute it; for it is entirely a matter of indifference to us who is head of that Church, or whether it have any such or not. Harry himself, much less his successors, never pretended supremacy in the Catholic Church diffused over the world."—"The bishops of Rome have alone claimed invariably this supremacy over the whole immense Catholic body, and their title has been most authentically owned and confirmed in all ages," (which is a most impudent falsehood.) "As to his (the king's) being head of his own English church, no Christian or Jew can dispute: and, therefore, we ought most readily to allow that supremacy to all its extent. It is only his grace of Canterbury that has any colour or pretence to dispute the matter with the monarch, but for us we have none. When the happy day comes that will unite our kings and subjects to the church and faith of his and their pious ancestors, then will we salute him as one of the first sons of that church, and hail him with the glorious title of its true defender, a grander title, in my opinion, than any conferred by Rome on any other monarch, because owning him the supporter of the Christian, Catholic, faithful, and Apostolic Church over the whole world. And who could better discharge that high commission, than he who can send forth at his pleasure invincible English fleets, brave Scottish Highlanders, and valiant Irish hearts of oak, to defend the holy faith over all the globe? Let us, in the meantime, condescend in every thing we can, and thus form a political union, which is all that can be expected, or rationally wished for."—Orth. Jour. Sept. 1819.

This writer tells plainly what are the hopes and anticipations of all the Papists in the empire, though they do not all think it expedient to speak so plainly out. He expects that the king of Great Britain and Ireland, and all the people, shall be reconciled to Rome. Our happy and free constitution shall then be subverted, and our sovereign converted into an absolute monarch, for he shall then dispose of our fleets and armies "at his pleasure;" and he shall send them forth "to defend the holy faith all over the globe;" that is, to fight the battles of the Pope, and compel all men, at the point of the bayonet and the mouth of the cannon, to submit to the holy See. There will be no need of a parliament then, to give counsel and grant supplies, for the pleasure of the sovereign will be enough to raise money, as well as to direct its expenditure. A council of Jesuits will be placed round the throne; and every thing shall be done according to the good pleasure of the Pope and his college de propaganda. If the subject were not too serious for ridicule, I would say it is truly ludicrous to hear men talk of securing the Established Churches of England and Scotland, and in the same breath to propose to admit into power over them, men who, like the Jesuits, avowedly live for no other object but to promote the cause of the Pope, and to procure the establishment of the Church of Rome upon the ruins of all other churches and states in the world.

No. CXLII.

SATURDAY, MARCH 24TH, 1821.

SINCE the publication of my 139th Number, I have received a letter from Preston, which has a just claim to early insertion, though it should break for a moment the connection of my subject. In the circular letter of the society, lately formed there, there is a sentence which led me to infer that the curate of the parish had consented to the truce proposed by the Popish priests; and supposing this to be a fact, I made some remarks which bear more heavily upon that reverend gentleman than the case seems to have warranted. I am indebted to Messrs Walker and Hope for the following correction of that mistake:—

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PROTESTANT.

Preston, March 12th, 1821.

SIR,—In your Number of March 10th, you have reflected on the conduct of the late curate of this parish, as if he had made a kind of unholy league with the enemies of the Protestant faith. And as a passage in our letter seems to have occasioned your remarks, we wish you to correct this idea. That gentleman had sufficient reasons for suspending his lectures, but he never made peace with Rome. In the extract which you have made from the history of the Jesuits, published in London, in 1816, their influence as it respects the magistrates and clergy of Preston, even at that period, is, we believe, much over-rated; and at the present time we are happy to say, that we have reason to regard our magistrates as impartial men, and the established clergy as proof against the wily art of Jesuitism. We remain, Sir, Yours, &c.

W. M. WALKER.
WM. HOPE.

It always gives me pain to think that I have mistaken or misrepresented any man, or body of men; but the pain in the present instance is more than counterbalanced by the pleasure of being informed, upon good authority, that matters are not so bad as I supposed.

I proceed now to give a view of the moral system of the Jesuits, from their own SECRETA MONITA. The reader will find an account of this work, and how it came into the hands of Protestants at p. 141. The Jesuits of the present day will disavow it, though it does not contain one rule which the society has not been known to put in practice, when they had the means and the opportunity. The first chapter regards the manner in which they are to conduct themselves when they begin any new foundation, which contains no small portion of Jesuitism. The following is the second, and some other chapters entire:—

Chap. II.—In what manner the Society must deport, that they may work themselves into, and after that preserve a familiarity with princes, noblemen, and persons of the greatest distinction.

1. Princes and persons of distinction every where must by all means be so managed, that we may have their ear, and that will secure their hearts; by which way of proceeding, all persons will become our creatures, and no one will dare to give the society the least disquiet or opposition.

2. That ecclesiastical persons gain a great footing in the favour of princes and noblemen, by winking at their vices, and putting a favourable construction on whatever they do amiss, experience convinces; and this we may observe in their contracting of marriages with their near relations and kindred, or the like. It must be our business to encourage such, whose inclination lies this way, by leading them up in hopes, that through our assistance they may easily obtain a dispensation from the Pope; and no doubt he'll readily grant it, if proper reasons be urged, parallel cases produced, and opinions quoted which countenance such actions, when the common good of mankind, and the greater advancement of God's glory (which are the only end and design of the society,) are pretended to be the sole motives of them.

3. The same must be observed, when the prince happens to engage in any enterprise, which is not equally approved by all his nobility; for in such cases he must be egged on and excited; whilst they, on the other hand, must be dissuaded from opposing him, and advised to acquiesce in all his proposals. But this must be done only in generals, always avoiding particulars, lest on the ill success of the affair, the miscarriage be thrown upon the society. And should ever the action be called in question, care must be taken to have instructions always ready, plainly forbidding it; and these also must be backed by the authority of some senior members, who being wholly ignorant of the matter, must attest upon oath, that such groundless insinuations are a malicious and base imputation on the society.

4. It will also very much further us in gaining the favour of princes, if our members artfully worm themselves, by the interest of others, into honourable embassies to foreign courts in their behalf; but especially to the Pope and great monarchs; for by such opportunities they will be in a capacity both to recommend themselves and their society. To this end, therefore, let none but thorough zealots for our interest, and persons well versed in the schemes and institutions of the society, be ever pitched upon for such purposes.

5. Above all, due care must be taken to curry favour with the minions and domestics of princes and noblemen; whom by small presents, and many offices of piety, we may so far bias, as by means of them to get a faithful intelligence of the bent of their master's humours and inclinations; thus will the society be better qualified to chime in with all their tempers.

6. How much the society has benefited from their engagements in marriage treaties, the houses of Austria, Bourbon, Poland, and other kingdoms, are experimental evidences. Wherefore, let such matches be with prudence picked out, whose parents are our friends, and firmly attached to our interests.

7. Princesses and ladies of quality are easily to be gained by the influence of the women of their bed-chamber; for which reason, we must by all means pay a particular respect to these, for hereby there will be no secrets in the family but what we shall have fully disclosed to us.

8. In directing the consciences of great men, it must be observed, that our confessors are to follow the opinion of those who allow the greater latitude, in opposition to that of other religious orders; that, their penitents being allured with the prospect of such freedom, may readily relinquish them, and wholly depend upon our direction and counsel.

9. Princes, prelates, and all others who are capable of being signally serviceable to our order, must be favoured so far as to be made partakers of all the merits of the society, after a proper information of the high importance of so great a privilege.

10. Let these notions be cautiously, and with cunning instilled into the people, that this society is intrusted with a far greater power of absolving, even in the nicest cases; of dispensing with fasts, with paying and demanding of debts, with impediments of matrimony, and other common matters, than any other religious order; which insinuations will be of such consequence, that many of necessity must have recourse to us, and thereby lay themselves under the strictest obligations.

11. It will be very proper to give invitations to such to attend our sermons and fellowships, to hear our orations and declamations, as also to compliment them with verses and theses; to address them in a genteel and complaisant manner, and at proper opportunities to give them some handsome entertainments.

12. Let proper opportunities be used to get knowledge of the animosities that arise among great men, that we may have a finger in reconciling their differences; for by this means, we shall gradually become acquainted with their friends and secret affairs, and of necessity engage one of the parties in our interests.

13. But should discovery happen to be made, that any person serves either king or prince, who is not well affected towards our society, no stone must be left unturned by our members, or (which is more proper) some other to induce him by promises, favours, and preferments, (which must be procured for him under the king or prince,) to entertain a friendship for, and familiarity with us.

14. Let all be very cautious of recommending or preferring such as have been any way dismissed from our society, but especially those who of their own accord have departed from it; for let them disguise it ever so cunningly, nevertheless they always retain an implacable hatred against our order.

15. Finally, Let all, with such artfulness, gain the ascendant over princes, noblemen, and the magistrates of every place, that they may be ready, at our beck, even to sacrifice their nearest relations, and most intimate friends, when we say it is for our interest and advantage.

Chap. III.—How the society must behave themselves towards those who are at the helm of affairs, and others who, although they be not rich, are notwithstanding in a capacity of being otherwise serviceable.

1. All that has been before mentioned, may in a great measure be applied to these; and we must also be industrious to procure their favour against every one that opposes us.

2. Their authority and wisdom must be courted, for obtaining several offices to be discharged by us; we must also make a handle of their advice with respect to the contempt of riches; though at the same time, if their secrecy and faith may be depended on, we may privately make use of their names in amassing temporal goods for the benefit of the society.

3. They must also be employed in calming the minds of the meaner sort of people, and in wheedling the aversions of the populace into an affection for our society.

4. As to bishops, prelates, and other superior ecclesiastics, they must be importuned for such things only as shall appear necessary; and even for these, with a proper regard to the diversity of our evasions, and the tendency of their inclinations to serve us.

5. In some places it will be sufficient if we can prevail with the prelates and curates, to cause those under them only to bear a reverence to our Order, and that they themselves will be no hinderance to us in the exercise of our ministry. In others, where the clergy are more predominant, as in Germany, Poland, &c. they must be addressed with the profoundest respect, that by their and the prince's authority, monasteries, parishes, priories, patronages, foundations of masses, and religious places may be drawn into our clutches; and this is no hard matter to be obtained, in those places where Catholics are intermixed with heretics and schismatics. And for the better effecting of this, it will be of great importance to remonstrate to these prelates the prodigious advantage and merit there will be in changes of this sort, which can hardly be expected from priests, seculars, and monks. But should they be prevailed upon, their zeal must then be rewarded with public commendations, and the memory of the action transmitted in writing to latest posterity.

6. In prosecution of the same end, we must engage such prelates to make use of us both for confessors and counsellors; and if they at any time aim at higher preferment from the see of Rome, their pretensions must be backed with such strong interest of our friends in every place, as we shall be almost sure not to meet with a disappointment.

7. Due care must be also taken by such of our members who have intercourse with bishops and princes, that the society, when these found either colleges, or parochial churches, may always have the power of presenting vicars for the cure of souls; and that the superintendent of the place for the time being be appointed curate, to the end we may grasp the whole government of the church; and its parishioners by that means become such vassals to us, that we can ask nothing of them that they will dare to deny us.

8. Wherever the governors of academies hamper our designs, or the Catholics or Heretics oppose us in our foundations, we must endeavour by the prelates to secure the principal pulpits; for by this means, the society at least may sometime or other have an opportunity of remonstrating their wants and laying open their necessities.

9. The prelates of the church, above all others, must be mightily caressed when the affair of canonization of any of our members is upon the foot; and at such a time, letters by all means must be procured from princes and noblemen, by whose interest the matter may be promoted at the court of Rome.

10. If ever it happen that prelates or noblemen are employed in embassies, all caution must be taken to prevent them from using any religious Order that opposes ours, lest their disaffection to us should be infused into their masters, and they propagate it in the provinces and cities where we reside. And if ever ambassadors of this kind pass through provinces or cities, where we have colleges, let them be received with all due marks of honour and esteem, and as handsomely entertained as religious decency can possibly admit of.

Chap. IV.—The chief things to be recommended to preachers, and confessors of noblemen.

1. Let the members of our society direct princes and great men in such a manner, that they may seem to have nothing else in view but the promotion of God's glory; and advise them to no other austerity of conscience but what they themselves are willing to comply with; for their aim must not, immediately, but by degrees and insensibly, be directed towards political and secular dominion.

2. We must, therefore, often inculcate into them, that honours and preferments in the state should always be conferred according to the rules of justice; that God is very much offended at princes when they any wise derogate from this principle, and are hurried away by the impulse of their passions. In the next place, our members must with gravity protest, and in a solemn manner affirm that the administration of public affairs is what they with reluctance interfere in; and that the duty of their office obliges them often to speak such truths as they would otherwise omit. When this point is once gained, care must be taken to lay before them the several virtues persons should be furnished with, who are to be admitted to public employs; not forgetting slyly to recommend to them such as are sincere friends to our Order; but this must be done in such a manner, as not immediately to come from us (unless the princes enjoin it), for it may be effected with a far better grace by such as are their favourites and familiars.

3. Wherefore, let the confessors and preachers belonging to our Order, be informed by our friends of persons proper for every office, and above all, of such as are our benefactors; whose names let them always carefully keep by them, that when proper opportunities occur, they may be palmed upon princes by the dexterity of our members, or their agents.

4. Let the confessors and preachers always remember, with complaisance and a winning address, to sooth princes, and never give them the least offence in their sermons or private conversations; to dispossess their minds of all imaginary doubts and fears, and exhort them principally to faith, hope, and political justice.

5. Let them seldom or never accept of small presents for their own private use, but rather recommend the common necessities of the province or college. At home let chambers plainly furnished content them; and let them not appear in showy dresses, but be ready at every turn to administer their ghostly advice to the meanest person about the place; lest they give others occasion to believe they are willing to be helpful to none but the great.

6. Immediately upon the death of any person in post, let them take timely care to get some friend of our society preferred in his room; but this must be cloaked with such cunning and management, as to avoid giving the least suspicion of our intending to usurp the prince's authority; for this reason (as has been already said) we ourselves must not appear in it, but make a handle of the artifice of some faithful friends for effecting our designs, whose power may screen them from the envy which otherwise might fall heavier upon the society.

Chap. V. Prescribes the conduct that must be observed towards such religious persons as are employed in the same ecclesiastical functions with the Jesuits. Chapters VI. and VII. relate to the management of rich widows; how to keep them from marrying again; and how to secure their wealth to the society. For the substance of these two chapters, see THE PROTESTANT, page 141. As it is not my intention to give the whole system but only a selection of passages, I pass on to Chap. VIII.—How widows' children are to be treated, that they may embrace religion, or a devoted life.

1. As it will behove the widows to act with resolution, so must we proceed with gentleness on this occasion. Let the mothers be instructed to use their children harshly, even from their cradles, by plying them with reproofs and frequent chastisements, &c. And when their daughters are near grown up to discretion, let them then especially be denied the common dress and ornaments of their sex; at all times offering up prayers to God, that he would inspire them with a desire of entering into a religious order, and promising them very plentiful portions, on condition they would become nuns: let them lay before them the many inconveniences attending every one in a married state, and those in particular which they themselves have found by woful experience; often lamenting the great misfortune of their younger years, in not having preferred a single life. And lastly, let them persist to use them in this manner, that their daughters may think of a religious state, being tired of leading such a life with their mothers.

2. Let our members converse familiarly with their sons, and if they seem fit for our turn, introduce them occasionally into the college, and let every thing be shown with the best face, to invite them to enter themselves of the Order; as the gardens, vineyards, country seats, and villas, where those of our society pass an agreeable life: let them be informed of our travels into several parts of the world, of our familiarity with princes, and whatever else may be agreeable to youth; let them see the outward neatness of our refectories and chambers, the agreeable intercourse we have one with another, the easiness of our rules, which yet has the promise of the glory of God: and lastly, the pre-eminence of our Order above all others; not forgeting, amidst our discourses of piety, to entertain them also with pleasing diverting stories.

3. Let us now and then (as if by divine inspiration) exhort them to religion in general; and then carefully insinuate the perfection and conveniences of our institution above others; and take care to set in a due light, both in public exhortations and private discourses, how heinous a crime it is to resist the immediate call of God; and lastly, let them be soothed to the performance of spiritual exercises, to determine them in the choice of such a state of life.

4. We must also take care to provide for these youths, tutors that are firmly attached to our interest, who must keep a strict eye over them, and continually exhort them to such a course of life; but should they seem reluctant, abridge them of some of their former liberties, that by such restraint they may become conformable. Let their mothers set forth the difficulties which the family labour under; and, if, after all, they cannot be brought of their own accord to desire admission into our society, send them to distant colleges belonging to the Order, under the notion of keeping them closer to their studies; and from their mothers let them receive little countenance, but let our members make use of the most alluring behaviour, that their affections may be brought over to us.

I have not room for another chapter. The tenor of the 9th is, get money, and enrich the society by all possible means; particularly, by inducing persons to bequeath property to them; and by inveigling the heirs and expectants of large estates to join the Order, and become Jesuits, that thereby the estates may fall into the society. I am tired of copying so much disgusting matter as the reader will find in this Number; and I am afraid he will be tired of reading it. It would require about two entire Numbers more to give the whole system; but it is all so like what I have given, that I do not think it necessary to extract much more. I shall introduce my next with a few general remarks on the subject.

No. CXLIII.

SATURDAY, April 7th, 1821.

In my last Number, I gave a specimen of Secreta Monita Societatis Jesu, "The secret Instructions of the Jesuits." These secret instructions were not communicated to all the members of the society, but only to persons who had been well tried, and in whom the utmost confidence might be placed. The society had other rules, not so exceptionable, which were put into the hands of her ordinary members; and it was provided, that if ever the "secret instructions," or any part of them, should be divulged to the enemies of the society, or to the world at large, they should be solemnly disclaimed, and denied to be the rules of the society; and those novices who had not been entrusted with the secret, were to be called upon to declare upon oath, that they had never seen such rules, and to produce those which had been put into their hands as the only rules to which they had been required to conform.

To persons unacquainted with the history and character of the Jesuits, the secret instructions will perhaps appear no more than a piece of irony, like Dean Swift's advice to servants, and Dr Wotherspoon's Ecclesiastical Characteristics; and, indeed, I have a suspicion that both these authors must have been acquainted with Secreta Monita, and that they formed their respective works according to the model which it furnished. They, however, were only in jest, while Lainez and Aquaviva were in earnest. The infidelity of many servants, in the view of the one, and the defection of certain ministers in the Church of Scotland from the faith and evangelical practice of their ancestors, in the view of the others, occasioned those exquisite pieces of irony which I have mentioned. But the Secreta Monita stands upon higher ground. There is no jesting in it. It is a system of legislation, devised with consummate skill, with a deep knowledge of human nature, calculated and intended to enlist the passions of men and women in the service of that superstitious and idolatrous power that has so long held the human mind in bondage, wherever his authority has been recognised. Besides, the history of Europe, from the time of the institution of the Order, till its suppression, shows that these rules were diligently acted upon. The Jesuits insinuated themselves into the palaces of princes, into the cabinets of ministers of state, and into the families of men of all ranks: and by their sacrament of confession they had access to the heart of every man and woman, from kings and queens down to their butlers and chambermaids; insomuch that nothing of a civil or domestic nature could be carried into effect without their knowing it beforehand, and being able either to frustrate or further it, as it might appear to them to affect the interests of their own Order, or of the Church of Rome at large. When the king of Syria found his movements anticipated, and his plans frustrated once and again by the intelligence which Elisha, by divine inspiration, conveyed to the king of Israel, it is said, "the heart of the king of Syria was sore troubled for this thing, and he called his servants, and said unto them, Will ye not show me which of us is for the king of Israel? And one of his servants said, None, my lord, O king; but Elisha the prophet that is in Israel, telleth the king of Israel the words that thou speakest in thy bed-chamber;" 2 Kings vi. 11, 12. Without inspiration, the Jesuits, by means of confession, have been able to do things almost as wonderful, and they have thereby "sore troubled" the heart of many a king and prime minister. According to the first rule of chapter second, princes and persons of distinction every where, were to be so managed, that the Jesuits should have their ear, and that would easily secure their hearts; by which means all persons would become their creatures, and no one would dare to give the society any opposition. This was, in effect, taking the government of the world into their own hands. They became spies, not only of men's actions and words, but also of their thoughts and designs, which they communicated to their general at Rome, and which he communicated to his agents wherever he thought the interest of Rome, or an ally of Rome, might be promoted. And thus what was merely passing in the mind of the king of France might have been made known to the king of Spain, before the former had proposed it to his own servants.

The Jesuits carried on their work with so much cunning and address, that they got the ascendency over great kings before the latter were aware of it; and kings finding that they were unable to extricate themselves, had no alternative but to submit. They thought it better to flatter the Jesuits than to fight them; and thus Henry IV. of France, notwithstanding their attempts against his life, took them into favour, expecting to find in their gratitude that security which the whole strength of his empire could not afford. He was disappointed, and he fell a sacrifice to his own simplicity: and no better can be expected of any one who shall place confidence in a fraternity so notoriously treacherous, and so unfeeling with regard to every thing that does not affect their own Order.

The following is a short specimen of their intrigues in our own country. After the Reformation had been carried a considerable length in the minority of King James VI., it was in danger of being overthrown by the artifice of the Duke of Lennox, a Papist, and a creature of the French court, who had acquired undue ascendency over the young king. Through his influence matters were beginning to assume a new appearance; and both the national liberties and the Protestant religion were in the utmost peril. "This change on the court could not fail to alarm the ministers of the church, who had received satisfactory information of the project that was on foot. Their apprehensions were confirmed by the arrival of several Jesuits and seminary priests from abroad, and by the open revolt of some who had hitherto professed the Protestant faith. They accordingly warned their hearers of the danger they apprehended, and pointed at the favourite as an emissary of the house of Guise and of Rome. Lennox, after holding a conference with some of the ministers, declared himself a convert to the Protestant doctrine, and publicly renounced the Popish religion. The jealousy of the nation was revived and inflamed by the interception of letters from Rome, granting a dispensation to the Roman Catholics to profess the Protestant tenets for a time, provided they preserved an inward attachment to the ancient faith, and embraced every opportunity of advancing it in secret. This discovery was the immediate occasion of that memorable transaction, the swearing of the national covenant."—M'Crie's Life of Melville, vol. i. p. 262.

Passing over their more public delinquencies, I shall advert shortly to the unspeakable misery which the Jesuits, according to their own rules, inflict upon private families. One of the first things which they endeavour to accomplish in a family, is to corrupt the servants, and gain them over to their interest. If they cannot be so gained, something against them must be insinuated into the minds of their mistresses, that they may be dismissed; then the Jesuit confessor has a parcel of his own creatures ready to be recommended to fill their places, who, of course, become his spies, and inform him of all that they see and hear in the family. Confession gives a Jesuit the complete command of every family, and binds every individual in it to do just what he is pleased to dictate.—See Secreta Monita, chap. vi.

But what is still worse than the corrupting of servants, and retaining them as their spies in every family, the Jesuits teach mothers, especially those who are widows, to make the lives of their daughters miserable, in order that they may become religious; that is, become nuns, and throw themselves into the arms of the holy fathers, in the hope of finding that happiness which they cannot find at home. The mothers themselves have scarcely a choice in this matter. They must do as their ghostly confessors bid them, else they shall be subjected to such penances as will make their own lives miserable. Thus a worse than Egyptian bondage is inflicted on all who submit to the insidious interference and influence of the society of Jesus.

The fiend-like cruelty of the Jesuits is no less manifest in the measures which they take for entrapping young men into the service of their Order. In the 8th rule of the 9th chapter, relating to the children of rich parents, we have the following directions:—"If they have sons who are fit for our turn, let them be allured to us, and the others, (that is, the daughters) be enticed by the promise of small rewards, to enter themselves of different Orders. But should there be an only son, let no means be omitted for the bringing him over to the society, and freeing him from all fear of his parents; let him be persuaded it is a call from above; and shown how acceptable a sacrifice it would be to God, should he desert his parents without their knowledge or consent; if this be effected, let him enter his novitiate in a remote college, having first given information to the general. But if they happen to have both sons and daughters, let the daughters be first disposed of in a nunnery; and afterwards let the sons be drawn into the society, when they are got into possession of their sisters' effects."

It was the practice of the society to allure young men of genteel appearance, and superior genius, into their Order. They accomplished this by showing them what a happy life the members of the society led. Notwithstanding their vow of poverty, they were wallowing in wealth, and enjoying all the luxuries which wealth could procure. Besides, they were not very strict in restraining the vices of youth. Theirs was what has been called "easy virtue." They would allow the most ample indulgence to youthful passions, provided a decent appearance was preserved, but especially provided the young men would implicitly submit to the rules of the Order, and become the devoted slaves of the Pope. Thousands were allured by these means; and from the circumstance of selecting young men of superior genius and appearance, the Order of Jesuits came to rise above all that had been instituted before it.

But miserable was the case of every young man who had been induced to profess himself of the Order, even in its lowest degrees, who afterwards repented of the step he had taken, and wished to return to his friends; and miserable was also the case of him, who, upon trial, was found too simple and honest; or not acute enough to serve the purposes of the society. Such persons were dismissed; and all the Jesuits in the kingdom where they resided were instructed to discountenance them; and to whisper about, either that they had been detected in crimes, or had divulged such things of themselves in confession, that it was not consistent with the interest and reputation of the society to retain them. Thus a mark was set upon them, which would remain to the last day of their lives; and they became an excommunicated cast, not for any fault in them, but because they were not villains enough to be Jesuits.

"Since those that are dismissed (says Secreta Monita, chap. xi.) do frequently very much prejudice the society, by divulging such secrets as they have been privy to; their attempts must, therefore, be obviated in the following manner. Let them be prevailed upon, before they are dismissed, to give it under their hands, and swear, that they never will directly or indirectly, either write or speak any thing to the disadvantage of the Order; and let the superiors keep upon record, the evil inclinations, failings, and vices, which they, according to the custom of the society, for the discharge of their consciences formerly confessed: this, if ever they give us occasion, may be produced by the society, to the nobility and prelates, as a very good handle to prevent their promotion.

"Let it be immediately published through all our colleges, that such and such are dismissed; and let the general causes of their expulsion (such as an unmortified mind, disobedience, disaffection to spiritual exercises, an obstinate adherence to their own opinion, &c.) be highly aggravated. In the next place, let all be advised to keep no correspondence with them upon any account whatsoever. And if strangers should happen to make any mention of them, let all our members unanimously affirm, in every public place, that the society expels none without weighty causes, spewing out, as the sea, all its dead carcasses, &c.; and let such causes also be artfully insinuated, which have occasioned us any ill-will, that their ejectment may appear to the world with a more commendable grace. In private exhortations, at people's houses, let these be represented as persons very turbulent, and continually importuning a readmission into the society. And let their sad fate be industriously aggravated, who, after exclusion, have happened to come to an untimely or miserable end." Again, "Let the society, by all manner of obligations, endeavour to prevail upon the noblemen and prelates, with whom the dismissed may have any credit or authority, to deny them their countenance; and let it be shown that the common good of an Order, which is as famous as it is useful to the church, should always be preferred to the private advantage of any particular person whatsoever."

Thus, if a young man has once consented to put his neck under the Jesuits' yoke, there is no possibility of his ever obtaining deliverance in this world. He will be deprived of all the privileges and honours of the society when they are pleased to expel him, or when he is pleased to leave them; but he shall not be able to withdraw himself from the sphere of their malignant influence. He shall be the object of unceasing and unrelenting persecution; and every man who shall seem disposed to befriend him, will have his ear filled with stories to his prejudice, so that he shall be left to perish in misery and contempt; and then the Jesuits will triumph in his death as the judgment of God against him, and hold up his case as a warning to all others. It would be less cruel, and if possible less diabolical, if they would murder in cold blood those young men whom they find upon trial unfit for their purpose, than thus to torture them to death by their malignant calumnies.

Every attempt of a Jesuit to make himself familiar to Protestants ought to be repelled at the very first. The approaches of the Order are like the temptations of sin; at first promising and flattering; and not presenting any thing very evil or very dangerous; but when they have obtained the smallest compliance, they effect a lodgement in the soul, and obtain a command over the body, from which human power cannot grant deliverance. The first chapter of "Secreta Monita" begins thus:—"It will be of great importance, for the rendering our members agreeable to the inhabitants of a place where they design their settlement, to set forth the end of the society, in the manner prescribed by our statutes, which lay down, that the society ought as diligently to seek occasions of doing good to others as to themselves; wherefore, let them with humanity discharge the meanest offices in the hospitals, frequently visit the sick, the poor, and the prisoners, and readily and indifferently take the confession of all, that the novelty of such uncommon and diffusive charity, may excite in the principal inhabitants an admiration of our conduct, and forcibly draw them into an affection for us."

The reader will perceive the "cloven foot" at the conclusion of this rule, but it is still more apparent in the 5th and 7th of the same chapter. "At their first settlement, let our members be cautious of purchasing lands: but if they happen to buy such as are well situated, let this be done in the name of some faithful and trusty friend. And that our poverty may have the more colourable gloss of reality, let the purchases adjacent to the places wherein our colleges are founded, be assigned by the provincial to colleges at a distance; by which means, it will be impossible that princes and magistrates can ever attain a certain knowledge of what our revenues amount to."—"Let the greatest sums be always extorted from widows, by frequent remonstrances of our extreme necessities."

By the apparent humility and charity above recommended, the Jesuits deceive the simple, and work their way into the good opinion of many respectable Protestants. Nay, though gold be one of their chief idols, they will sometimes be at a little expense to commend themselves and their religion to persons in office, or those connected with them. One of the Order who had recently settled in a certain town, went one day to a gentleman, and presenting him with half-a-crown told him, it was his property. On being asked how that happened? he received for answer, "Ask no questions, I am the Catholic priest; this money is yours, and it is my duty to restore it to you." It was of course to be inferred that he had discovered by confession, that a servant had defrauded his master to that amount; and as might have been expected the circumstance left upon the gentleman's mind a favourable impression of both the priest and his religion. Happily the love of money prevented the trick from being practised to any great extent; else for a few pounds the priest might have purchased the good opinion of all the chief men of the place. That it was a mere trick I am convinced from the rarity of the thing, in a place where Papists are known to form a very large proportion of the thieves. If the priests were able and willing to enforce the duty of restitution, we should hear of instances every day; but the fact is, after all the attention I have paid to the character and the conduct of Popish priests, I have heard of only two instances besides the one above related:—One was an offer of twenty pence to a gentleman in such terms as the above, which, however, he declined accepting, and desired the priest to give it to the poor. Sometime after, the same priest brought him ten shillings, which no doubt alarmed him with regard to the character of his servants, and not knowing the extent to which they might be robbing him, he took the money, which, it is supposed, was a disappointment to the priest, for he came to him no more.

I shall conclude this subject with the "Oath of Secrecy devised by the Roman clergy, as it remaineth on record at Paris, among the Society of Jesus." It is inserted in "Foxes and Firebrands," from a collection of papers by Archbishop Usher.

THE OATH OF SECRECY.

I, A. B. now in the presence of Almighty God, the blessed Virgin Mary, the blessed Michael, the Archangel, the blessed St John Baptist, the Holy Apostles St Peter and St Paul, and the Saints and Sacred Host of heaven, and to you my ghostly father, do declare from my heart, without mental reservation, that his holiness Pope Urban is Christ's vicar-general, and is the true and only head of the Catholic or Universal Church throughout the earth; and that by the virtue of the keys of binding and loosing given to his holiness by my Saviour Jesus Christ, he hath power to depose heretical kings, princes, states, commonwealths, and governments, all being illegal, without his sacred confirmation, and that they may safely be destroyed: therefore to the utmost of my power I shall and will defend this doctrine, and his holiness' rights and customs against all usurpers of the heretical (or Protestant) authority whatsoever: especially against the now pretended authority and Church of England, and all adherents, in regard that they and she be usurpal and heretical, opposing the sacred mother-church of Rome. I do renounce and disown any allegiance as due to any heretical king, prince, or state, named Protestants, or obedience to any of their inferior magistrates or officers. I do further declare, that the doctrine of the Church of England, of the Calvinists, Huguenots, and of other of the name Protestants, to be damnable, and they themselves are damned, and to be damned, that will not forsake the same. I do further declare, that I will help, assist, and advise all, or any of his holiness' agents in any place, wherever I shall be, in England, Scotland, and Ireland, or in any other territory or kingdom, I shall come to; and do my utmost to extirpate the heretical Protestants' doctrine, and to destroy all their pretended powers regal or otherwise. I do further promise and declare, that notwithstanding I am dispensed with to assume any religion heretical for the propagating of the mother-church's interest, to keep secret and private all her agents' counsels from time to time, as they intrust me, and not to divulge directly or indirectly, by word, writing, or circumstance, whatsoever; but to execute all what shall be proposed, given in charge, or discovered unto me, by you my ghostly father, or by any of this sacred convent. All which I, A. B. do swear by the blessed Trinity, and blessed Sacrament, which I now am to receive, to perform, and on my part to keep inviolably: and do call all the heavenly and glorious host of heaven to witness these my real intentions, to keep this my oath. In testimony hereof,

I take this most holy and blessed sacrament of the Eucharist; and witness the same further with my hand and seal in the face of this holy convent this day of An. Dom. &c.

No. CXLIV.

SATURDAY, April 14th, 1821.

Having finished what I had to say about the Jesuits, I shall take the opportunity of a pause or break in the thread of my discussion, to say a few words to some correspondents, who wish to know if I intend at this time to take up the subject of what is called "Catholic emancipation." My friends will be satisfied when I inform them, that it is not lawful in such a work as mine to discuss matters pending in parliament, or indeed any topic of a purely political nature. The late Act relating to cheap periodical publications, lays me under the necessity of keeping within the circle which I prescribed to myself at first; that of exposing the errors of Popery as a religious system, and of showing how these errors tend to the ruin of the souls and bodies of individuals, and to the great injury of civil society, when men holding them have power in their hands.

To such of my readers as have access to the Morning Post London Newspaper, I strongly recommend a series of letters under the signature of Philopatris, as perfectly conclusive and unanswerable on the subject of my correspondents' inquiry. I think the author would render essential service to his country by publishing them in a cheap form, that they might be extensively circulated. In the Morning Post, there is also in course of publication a series of letters addressed to Mr Wilberforce, well worthy of attention. And in the number of that Paper for the 30th of last month, there is a powerful letter by the Reverend Sir Harcourt Lees, Bart. a gentleman who has written more against Popery within the last eighteen months, than almost all his brethren together. I have been informed that his exertions have had a powerful effect in convincing the Protestants in Ireland of the very great danger to their own safety, that will result from the admission of Papists to authority over them, and even some of the priests have felt the power of his pen; one young gentleman, in particular, who was preparing for orders, has abandoned his purpose, and avowed in a letter to Sir H. which is printed in The Religious Retrospect, attached to the Antijacobin Review, for Nov. last, that he has convinced him of the errors of Popery. One thing is certain, we hear nothing now of Irish Protestants petitioning to have their enemies set over them, which was common enough of late years; and the change is said to be owing in a great measure to this gentleman's labours.

I have of late received a good deal of information from Ireland, with respect to the practices of Papists in that kingdom. One gentleman writes me as follows:

"Sir,—I concluded my former Letter * with an affecting, but well-authenticated account of one of the numberless instances of those stratagems resorted to by priests and Papists in Ireland, for the purpose of supporting the tottering fabric of Popery; and it is astonishing what effect the pretended conversions of Protestants have upon the minds of that community. Many objects are hereby gained by its votaries: the estimation of that religion, which, as they pretend so many Protestants embrace, is enhanced, and considered the exclusive one; and it cuts off the inquiring or the wavering from any idea of examining into the principles of the reformed religion, which they are assured by their priests, will not bear the test of a death-bed; and thereby giving them an unlimited ascendency over the purses and consciences of their flocks. To gain these desirable objects, every engine is set to work, and every device practised. Of many take the following:

"The priests call at the houses of the better description of sick Protestants, in country places, apparently to inquire after their health. This has all the appearance of good nature; but their real object is to make their flocks believe that they have been sent for by the sick; and as the wisdom of our forefathers, knowing the proselyting system of Popery, enacted a law, enforced by penalty, to prevent Roman Catholic priests from visiting sick or dying Protestants, unless sent for by a Protestant messenger over the age of 16 years; the priest says that the circumstance must be kept secret, but that the sick person has died in the Catholic faith (as they call their profession.) A case of this nature lately occurred in my neighbourhood, when it was asserted by a priest, that a Protestant clergyman on his death-bed had sent for him, and had changed his religion. The priest being charged with this report, refused to give any satisfaction, until two Protestant attendants proved upon oath, that the priest only called to inquire after the man's health, and never opened his lips on the subject of religion. Indeed, this practice is so general in country towns and country places, that contrary to the acknowledged hospitality of the Irish, the writer has known of many instances where directions were given, not to admit a priest inside the doors if he should call. Nurse-tenders also are instructed to countenance these practices by admitting the priest at night into the house, and if possible to the sick. In a case of this kind which came under my own observation, a Roman Catholic gentleman of my acquaintance, and a relative of a Protestant lady who was sick, was so indignant, that he declared that he himself should be the first to prosecute the priest, if he persisted to persevere in such unworthy schemes of clandestine interference.

"A Protestant, a man in comfortable circumstances, had married a Roman Catholic (a custom too prevalent in Ireland, and encouraged by the priests); the sons went to church, the daughter to mass. The writer has been assured by the sons themselves, that they were obliged to watch their dying father, to prevent the introduction of a priest which the man detested; and when every attempt made by the daughter proved abortive to prevail on the dying man to have a priest sent for, she left him in a rage, to die and be damned! One of the fraternity having spitefully assured him, that unless he sent for the priest, he should not be buried near his wife, (who was dead,) the dying man mildly replied, 'The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof.'

"The Roman Catholics, Sir, complain of persecution on account of their religion; but is it not a most grievous persecution which they thus carry on by every means at present in their power against the poor dying Protestants? Surely a tyrant would allow his dying enemy to die in peace; but this privilege is not allowed to many Protestants who detest Popery. What, Sir, may we expect from men of like principles with increased power? Or what may be expected from a people where Popery is predominant? No longer should we find them privately plotting the advancement of their religion by persuasives, or even by threats of future punishment—we should again see present and temporal, not future and spiritual punishment applied—we should again see Smithfield in a blaze.

"I have frequently charged some of the better description of Roman Catholics with believing that the priest has power to forgive sin; but this they have denied, although they allowed that the poor and ignorant of their profession thought so, but they acknowledged that they believed that the priest had power to forgive the sins of a dying person being confessed and anointed; this they call being prepared; which still brings us to the same conclusion, that they are made to believe that it rests with the priest whether any person shall go to heaven or to hell. Indeed, that this is the opinion of Roman Catholics is most evident; because they will not allow a Roman Catholic, at least, to be buried in consecrated ground in country places who has not been prepared by the priest. Many instances could be adduced of their coffins being thrown by night out of their graves, and even over the walls. Their enmity, instigated by their priests, is particularly excited against the bodies of those Roman Catholics who had renounced Popery, to deter the living from following their example. In cases of this nature, Protestant clergymen have been prevented from reading the burial service, and more than once knocked down.

"The last ceremony to be performed by the priest to the dying after confession and the sacrament, is the application of what they call the consecrated oil to particular parts of the body; after which the person is not on any account to speak one word, otherwise the entire ceremony must be gone through again; in this stage the person is said to be prepared.

"A man formerly in my employment, of dissipated morals, having been considered in a dying state, the priest was sent for, who a short time after informed me, that he had prepared him. He also told the persons about the sick man, that he was now as free from sin as the child new born; and that he would soon as certainly be in heaven. Unfortunately for the priest's prediction, the man recovered, but has not since evidenced the least change for the better in his religious or moral conduct.

"Whatever pretended sanctity may be thought to reside in the use of this holy oil, as well as in other Popish ceremonies of even higher supposed sanctity, I am convinced that many of the better informed Roman Catholics, as well as many of the priests, are not so well satisfied with their efficacy as to place unlimited confidence in them: in general you will find that Roman Catholics of liberal education, look with indifference upon those things so highly valued by the commonalty. I have heard several express perfect indifference, bordering upon contempt, in speaking of them, and I shall hereafter show that some of the priests themselves are of the same way of thinking, whatever they may pretend to the contrary.

"We are told that a drowning man will grasp at a straw, and it is thus that many Roman Catholics, convinced that all is not right in the sight of God, laying hold on the promises and performances of the priest, go down to the grave with a lie in their right hand; but if perchance, these straws of Popery are not thought sufficient to bear up the mind of the dying Papist, to believe that he can safely depend upon them, and he requires some legitimate proofs of their efficiency; the priest will either not condescend to give him any, or refer him to the legends of the saints and the infallibility of the church.

"A young gentleman, a Roman Catholic of my acquaintance, while studying physic, was attacked by a pulmonary complaint, which brought on consumption. His attendance at chapel while in health was very regular, and he passed for a moral and religious young man. As his complaint gained ground, it became necessary for him to examine the grounds of his dependence for future happiness or misery, and he then found that his attendance at chapel was merely from habit, not conviction;

he feared to trust to the mere ceremonial of a religion, which he saw had more of show than substance in it; I found him, on visiting, in a state of great unhappiness of mind, and on asking him whether his priests could not give him any ease? he said, 'Ah no! they are extremely ignorant, they indeed promise great things, but they cannot convince my judgment; they cannot support their promises by any legitimate proofs, that they are well founded;' he then begged I would give him my opinion on this subject. In fact, I found that this young gentleman had, in consequence of seeing through the tinsel ceremonies of Popery and the conduct of the priests, become an infidel. He first doubted the system of Popery to be the way of salvation held out to guilty man, and from thence he declined by a natural gradation into a disbelief of all revealed religion. Under these circumstances I saw it was necessary first to convince him from the Bible, that there was a religion revealed, and next to open or reveal the way of salvation as contained in that revelation. On requesting to see a Bible, (though the family were considered highly respectable,) they assured me they never had such a thing! and on inquiring whether one of their Bibles could not be procured, they told me they did not know, but perhaps the priest might have one. I did not however send. Sufficient for me here to observe, that by arguments drawn from the prophets, this young gentleman was convinced that they all wrote of Christ, and therefore, that they must have been divinely inspired; consequently that Jesus was the great sacrifice for sin, and the only intercessor for guilty man, when applied by the Holy Spirit and received as the gift of God, by faith.

"The wisdom of our forefathers having a more experimental knowledge of the intolerant spirit of Popery, had fenced the vine of the Reformation by guards and fences, to prevent the wild beast in the Apocalypse from breaking down the hedges and devouring its tender branches. A law had been enacted to prevent the public processions of the Host, and of the images of saints in these kingdoms: this was not only a just enactment to suppress an open display of idolatry, but also a wise measure to defend his Majesty's loyal subjects from insults and injuries to their persons. However, of late years, the Papists have revived these processions in Ireland, and we have now a yearly display of the ceremony of bearing the Host in public procession with all the glitter and paraphernalia of a sumptuous canopy, with gorgeous plumes and incense; priests, nuns, friars, monks, all in their costumes; and every thing else that is calculated to arrest the attention of admiring crowds and prostrate devotees: it is true that these ceremonies are, at present, carried round the chapel yards; but in country places, many of these yards are not enclosed, and border the public roads; so that the traveller or curious stranger is in danger of being insulted or knocked down, unless he take off his hat in obeisance to the idol. I have known several instances of insults offered, and injuries sustained on these occasions, by Protestants, who justly conceived that taking off the hat was an act of adoration, and I have also known many Protestants, to their shame I speak it, who, to gratify an idol curiosity, have conformed to the dictates of these devotees, by thus worshipping the idol which they had set up. The Papists take particular notice of Protestants who attend to see these ceremonies, and they are instructed to believe that such are favourably inclined to Popery in their hearts. We may soon therefore expect that, with an extension of Roman Catholic privileges, their circuits of procession will be extended also through our streets and cities, when every person who shall not prostrate himself to the Host, will be laid prostrate by the club of a fanatic. I am not now stating a theory or an idle fancy, I have my eye on some countries in Europe, where Popery is predominant, and where the statements I have made have really occurred.

"On these days of procession, the parish priest invites the assistant priests and his acquaintances to a sumptuous entertainment prepared at his house. The writer, some years ago, dined with them more than once on these days, and he can bear testimony, that every rarity to gratify the palate had been provided, even from a distance of several miles round; with the best wines that could be procured. One of these days falling upon a Friday, which is called a fast day, he has counted eleven different kinds of the best fish dressed in every possible way, with pies, puddings, peaches, grapes, &c. &c. A curious incident occurred on one of these occasions: the company having assembled in the priest's drawing room, were coming down a dark staircase to dinner; when one of the priests pinched the writer, (who being dressed in black he mistook for a priest,) and whispered, that this was the best procession, to which I answered, 'I thought so too.' My intelligent neighbonr finding his mistake, pushed through the crowd to conceal himself.

"I said that many of the priests do not believe the efficacy imputed by them to many things counted holy. Surely the above anecdote speaks a volume in confirmation of this assertion, and as I myself was the person, there can be no mistake in it. Now, Sir, if one of the highest, if not the highest mystery, as I believe they call these things, can be so disrespectfully spoken of by a priest, what must they think of those other mysteries counted less sacred. If it be said that this was the language or opinion of an individual priest, I admit it; but surely we must draw a fair deduction from the thing itself, that he would be afraid to speak in this way, if he did not know that other priests held these things in the same contempt. Why, therefore, it may be asked, do the priests countenance and support such rites and ceremonies? The answer is obvious, they are a means for keeping the people satisfied with a religion which presents them with such finery and shows, and of bringing a good deal of money into the priests' coffers. The late Sir Richard Musgrave, Bart. who wrote a history of the last Irish Rebellion, assured me, that he has frequently seen priests take the wafers from their pixes, (boxes to hold what they call the consecrated wafer or Host) and seal their letters with them. If they believe in transubstantiation, they must believe that each wafer contains, nay, is the real body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, and nothing but the greatest scepticism to their avowed or professed opinions, could induce them to apply this consecrated Host to such profane uses.

"To such a system of religion and to their priests, may we not by application address the following quotation from Acts xix. 24 to 28 inclusive:—'For a certain man, named Demetrius, a silver-smith, which made silver shrines for Diana, brought no small gain unto the craftsmen; whom he called together with the workmen of like occupation, and said, Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth: moreover, ye see and hear, that not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, this Paul hath persuaded and turned away much people, saying that they be no gods which are made with hands; so that not only this our craft is in danger to be set at nought; but also that the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised, and her magnificence should be destroyed, whom all Asia and the world worshippeth. And when they heard these sayings, they were full of wrath, and cried out, saying, Great is Diana of the Ephesians.' "J. A."

The following is from the same writer:—

"Sir—The Scriptures say there is but one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus; no, says the Papist, there are many more: there is the Virgin, and the Virgin's reputed mother in chief; and there are a host of inferior intercessors in the saints, whose stock of merit, beyond their own wants, forms an inexhaustible fund, to draw on to supply the want of it in the Church; and indeed, if we could suppose such a stock of merit belonging to the saints to exist, it must be inexhaustible, if it were not expended long since. Papists very wisely fearing the capability of this reservoir to hold out, are daily adding to it by other means. In many parishes in Ireland, there are one or more old men or women, (if old maids so much the better,) whose pretensions to sanctity stand very high in the estimation of their more ignorant neighbours, and as it is believed that they daily repeat more rosaries than are required for their own salvation, they are supposed to have a pretty large stock of this article to spare, which they are at liberty to barter to the most advantage with their less industrious neighbours for things of more immediate consumption. I have known an old maid of this celebrity, draw so largely on her grocer in this way, by way of barter, that he was obliged at last to close his account with her. The merit of these persons' prayers is considered to be so highly valued in heaven, by many of the ignorant Papists, that they think it would be a kind of injustice to refuse their petitions; consequently, they are frequently employed to pray for the recovery of the sick, or for success in any business, and if the event should prove propitious, these saints claim with the merit, a correspondent gratuity.

"I understand, that by some regulation of the Vatican, no persons can be now sainted by the Pope, until a century after their decease, and unless some well-attested miracle can be adduced to prove their claim to such high pre-eminence; this prevents the scandal which would otherwise attach itself to the appointment of persons to this high favour, before old time has sunk their frailties and their vices into oblivion; but as the friends of a reputed saint cannot get them an immediate appointment on the Pope's list, they perform their part in providing the necessary credentials, by the attestation of some miracles performed by the candidate saints to entitle their names to be placed on the Pope's Cadet list for future preferment. So much sanctity was said to reside in a parish priest who died a few years ago in my neighbourhood, (of whom it was industriously circulated, that several miraculous cures were wrought,) that at least 10,000 persons daily for a month frequented his grave; and as fast as the clay could be thrown upon his coffin, it was sold out in bits to the eager multitudes, until all their wants were supplied."

I find I have not room here for the sequel of this letter, but I may find room for it in a future Number. Every account which I receive from Ireland, confirms what I have endeavoured to prove, that Popery continues in that country to exhibit all the grossness of the dark ages, of which I hope to adduce more evidence before I have done.

No. CXLV.

SATURDAY, APRIL 21ST, 1821.

HAVING procured a copy of Berington and Kirk's work, as noticed at the conclusion of my 139th Number, it will be expected, after what I said of it, that I should inform my readers what sort of a work it is; and, indeed, it is by no means so formidable as I was led to expect from the account which I had got of it. I judged from its title that it would be easy to refute it, but this I find was not correctly given by the writer whose account of it I inserted in Number 138. It should have been, "The faith of Catholics confirmed by Scripture and attested by the fathers of the five first centuries of the church." My opponents however gain nothing by the correction: for this title is every whit as objectionable as the incorrect one. The meaning of the word confirm, according to Johnson, is, 1. "To put past doubt by a new evidence—2. To settle; to establish—3. To fix; to radicate—4. To complete; to perfect—5. To strengthen by new solemnities or ties." The first is most applicable to the case in hand;—"to put past doubt by a new evidence." This supposes that "the faith of Catholics" is originally derived from some other source than the Bible; and that the Bible is no better than a corroborating witness relating to something which they know without it, and independently of it. This inference is perfectly legitimate; but the authors have very candidly given me the advantage of an explicit avowal, that they conceive the Scriptures "to be of no use, as an independent rule of faith, for this plain reason: That as all the truths which we believe to be divine, and which are the objects of our faith, came immediately from Christ, and were taught by the apostles, before those Scriptures (of the N. T.) were written—we are not at liberty to think that those truths would not have remained, to the end of the world, pure and unadulterated, had that primitive state of things continued: that is, had it never seemed good to any of those apostolic men, as it did to St Luke, to commit to writing what they had learned." Intro. p. xiv. Again: "Hence we lay it down as an introductory and certain principle; that all that, and that only, is of Catholic faith, which God has revealed, AND the church proposes to our belief.—'The Catholic Christian,' observes the learned bishop of Meaux, 'forms not his faith by reading the Scriptures; his faith is already formed before he begins to read; reading serves only to confirm what he before believed; that is, to confirm the doctrine which the church had delivered to him.'" Ibid. p. xxi.

Thus it is plainly avowed by modern Papists, that the Bible is with them of no authority by itself. I consider the simple statement of this fact enough for my present purpose; and I hope it will satisfy every one who really believes and understands his Bible, that Papists are not Christians, and that they cannot be reasoned with as such. The primary, or more properly speaking, the only foundation of their faith is the testimony of the church: and what is this church? it is the Pope of Rome with his army of priests—nothing else. It is a body of men, who, for hundreds of years, have been notorious for all the vices by which men can possibly degrade themselves. What is called Church History groans under the load of filth and abomination which attaches to the character of the head of this church; namely, the Pope of Rome; and like the head have been the members. To deny this would be to set aside the evidence of all history; and no man will deny it, who is not prepared, if occasion require, to call good evil, and evil good. It is needless to tell me that the present Pope is a sober man, and that many of the priests of the present age are men of decent and sober lives. The light of the Reformation has forced them into this state in spite of the demoralizing tendency of their system; but Berington and Kirk, and all genuine Papists, believe that the doctrine of Christ has descended to them uncorrupted through all the Popes and priests of the dark ages, though they were men whose mouth was an open sepulchre, under whose tongue was the poison of asps, and in whose ways were destruction and misery.

I beg leave to ask our Glasgow Papists, if they would consider the profligate inmates of the stews in the most depraved and polluted lanes of our city, as infallible judges and teachers of what is pure in morals, and amiable in domestic life? If they say they would not, then I say, they ought not to receive the testimony or teaching of their clergy with regard to Christianity, which is a system of perfect holiness. It is not possible that such men could teach it in sincerity; for though bad men may sometimes be found to speak sound doctrine where the contrary would be detected and condemned, men so profligate and abandoned as the Popish priests generally were before the Reformation, and under no restraint from men better informed than themselves, would feel compelled to teach corrupt doctrine as an apology for their impure lives.

I know that it will be replied, that the promise of Christ to be with the apostles and their successors to the end of the world, secures the clergy against teaching false doctrine, whatever their lives may be; that having received holy orders, they are, ex officio, infallible; and therefore are not to be put upon a footing with the heroes and heroines of our Saltmarket, who, though they be equally innocent, have not received the unction which the priests have received, and by which they are incapable of error. In reply, it is enough to tell Papists that this is a mere fancy of their own, without the shadow of countenance from any thing that Christ and his apostles taught. The apostles themselves had no security against falling into error; but that which was connected with their personally abiding in Christ. It is admitted that they had extraordinary gifts as men divinely inspired; and therefore they were miraculously preserved from falling into error, either in preaching or writing. This cannot be said of the ordinary ministers of the church who lived after them; and they have therefore no right to call themselves successors of the apostles, seeing they do not possess those endowments which were imparted to inspired men, and to none else. But even apostles would not have been credible teachers of Christianity, or preachers of the gospel, if their own lives had not exhibited the influence of the gospel in some measure of purity, and obedience to the law of God. Christ told them plainly, John xv. 2—8, that in order to their fruitfulness, it was necessary that they should abide with him, and he in them. Ye are clean (says he) through the word which I have spoken unto you; that is, they were holy persons; they were born of the incorruptible seed of the word; and it was necessary that they should continue holy, and in personal union with Him who is the fountain of holiness, and the pattern of it, otherwise they would remain unfruitful, not only in their personal state and character, but also as labourers in the Lord's vineyard. I do not say that the word of God may not be spoken by men who are not savingly united to Christ, or that God in sovereignty may not bless his own word spoken by men of impure heart; but I do say, that there is not a promise in the whole Bible to such persons—not a word that can encourage them to hope that they shall be kept from error, or that their teaching shall be profitable, or tend to the salvation of any soul. "Unto the wicked the Lord saith, What hast thou to do to declare my statutes, or that thou shouldest take my covenant in thy mouth? seeing thou hatest instruction, and castest my words behind thee. When thou sawest a thief, then thou consentedst with him, and hast been partaker with adulterers. Thou givest thy mouth to evil, and thy tongue frameth deceit," Psal. l. 16—19.

Here, by the pen of the Psalmist, the Holy Spirit has drawn the very character which the Popish priests have exhibited for hundreds of years,—from the very time that the Church of Rome began to give heed to seducing spirits; from that time they have been unceasingly employed in building up and upholding, by all deceiveableness of unrighteousness, a system of fraud, imposition, will-worship, superstition, and idolatry. These are the men who give themselves out as the depositaries of the pure doctrines of Jesus Christ, and who boast that they would have kept them pure and uncorrupted through all ages, though the New Testament had not been written! No wise man would make an unclean vessel the depository of that which he wished to keep clean; and it would be blasphemy to suppose any such thing to have been done by Jesus Christ. As well may we suppose him to have intrusted the keeping and transmission of his word to the devil himself, whose kingdom is to be destroyed by it, as to his active agents, whose own wicked lives compelled them to conceal what condemned them.

I might very honourably leave Berington and Kirk's work here, as condemned by its own title, and their admission that they do not derive their faith from the Bible, but use the Bible only as a secondary authority to confirm what they have received by tradition, through the medium of men as ignorant, and, I suppose, a great deal more wicked than themselves.

I think it worth while, however, to give a more particular account of this work, especially as it is understood to be a masterpiece of its kind, and to be quite unanswerable. And I confess, that if it were necessary to scrutinize the immense heap of matter brought together from the canons of councils and the writings of fathers, many of whom most Protestants never heard of before; if it were necessary to ascertain the degree of credit due to all these men, and whether the works ascribed to them were genuine, and truly translated, it would be a work which few men would choose to undertake. But my readers know that I admit no writing, later than those of the apostle John, to be of authority in matters of religion; and thus I reduce ninety-nine hundredth parts of the great volume, of 500 pages, to a dead letter.* The arguments which profess to be drawn from the Bible, are such as a child may answer; and it is not necessary that I give any more than a specimen.

Before going into detail, however, it is right to remark, that notwithstanding the boasted certainty with which the Church of Rome teaches the true faith, without any mixture of error or mistake, my authors declare themselves not sure whether they have given the true "faith of Catholics" correctly or not. To the work they prefix the following DECLARATION. "As the sole design of the following compilation is to aid the instruction, and to strengthen the faith, of the Catholics of this united kingdom; and as inaccuracies, in the wording of the propositions; in translating so many various passages; and in stating some opinions, notwithstanding our utmost care, may have escaped us, we submit, without reserve, the work in all its parts, to the judgment and correction of our ecclesiastical superiors, and the other pastors of the church, who are the appointed guardians of her faith and discipline.

October 2, 1812. "JOSEPH BERINGTON.
"JOHN KIRK."

* I have given my reasons for rejecting the authority of the fathers in some former Numbers, particularly in my replies to Juvenis, (See Number 132.) so that I need not go over the ground again.

The danger of mistaking the meaning of the Bible, when read by common people, forms the leading subject of a long Introduction; but what do the readers of this work gain, in point of security, from mistake, when the authors are not certain whether they understand their own meaning, or whether they have expressed it intelligibly? They submit to their ecclesiastical superiors whether or not they have written properly; and if these said superiors should condemn their propositions, they must confess their error whether they are convinced of it or not. In point of fact, Bishop Poynter, Vicar Apostolic of the London district, has pointed out a number of inaccuracies, which Mr Berington explains and palliates as well as he can, in a letter addressed to this, his superior—"in order," he says, "to remove or lessen difficulties, not to excuse inaccuracies, or to controvert objections." In the Church of Rome, to enter into controversy, or differ in opinion from a superior, is out of the question. An ordinary priest must never presume to know what is of faith, so well as a bishop; no bishop must presume to know it so well as his metropolitan; and no metropolitan dares to know it so well as the Pope. In this church, therefore, the body of the people can know nothing at all with certainty, for few of them have personal access to the head, who alone is not responsible to a superior, and who has power to dictate to inferiors whatever he pleases, as articles of faith. Yet Papists are continually boasting that theirs is the only Church in which the true faith is declared with infallible certainty! This is almost as great an absurdity as transubstantiation; and only he who believes the one is able to believe the other.

Professing to lay down and prove at length only those points which distinguish the church of Rome from other churches, my authors scarcely touch the doctrine of the Trinity, the atonement, and some more which they say are held in common with them, and others: but those men do not believe in the scripture doctrine of the Trinity, who worship a fourth person under the title of Our Lady, and a host of inferior deities; and he does not believe in the atonement of Christ, who thinks that his salvation requires another propitiatory sacrifice, such as the mass. In short, there is not one peculiar doctrine of Christianity which the Church of Rome does not directly or indirectly contradict and set aside by her own traditions; and yet there are Protestants, and clergymen too, who publicly maintain in print, that the fundamental principles of their own church, and of that of Rome, are substantially the same.

Berington and Kirk have the merit of going to work in a very regular methodical manner. Euclid himself did not lay down his propositions more distinctly; but Euclid's chief object was, and his great excellence consists in demonstration, in which my authors have failed in almost every instance. I shall give the first three propositions entire, as they are expressed in few words. PROP. I. "When man has sinned, the remission and pardon of sin is not attainable by him, otherwise than in and by the merits of the sufferings and death of Jesus Christ, who freely purchased our ransom. PROP. II. It is only through the same merits of Jesus Christ, that the just man can obtain either an increase of holiness in this life, or eternal happiness in the next." This seems very sound scriptural doctrine; and there are many pertinent texts adduced to prove that the pardon of sin is to be obtained through Christ alone; yet the first four words of the first proposition contain the germ of a very great error. "When man has sinned," implies that sometime or other, he has not sinned, or that he is free from sin. This Papists believe to be the case with them all when they have confessed and received absolution from the priest; and it is only when, after confession, they have sinned, they need to seek for pardon again. If this were not explicitly taught by the Church of Rome, I might have passed over the above as merely an awkward mode of expression.

PROP. III. "The good works of a just man proceeding from grace and charity, are so far acceptable to God, through his goodness and sacred promises, as to be truly deserving of an eternal reward; God crowning his own gifts, when he crowns the good works of his servants." Here the leaven of Antichrist appears more distinctly; and it is that which leavens the whole mass of Popery;—it is the doctrine of human deserving, or human merit, for the ideas are the same. This strikes at the very root of Christian doctrine; for if any man shall think of his works as deserving an eternal reward, in any sense whatever, he cannot be saved by grace, and therefore, if the Bible be true, he cannot be saved at all. He who in any sense deserves a reward, claims it as a debt; and it cannot be withheld from him without injustice. The Church of Rome places her "just man" in the impious and bold attitude of one who can say to his Maker, Pay me that thou owest. He demands his reward, not as a favour, but as an act of justice. It matters not that the expression is guarded on both sides, by such words as grace and charity, and, God crowning his own gifts when he crowns the good works of his servants. These are words without meaning, when connected with human deserving; for where this has possession of the mind, grace can have no place whatever: otherwise grace is no more grace. That is, things divinely established must change their nature, ere man, who is a sinner, can be saved in virtue of his doings or deservings. The church of Christ in heaven and on earth, with one voice acknowledge, that not by works of righteousness which we have done, that is, not according to our deservings, but according to his mercy he hath saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost. If there were a particle of deserving in the mind of any one of the glorified saints, it would make such a discordant note in the song of the redeemed, as would mar the harmony of the blessed company, while ascribing salvation to Him that loved them, and washed them from their sins in his own blood.

The proposition on which I am commenting is followed by more than a page of scripture passages given at length; but there is not a word of man's works deserving a reward in any one of them, of which the reader may satisfy himself by turning to his Bible, according to the following references: Mat. x. 42; xvi. 27, and xxv. 34, 35; 1 Cor. ix. 24, 25; 2 Cor. iv. 17, and v. 10; 2 Tim. iv. 8; Heb. vi. 10; 2 Pet. i. 10; Jam. ii. 14, 17, 26. They give the passages from their own translation, which in these instances at least, is as silent about human merit and deserving as ours. They say a great deal indeed about the glorious reward with which the people of God shall be crowned in heaven; but it is all of grace, of sovereign, rich mercy, without the least hint of their having deserved it.

As I hope my readers will examine the passages of the New Testament above referred to, to see if there be any thing of human deserving acknowledged in them, I think it right to observe, that there is one of them which, at first view, may seem to give some countenance to it. It is Heb. vi. 10; "God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love," &c. From this Papists argue, that if it would be unrighteous in God not to reward his people's good works, surely they must deserve a reward. But the difficulty will vanish when it is recollected that the persons addressed are considered as heirs of salvation; and who, trusting in the promise of God, had suffered the loss of all things, and had taken joyfully the spoiling of their goods, knowing that they had in heaven a better and an enduring substance. They had endured such things, knowing that God had promised a heavenly inheritance; they had confided in this promise; and the words of the apostle strongly assert, that God is not unrighteous to disappoint those who had confided in him, and who had given evidence of their confidence by their work of faith and labour of love. There is nothing in the passage that can lead us to suppose that these works are so meritorious, as that it would be unrighteous not to reward them; but merely that it would be unrighteous in God, not to fulfil his own promise. If we speak of the pardon of sin, as a mere matter of speculation, it would be absurd to say, God would be unjust if he did not pardon it. Yet when the subject is viewed in the light of the gospel, his justice and righteousness are as conspicuous in the matter as his mercy and faithfulness. "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." Not surely because we have deserved or merited forgiveness, but because he has promised this to all who believe in Christ, and his justice as well as his faithfulness is engaged for the fulfilment of the promise.

The authors then very impudently tell their readers, that "the doctrine of these three propositions is very generally admitted, and all controversy on the subject, in regard to the belief of Roman Catholics, has in a great measure ceased." This will serve the purpose of making Papists believe that the doctrine of salvation by grace, without our "works and deservings," is now very generally exploded, and that the grand fundamental article of the Reformation is discarded by Protestants; and if it were so, I would say, there is little remaining of the Reformation, as it respects doctrine, that is worth contending for. But the controversy has not ceased; and it shall not cease while the world stands. It involves no less than the question, whether Christ alone has merited the salvation of his people? or whether they must wholly or in part merit it for themselves? The former is the doctrine of the Bible; the latter is that of false religion under every form. They are as much opposed to one another as light and darkness, Christ and Belial; and the controversy cannot terminate while both of these powers have an interest and a subject in the world.

I am afraid some, even of my Protestant readers, will think I have made more of this expression of the Popish authors than it deserves. They will say, I am disputing about a word; and that there can be little danger in saying our good works deserve an eternal reward, when it is admitted that these good works are the gifts of God's own grace. But we ought not to forget, that it was by a single word that the serpent beguiled Eve, and ruined our whole race. "Ye shall NOT surely die," was his assertion, and it is only in one word different from the declaration of God, by which he warned our first parents of what would be the consequence of their disobedience. So this one word, DESERVE, in relation to men's works and eternal life, will as effectually overturn and frustrate the grace of the gospel, as the devil's lie did the happiness of the paradisiacal state. As I have said somewhere already, the smallest degree of obliquity extended, will lead to an infinite distance from the right line of truth, so this notion of human deserving in the Church of Rome, led by degrees to the monstrous error, that the saints performed more good works than were necessary for themselves, and thus furnished the Pope with a storehouse of merit, which he sells for money to those who have none of their own.

No. CXLVI.

SATURDAY, April 28th, 1821.

I SHALL occupy a few pages more with a review of Berington and Kirk's work, in order to show how artfully Popish writers introduce their peculiar doctrines, and on what a slight foundation they are made to rest. I say they are artfully introduced; for in the work before me, there is an attempt to bespeak the good opinions of Protestants, by laying down first, certain propositions, which, with a verbal exception or two, seem very orthodox, and such as most Protestants would subscribe. The doctrine of merit, indeed, is rather too plainly expressed in the third proposition to escape the notice of any person acquainted with the Bible. The authors in this instance make a trip in the threshold; but they soon recover their feet; and in the fourth proposition, they speak as soundly as Luther would have done. PROP. IV. "The merits of Jesus Christ, though infinite in themselves, are not applied to us otherwise than by a right faith in him; which faith is one, entire, and conformable to its object, which object is divine revelation, that is, the truths taught by Christ, and to that revelation, or to those truths faith gives an undoubting assent." Now, though I do not admire the mode of expression in some parts of the proposition, it is, upon the whole, agreeable to the doctrine of most Protestant churches: so much indeed, that Bishop Poynter finds fault with it, because he says, "it may be inferred that man is justified by faith alone. And Mr Berington replies, by referring to other parts of the work in which his readers are guarded against that error. This it seems is the secret by which Papists understand one another's writings; whereas a simple Protestant, having his attention directed to such a proposition as the above, with a number of Scripture texts appended to it, would be led to conclude that the Church of Rome was as sound in the faith as those of England and Scotland.

PROP. V. "The divine revelation contains many mysterious doctrines, surpassing the natural reach of the human understanding; for which reason, it became the wisdom and goodness of God to provide some way or means, whereby man might be enabled to learn what these mysterious doctrines are—means apparent to all, proportioned to the capacities of all, and sure and certain to all." This again seems all very good, if we are to understand that the means which God has provided for imparting to men the knowledge of the mysterious doctrines of the Bible, are, the enlightening influences of his Holy Spirit, to accompany the reading and preaching of his word; and this is the import of the passages of Scripture which are cited in support of the proposition; which are, Mat. xi. 25, 26, and xvi. 17. John xv. 22. 1 Cor. i. 27, and ii. 12, 13. Eph. iv. 11, 14. I request the reader to turn to his Bible, and read all these passages, and judge for himself, whether they do not plainly intimate, that God, by his word and Spirit, gives the saving knowledge of his will for their salvation, to children and others of the capacity of children, without reference to any other authority whatever.

But the legs of the lame are not equal. And thus it is that the greatest Popish authors, even when they state one truth with some degree of propriety, cannot state two together without stumbling into an error. Thus it is that my authors, in their sixth Proposition, overset all that had the appearance of truth in their fifth. The sixth is:—"The ways or means by which to arrive at the knowledge of the divine truths, is, by attention and submission to the voice of the pastors of the church; a church established by Christ for the instruction of all; spread for that end through all nations; visibly continued in the succession of pastors and people through all ages. Whence the marks of this church are, unity, visibility, indefectibility, succession from the apostles, universality, and sanctity."

Here my authors take their departure from every thing that has even a resemblance of real Christianity. They slide away from the authority and teaching of the Holy Spirit by means of the Scriptures, to the authority and teaching of their own church; that is, of the Pope and his clergy. These become invested with supreme authority over the Scriptures themselves, so as to dictate with infallible certainty what the Scriptures mean; and what is sacred Scripture and what is not. It is not necessary that I should follow them through all the corruption that unfolds itself in the sequel of their thick octavo volume; because I have already exposed almost every article of their creed; and if any candid person should ever be at the pains, after reading this exposition of the "Faith of Catholics," to peruse what I have written in former Numbers, I shall not be under any apprehension of hearing him say, that no Protestant has attempted an answer. The fact is, there is nothing in the work before me but what has been written hundreds of years ago, and answered hundreds of times; and if this work were replied to by name, and every proposition in it refuted to-morrow, some Papist would come forward next year, with the same things under a new title; and then he and his party would boast that no man was able to refute him.

Let us see, however, in a few instances, how they support their propositions by the authority of Scripture. For the authority of the church as laid down in the sixth proposition, the first quotation is Mat. xviii. 17, "And if he will not hear them, tell the church. And if he will not hear the church, let him be to thee as a heathen and a publican." The thing to be proved is, that all men are bound to receive the truths of divine revelation from the lips of the priests, who are divinely commissioned to declare what is the true sense of revelation. This, I say, is what is to be proved; but what is meant for the proof has no relation to the subject. Let the reader turn to the passage, and he will find that our Lord is prescribing the manner in which an offending brother ought to be treated. If private admonition has no effect upon him, his fault must be told to the church of which he is a member. If he refuse to hear the church; that is, if her admonition shall not produce the desired effect of making him repent of his fault, then he must be put away, and ever after looked upon as a heathen, as one who never believed the gospel, unless he shall repent; which, if he do, he may be received into the church again, just like any other man who repents of his sins, and professes his faith in Christ. Here there is not a word of the priests being divinely appointed as the sole oracles of the Christian faith, and the standing, infallible interpreters of the Word of God. The other passages under this head have as little relation to the point which they are adduced to establish. They are as follow; Mat. xxviii. 18, 19; Mark. xvi. 15; Luke x. 16; Rom. x. 17, 18; 1 Cor. xii. 28, 29; 1 John iv. 6. Some of these passages relate to the divine commission of the apostles, and the extraordinary authority with which they were invested as Christ's inspired ambassadors; but there is not a word of their having successors, endowed with the same powers; yet this is the thing which the Church of Rome asserts, and which these passages are cited to prove.

For the "Unity" of the church, their leading text is, John x. 16, "Other sheep I have which are not of this fold: them also I must bring, and there shall be one fold and one shepherd." There can be no question that the church of Christ is one body; and this text proves it; but it does not prove it to be the Church of Rome, and therefore it proves nothing to the purpose. Throughout the whole work this is taken for granted, though it is the very point at issue. Hundreds of passages of Scripture are given at length, descriptive of the purity, and glory, and perpetuity of the church of Christ, as a body united to Him who is the Head; sanctified by his Spirit, so as to be without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; and protected by his mighty power, so that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. All this we know to be true of the spiritual church of Christ; but in the work before me, and in most other Popish books, it is all applied to the Church of Rome; and applied with such confidence, as if it were universally acknowledged, that she is the holy and spotless spouse of Christ. There is a barefaced impudence in this, as well as an impiety that will find no parallel, but in the other lies and impositions of the upholders of the mystery of iniquity. I have written largely on the difference between the Church of Christ and the Church of Rome, in different parts of my work, and need not resume the subject here. See particularly pages 425—436, and No. CXI.

The 8th proposition of Berington and Kirk, is as follows:—"From the testimony and authority of the Catholic church, we receive the Scriptures, and believe them to contain the revealed will of God." There is not one passage of Scripture adduced to prove this proposition; and not one father earlier than the third century. The 9th proposition is merely an extension of the 8th. Let us see therefore how it is supported by Scripture: "As the church can assuredly tell us, what particular book is the word of God; so can she, with like assurance, tell us the true sense and meaning of it, in controverted points of faith: the same Spirit which directed the writing of the Scriptures directing the church to understand them, and to teach all mysteries and duties as are necessary to salvation." By the church, the writers still understand the Church of Rome; and that she possesses the privilege here ascribed to her, is attempted to be proved by the 15th of the Acts, which records an application by the church in Antioch to that in Jerusalem, where it was known some of the apostles were, for information upon the question of imposing circumcision upon the Gentile converts; but the Church of Rome has no more to do with this, than the Church of Scotland. The other passages cited are equally irrelevant: see Mat. xvi. 18, and xxviii. 18, 19, 20; John xiv. 16, 26, and xvi. 13; 1 Tim. iii. 14, 15. Some of these passages do indeed contain a promise of the presence of the divine Spirit with the apostles, to preserve them from error, and lead them into all truth; and some of them imply a promise of the same Spirit to be with all true believers for their sanctification and comfort: but what is this to the Church of Rome? Suppose she had continued in the faith of Christ, she would have enjoyed the benefit of these promises only in common with other churches. Before she can justly claim a monopoly of them, she must produce her patent, which she has never yet done.

Besides, it is well known in point of fact, that there never was a church in the world that exhibited a greater variety, and even contrariety of opinions, than the Church of Rome. Nay, she actually had within her bosom great saints, who taught all the variety of doctrines that are to be found at this day, among all the sects in Christendom, from the highest Supralapsarian down to the lowest Pelagian. The learned are well acquainted with the furious and long-continued controversies, on the most fundamental points of doctrine, between the Thomists and the Scotists, the Dominicans and the Franciscans, the Jansenists and the Jesuits. Opposing sects, in different communions, could not be more furiously pitted against one another, than those Popish orders were, while abiding in the same communion, which afforded an example of schism, in the proper sense of the word, much more disgraceful than the separation of one sect from another when they cannot live comfortably together. This is matter of fact, known to all the world; and yet the Church of Rome has the effrontery to maintain in the face of the world, that she alone possesses the privilege of assuredly telling us the true sense and meaning of the Scriptures on controverted points of faith! Here is another absurdity almost equal to transubstantiation!

On the subject of purgatory and prayers for the dead, these authors adduce as their leading proof from Scripture, 2 Maccabees xii. 43—46; and in order to confirm what is said in that apocryphal writing, they introduce some passages from the New Testament, which, as I showed, when discussing the doctrine of purgatory, have no relation to the subject. Indeed my authors themselves candidly confess that this doctrine has little support from Scripture. Thus they speak in their introduction: —"The Catholic reader will now be sensible, should any point of his belief seem to receive little support, or even no support, from any text of Scripture, that its truth is not thereby affected, as its divine origin from Christ, and its descent from the apostles, remain the same; and, therefore, that the doctrine of purgatory and the invocation of saints stand upon the same foundations as that of the authority of the church, though, in support of the former, the evidence of Scripture be comparatively weak. Why, or how, this has happened let him say, "Who hath known the mind of the Lord, and hath been his counsellor," Rom. xi. 34.

With all due submission to these reverend authors, I maintain, that they ought to tell us "how this has happened,"—that in support of the doctrine of purgatory, the evidence of Scripture is comparatively weak. Protestants who do not profess to believe any thing in religion but what they find in Scripture, do not pretend to know the mind of the Lord from any other source. But Papists do pretend to know the mind of the Lord, independently of Scripture; therefore they ought to tell us why a doctrine that forms an essential and most lucrative part of their system, has little support from Scripture. But it seems, that with all their infallibility or inerrancy, as they pedantically call their faculty of knowing all articles of faith with infallible certainty, they know no more than other men. They do not even know that they know any thing; for whether they do or not, depends upon their lawful superiors.

I take leave of this work with remarking, that it seems rather intended for confirming Papists, than for converting Protestants; and I believe it has not been seen by many of the latter. I do not recollect ever to have seen it advertised; and a learned dignitary of the English church, who has been long engaged in controversy with the Church of Rome, on reading my first notice of it, wrote me that he knew nothing of such a book. I suspect that it was not intended for the Protestant meridian, else some pains would have been taken to make Protestants better acquainted with it.

When speaking, in one of my late Numbers, of the folly of Protestant Dissenters in petitioning for what is called Catholic emancipation, I remarked, that the wolf might tell a flock of sheep that he had laid aside his claws and his teeth; but that they would be silly sheep indeed who would believe him. On this subject, a correspondent has favoured me with a communication, with which I conclude the present Number.

AN OLD STORY VERSIFIED,

By the Rev. JOHN GRAHAM, A. M.

A CAREFUL shepherd had a flock
Of thriving sheep—his only stock,
Their pasture he with walls surrounded,
As wolves throughout the land abounded.
Great were his pains, his labour long,
To make the barrier high and strong;
Yet often as he went to sleep,
The wolf broke in and slew the sheep.
At last he finds his work complete,
No entrance left but at the gate;
His flock protected and at peace,
Began to flourish and increase.
Till full of years, and honest pride
At his success—the shepherd died.
A son succeeded, mild and kind,
Of liberal and gentle mind,
Who wish'd indeed to save the sheep,
And yet the wolves in humour keep.
Him the submissive brutes petition,
To pity their forlorn condition;
Of their primeval rights denuded,
And from the pasturage excluded.
They vow'd—they swore—their alter'd mind
To sheep had long become so kind,
They would not put a tooth or foot on
The choicest, fattest leg of mutton.
Their ancestors, they all confess'd,
Of harsher notions were possess'd;
Had often broke the shepherd's wall,
And made the sheep in thousands fall;
Spread death and desolation round,
And stain'd with blood the blushing ground
But they—kind souls—had other kidneys
As noble as Sir Philip Sidney's.
Mild as Melancthon—they would keep,
And help to feed this flock of sheep.
The shepherd fearing such a trial,
Was resolute in his denial;

Till by false friends extremely puzzled,
He let the wolves in strongly muzzled.
Pared from each foot was every claw,
And twenty straps bound up each jaw;
Each wolf was forc'd an oath to pass,
He would eat nothing there but grass.
The wall was levell'd and the meeting
Twixt wolves and sheep was grac'd with greeting;
One would suppose through all the plain,
The golden age was come again;
Sheep join'd with wolf, hard names to call
The builders of the levell'd wall.
A few bold watchmen dared to cry
Against this frightful novelty,
And said it soon would come to pass,
That wolves would think all flesh is grass;
And in their plenitude of power,
The silly, feeble sheep devour—
These warnings are all giv'n in vain,
Within the fold the wolves remain.
The watchmen meet contempt and hate,
As "born two hundred years too late,"
Vile bigots, who for private ends,
Would disunite the new made friends.
Meantime the claws which had been cut,
Grew strong and sharp on every foot;
Some of the straps are old and worn,
And others from the muzzle torn;
Slender and few those that remain,
Give tenfold discontent and pain,
Till as an useless galling "brand,"
They're all drawn off with gentle hand,
Then starts the shepherd as from sleep,
Resolv'd to save the trembling sheep;
Suspicion shows, and late takes care,
New straps and muzzles to prepare:
But vain is all precaution now,
The grim wolf knits his horrid brow;
The muzzle he rejects with scorn—
And on that melancholy morn,
Destruction rages through the fold,
The sheep are slaughter'd young and old;
In vain for help the shepherd cries,
Amidst his butcher'd flock he dies,
And curses in his hapless fall
The day he moved his father's wall.

SAT SAPIENTI VERBUM.

LIFFORD, April 5th, 1821.

Happily this jeu d'esprit is nothing but a fable, though when it was written, and even when I sent it to the compositor, there was some probability of its soon becoming a reality. The wall must now remain uninjured, and the wolf be kept out of the fold for another year at least; and perhaps by that time, the wolves will be regarded with such favour by a majority of the shepherds, that they will be admitted without any muzzle at all. I think my worthy correspondent has made a slight mistake in representing the wolves as acknowledging the faults of their ancestors, and professing that they themselves were more kind and gentle; for certainly the wolf of the present day possesses the same qualities as wolves possessed a thousand years ago; and those whom the animal is meant to represent do not profess to be different from their ancestors. The tendency of all their writings, at this day, is to make it appear that their religion was always tolerant and merciful; that their fathers were always persecuted, but never persecutors; which, in point of fact, is about as true, as that sheep have always been in the habit of devouring wolves, but that wolves never devoured sheep.

No. CXLVII.

SATURDAY, MAY 5TH, 1821.

I HAVE lately received from a correspondent, on the continent, a document which is curious in itself, and of considerable importance in my controversy with the Church of Rome. Those who are acquainted with the correspondence which was carried on in the Glasgow Chronicle, in which this work commenced, will recollect that I mentioned a famous bull of indulgence, which had been granted by the Pope to the ancient house of Kilravak. The existence of this bull was positively denied by one or both of my opponents; and on my referring to several literary gentlemen by name, who could bear witness that they had seen it, the objectors were silenced, though they had not the grace to make confession, or acknowledge their error. The document before me is not merely a bull of indulgence granted to a family, but it actually confers upon an individual the power of granting a dispensation, relating to matters of the greatest importance in morals, to as many as he pleases. My correspondent says, "I have very unexpectedly got my hands upon the original of the subjoined document, signed by the proper authorities at Rome, and stamped by the Sigillum Officii Sacri." "It may be necessary," says he, "to mention, that these powers of absolution are given by his holiness only to the dignitaries of the church, such as archbishops and bishops of the different dioceses, as also to a few who are high in favour with the court of cardinals. You may, therefore, know how difficult it is to get a sight of such a document. I am not at liberty to say how I obtained it, or to give the name of the favoured one to whom it is addressed, but I give you it, word for word, even to its errors." From prudential considerations, I forbear giving the name of my correspondent, for English gentlemen travelling in Popish countries are in danger of getting into trouble, by writing to their friends what they see and hear, especially if it happen to meet the eye of any Jesuit, who could soon communicate the fact to his brother Jesuit in any part of Europe, and the hapless traveller would be in danger of being overtaken by the officers of the Inquisition.

The reader, however, may perfectly rely on the authenticity of the following. The learned will, indeed, perceive from the monkish style of the Latin, that it cannot be a piece of British Protestant manufacture. The errors in point of style which my correspondent mentions, have made it difficult to render some parts of it into English; and though I have availed myself of the aid of a classical scholar, I am not sure that the translation is perfectly correct. I therefore give the original verbatim et literatim, as I received it. I would not willingly do injustice even to the Pope; and if any of his children, who may be supposed to understand their father's language better than Protestants, shall point out any mistake in the translation, I shall cheerfully publish it.

It is addressed on the back, "Tibi Dilecto in Christo,———Salutem in Domino. Ex S. Pœnitentiaria Gratis."* Its title within is, "MICHAEL MISERATIONE DIVINA EPISCOPUS ALBANENSIS, S. R. E. CARDINALIS DE PETRO SS. DD. PAPÆ ET SEDIS APOSTOLICÆ MAJOR PŒNITENTIARIUS," and then commences.

"Tibi dilecto in Christo Confessario ab Ordinario Loci ad excipiendas utriusque sexus Sacramentales Confessiones legitime approbato infrascriptas concedimus facultates, quibus, pro Foro Conscientiæ, et in Sacramentali Confessione, Auctoritate Apostolica, uti valeas, et non aliter; Ita tamen ne debeas illas cuilibet manifestare; nisi necessitas aut utilitas id exegerit.

Translation.

Endorsed on the back,

"To the ——— beloved in Christ; safety in the Lord. From the Holy Penitentiary, Grace."

Entitled within,

"Michael, by Divine mercy, Bishop of Albania, of the Holy Roman Church. Cardinal de Petro, and Superior Penitentiary of our Holy Lords, the Pope and the Apostolic See."

And commencing,

"To thee ——— beloved in Christ, Confessor, legally approved by the Ordinary of the place for receiving the Sacramental confessions of both sexes, we grant the undermentioned powers, which thou art empowered to use for a Court of Conscience, and in Sacramental confession by Apostolic authority, and not otherwise. So, however, that thou oughtest not to exhibit them to any one, unless necessity or utility should require it.

First. Power of absolving from excommunication on account of having laid violent hands on the Clergy or Presbyters, whether secular or regular: in cases, however, that have not been brought, or that cannot easily be brought before the Court of the Ordinary, provided that death has not ensued, or mutilation, or a mortal wound, or a fracture of the bones. A heavy and salutary Penance being enjoined, with the obligation of carefully and sufficiently satisfying the party injured.

Second. Of absolving from the censures pronounced upon Duelists; provided that the cases have not been brought before the court of the Ordinary. A heavy and salutary Penance being enjoined and all other things which ought of right to accompany it.

Third. Of absolving all the Penitent, whether men or women, (except avowed Heretics, or those who openly teach their doctrines) from all kinds of sentences, censures, and ecclesiastical penalties, on account of Heresy, whether when no person heard or observed it; or when thrown out in the hearing of others:—for Infidelity, and abjuration of the Catholic faith, privately avowed;—Sorcery and witchcraft committed with accomplices; also for invocation of the Devil and an agreement of consigning to him their soul; for idolatrous worship paid him, and unhallowed rites; and in short for every kind of false doctrine inculcated; after however the Penitent, as of right he ought, has disclosed his accomplices in the afore-mentioned crimes, if he has any, to the Ordinary of the place, or to the officer of the Holy Inquisition, in those places where the authority of the Holy Inquisition prevails. In other places, however, let the Penitent come under a solemn engagement of communicating this disclosure, as soon as possible, and in the way which shall seem to you the best, before the Ordinary of the place. And after he shall, in every instance, have secretly abjured the heresies before you, and recalled the compact entered into with the evil one;—and have delivered to you the written agreement executed, if any; with the other symbols of superstition, that they may all be burned. Having enjoined according to the degree of his wickedness a severe and salutary penance, with a frequent use of sacraments, and exacted an obligation of retracting his sentiments according to your prudent advice, in presence of those before whom the heresies were uttered; and of removing the scandal so produced.

Fourth. Of absolving from censures incurred by the violation of the residences of Religious Orders of either sex, provided that it was not done intentionally for a wicked purpose, and without any event having followed from it, and whilst the cases have not been brought before the court of the Ordinary;—with a suitable and salutary penance. And moreover of absolving women only, from the censures and ecclesiastical penalties incurred by having violated for a wicked purpose the residence of religious men, whilst only the cases remain concealed: having prescribed a severe and salutary Penance, with a prohibition from entering any Church, Convent, or Monastery of the said Religious orders, during the continuance of the Penance.

Fifth. Of absolving from the censures incurred for retaining and perusing prohibited Books;—after, however, the Penitent shall have delivered up the prohibited books which he may have in his possession, or intrusted them to thee that they may be delivered up; to the Ordinary of the place or to some other person lawfully authorized to receive them. A suitable and salutary penance being enjoined.

Sixth. Of absolving from a case reserved for the determination of the Apostolic See, for gifts received from Regulars of either sex, penance being enjoined. And when the case is concerning gifts under the value of ten Scuta,* some charitable donation is to be required at thy discretion, and carefully exacted as soon as possible for the benefit of Religion, to which restitution was to have been made; provided always that it does not appear that these gifts were of the proper effects of Religion. In so far, however, as the accepted gifts were either above the value of ten Scuta, or appear to have been given out of the proper effects of Religion, restitution is to be previously made, which if the individual cannot immediately perform, an obligation is to be lodged in thy hands that this shall be done within a certain limited time to be fixed by thy judgment; otherwise according to circumstances.

Seventh. Of absolving the Religious of every order, (except Nuns, unless thou hast been approved of, or authorized, by the Ordinary of the place, to act for them) not only from the aforesaid, but also from Cases, and censures, reserved for the determination of their own community.

Eighth. Of commuting, on having considered the causes, all simple Vows, into others of Penance, or works of piety; with the exception of the Five Vows reserved for the Apostolic See, viz. of Chastity, of Religion, of the Three Pilgrimages, namely, to the sacred threshold of the Holy Apostles; to St James in Compostellis, and to Jerusalem; and from the penal vows to restrain themselves from sin; and from the vow against indulging in amusement; and from vows made with respect to Prejudice and the Jus Tertii.

Ninth. Of granting a dispensation to a Transgressor of the Vow of Chastity, who has contracted a matrimonial connection with this vow upon him, to obtain the Debitum Conjugale. Such a Penitent being admonished that in every other respect except the lawful matrimonial privilege, this vow is to be considered binding, as also in the event of surviving the husband or wife respectively.

Tenth. Of granting a dispensation to an incestuous man or woman, to obtain the Debitum Conjugale, which right he or she had lost from a supervening secret affinity, by a carnal connection having taken place with a male or female relation, whether in the first, or in the first and second, or in the second degree of his wife or her husband respectively. The occasion of the sin being removed; and a severe and salutary penance being enjoined, and sacramental confession once every month, for a period to be appointed according to thy judgment.

Eleventh. Of granting a dispensation with regard to a secret impediment of the first, also of the first and second, and of the second degree of affinity by itself, arising from unlawful connection: when the question is concerning Matrimony already contracted with that impediment existing. So, however, that if an affinity of this kind arises from connection with the mother of the espoused woman, the birth of the espoused shall have preceded that connection. The Penitent being admonished of the necessity of a secret renewal of the compact with his supposed wife, or the woman with her supposed husband; or assured of the nullity of the former compact; but so cautiously that the delinquency shall by no means be made public. The cause of crime being removed, and a severe and salutary penance being enjoined, and sacramental confession once a month, for a period to be fixed by thy judgment.

Twelfth. Of granting dispensation with regard to the secret impediment of a crime, provided that it has occurred without any evil design, and the question is respecting matrimony already contracted. The supposed spouses being admonished of the necessity of a secret renewal of the bond, and a severe and salutary penance being enjoined, and sacramental confession once every month, for a period to be fixed by thy judgment.

Thirteenth. Likewise of granting dispensation concerning a secret irregularity contracted by a violation of censures, namely, with Priests, or those in Holy Orders whether Secular or Regular.

It is our will, however, that thou shouldst be empowered to use the above mentioned powers by License from the proper Ordinary for three years only, from the date of these presents ; and that thou shouldst abstain from granting absolution from cases reserved for the Ordinaries of the various places, unless power to do so is obtained from them.

Given at Rome, from our Palace, on the ninth day of December, 1819.

Secretary of the Holy Penitentiary."

I shall not make many remarks on this modern piece of Popish jugglery : but it lets out certain secrets with regard to the practice of religious persons, which it is worth while to mention ; such for instance, as the monks and nuns being in the practice of stealing into one another's apartments. The 4th clause empowers the confessor to grant absolution for this fault, which would have been needless if the practice did not exist. Nay, so profligate and shameless are these religious women, that they will violate for a wicked purpose the apartments of the religious men; and the confessor is empowered to grant absolution for this, provided it be kept secret. This is the fruit of their vows of chastity ! this is the boasted sanctity of those who have obtained holy orders, and who profess to have fled from the pollutions of the world !

We learn from the third clause that, as lately as the year 1819, sorcery and witchcraft, and the crime of making unlawful bargains with the devil, were understood to be practised in the Church of Rome. Whether such things are really practised, I shall not take upon me to say ; but it is certain that the Pope and his "holy lords" believe they are ; from which we may infer that the gross darkness of the tenth century has not yet passed away from the capital of the Christian world.

The 8th clause empowers the confessor to dispense with all simple vows, five only excepted, on condition of some penance or pious work being performed ; and as those of civil allegiance are not excepted, the confessor can, whenever he pleases, relieve a man from the obligation of any oath he may have taken to the king or government that affords him protection. The simple fact that this is an existing law in the Church of Rome, ought to open the eyes of some of our statesmen and others, who seem to have fallen into a most romantic fit of love and affection for the children of Babylon, if not for the old lady herself. Every reader of history knows that the Pope exercised the power of absolving subjects from their oaths of allegiance ; and here is a proof that he does so still, which proves what I have all along maintained, that Popery is unchanged, let simple Protestants say what they will to the contrary.

The 9th, 10th, and 11th clauses need no comment. They lay open so plainly the gross wickedness which Rome tolerates, that I think no person can doubt the truth of what I asserted at the commencement of my work, that the Church of Rome grants indulgence, or rather dispensation to her members to commit sin.

I had prepared to be inserted here the present state of Rome with regard to indulgences, from a work entitled, "Rome in the 19th century," but I find I have not room for it. It will appear in a future Number.

No. CXLVIII.

SATURDAY, May 12th, 1821.

The following was intended for the conclusion of last Number, but was omitted for want of room :—

"Plenary indulgence and remission of sins are liberally offered here on very easy terms. I was at first rather startled with the prodigal manner in which that full pardon of all transgressions, which the gospel promises only as the reward of sincere repentance and amendment,* was bestowed at Rome, in consideration of repeating certain prayers before the shrine of certain saints, or paying a certain sum of money to certain priests.

"I was surprised to find scarcely a church in Rome, that did not hold up at the door the tempting inscription of 'Indulgenzia Plenaria.' Two hundred days' indulgence I thought a great reward for every kiss bestowed upon the great black cross in the Coliseum ; but that is nothing to the indulgences for ten, twenty, and even thirty thousands of years, that may be bought, at no exorbitant rate, in many of the churches ; † so that it is amazing what a vast quantity of treasure may be amassed in the other world with very little industry in this, by those who are avaricious of this spiritual wealth, into which indeed the dross or riches of this world

* The reader will be aware that these are not The Protestant's words.

† You may buy as many masses as will free your soul from purgatory for 29,000 years at the church of St John Lateran, on the festival of that saint ; at Santa Bibiana, on All Souls' Day, for 7,000 years ; at a church near the Basilica of St Paul, and at another on the Quirinal Hill, the names of both of which I have unluckily forgotten, for 10,000, and for 3,000 years, and at a very reasonable rate. But it is vain to particularize, for the greater part of the principal churches in Rome and the neighbourhood are spiritual shops for the sale of the same commodity.

Bishop Burnet, in his History of the Reformation, (Records, book 1, page 26, King Edward's reign,) has extracted from Horæ B. Mariæ Virg. ad usum Sarum, printed at Paris 1526, sixteen instances of pardons beyond one hundred years, granted by Popes, in consideration of repeating such and such prayers with Ave-marias and credos. A monument in St Michael's chapel, Macclesfield, grants pardon 26,000 years for saying 5 pater-nosters, 5 aves, and a credo. See Prot. Guardian, vol. 1, p. 337.

may be converted with the happiest facility imaginable.

"We are told that 'it is easier for a camel to enter into the eye of a needle, than a rich man into the kingdom of heaven,' but at Rome at least, it would seem to be difficult, nay, impossible, to keep a rich man out."

Rome, in the nineteenth century, Literary Gazette, No. 213, p. 101.

February 17, 1821.

The 144th Number of the Protestant broke off in the middle of a letter from a gentleman in a remote part of Ireland, who has the advantage, if such it may be called, of seeing Popery in its naked deformity. Having stated the fact that a miraculous virtue was supposed to reside in the clay that had touched the coffin of a priest in his neighbourhood, lately deceased, my correspondent proceeds:—

"The writer saw a woman, a cripple, who, hearing of this celebrated relic, had been taken there for a cure; on her return, being asked if she had received any benefit, she replied she did, but her husband saying she did not, the wife asked him how he could dare to deny that a miracle was wrought in her, though he could not see it! Indeed, this idea is not at all unfamiliar to them, since they are accustomed to believe that bread and wine is transubstantiated into the very body, bones, and blood of our Lord, although to their visual comprehension, they still remain the same substances without any alteration whatsoever. I had in my possession a printed paper, giving an account of some of the miracles performed at the shrine of this saint, and headed, 'Miracles have not ceased;' these were publicly cried through the towns by hawkers, of one of whom I purchased the copy.

"Those who receive any benefit by such impostures, are the priests and the publicans; (the latter erect booths around these precious relics, as long as curiosity, faith, or superstition invite customers,) and it is natural enough that this should be the case, and that they should act in concert, for while the former are vending their clays, the latter are vending their spirits. It is remarkable, that wherever there is a saint's day held, (called a Patron,) you will uniformly find the greatest superstitions succeeded by the grossest sensuality, drunkenness, and vices of all kinds. The writer had been a long time at a loss to conjecture the cause of this intimate connection between superstition and vice, until he was informed by a Roman Catholic, a great devotee, in his employment, and whom he accused with getting drunk, that, as it was committed on a saint's day, it was no sin, for they believed that each of the saints ask and receive the pardon of all sins committed on the days kept for their commemoration, provided they attended the prayers offered up to them in the chapel. We therefore need not wonder why so many saints' days are kept in Ireland, since such great benefits are said to arise from them. Indeed, the wonder is, that they do not make saints' days of every day in the year; but on recollection, this would not be agreeable to the priests, for if the people believed that the intercession of the saints in their favour went on daily, and as a matter in course, there would be nothing left for the priest to do—or, what would be worse—to receive.

"Is it therefore a matter of surprise that Papists are held back from education by every means, and even threats held out by their priests, since it is so much for their advantage to prevent the moral and religious improvement of their parishioners; and they have brought them so completely into obedience (I mean the lower orders) that they can make them believe the grossest impositions of their church in opposition to their reason.

"The mind of man is naturally desirous of knowledge, but if you can draw off the mind from seeking more rational attainments to rest in superstitions you thereby enervate the faculties, and make the understanding a mere machine to be impressed or impelled at the will of the mover. The common Irish, Sir, do not want naturally good capacities; they are intelligent, generous, and unsuspicious, and if these qualities were improved by a real, not pretended moral and religious education, they would not come behind the most celebrated of other countries—but these mental endowments are beclouded by the dense and gross atmosphere which every where overhangs Popery, preventing any rays of intellectual light to shine out.

"Of late years there have been many efforts made by the Protestants in Ireland to improve the condition of the lower orders, by the establishment of schools calculated to promote their moral and religious improvement,—and, as a means best calculated to produce these desirable ends, the Bible simply, without note, comment, or catechetical lectures of any kind, has been introduced into their schools, one would reasonably suppose that no objection could be taken against the morality of the Bible as a reading book; but this is not the case, the most violent determined opposition is every where given to the admission of Roman Catholic children into these schools by their priests, who, dreading the effects of a moral and religious education, denounce publicly and repeatedly the parents of those few children who attend. In the town where I live, at this present time, week after week, the thunders of the church are hurled from the altar against some, whose only crime is the anxiety they have to get instruction for their children. Their names are individually called out, to make them obnoxious to the rest, and every curse poured forth upon their devoted heads. It is of no avail to inform the priests that during the fifteen years which this school has been established no one instance of any attempt to proselyte, by drawing away the Roman Catholics from the communion of their church, can be adduced; it is of no value to assure them that the object of the school is solely to convey moral and religious instruction by means of the Bible and the Bible alone, without any notes, comments, or catechetical lectures whatsoever, and that they recognize no sect or party amongst the children in their schools. The priest's answer invariably is, 'we cannot allow the Bible to be read by the people,' 'they must only hear such explanations from it as we choose to give.' On expostulating with a younger priest here, on this subject, he replied, he was only obeying the orders of his bishop, whom he was bound to obey, by the most solemn and sacred oaths taken at his ordination, and of which his bishop frequently reminded him, nor did he execute his directions with that severity he ought; for he was positively directed by his bishop to bring all the children who were sent by their parents to this school before him, and while he denounced all the curses of the church against their parents by name, the children were ordered to curse their own parents, by pronouncing audibly at the end of each curse, Amen!!!

"It is a precept of the divine law to 'honour thy father and mother; and he that curseth father or mother let him die the death,' Matt. xv. 4. But the Popish bishops and priests order, that children shall curse their fathers and mothers; and they that shall refuse to curse their fathers and mothers, shall be cursed, and that bitterly, by the Holy Mother Church.

"To counteract the growing avidity for education amongst the lower orders of the people of Ireland, the priests have established in most parishes what are called monks' and nuns' schools, that is, schools kept by monks and nuns, for what they are pleased to term the moral and religious education of the poor Roman Catholic children,—the entire of which nearly consists in teaching the children to repeat their Catechisms and Rosaries—it is evident that the sole object of establishing these schools is to prevent the children's being sent to the free schools of the Hibernian School Society, and thereby hold them in ignorance; complaints are frequently made by the parents that their children, after a close attendance at these schools for two or three years, do not learn as much as children sent to the free schools do in as many months; and the writer has known instances, where even poor labourers have preferred paying something for their children's education rather than lose their time at the schools of these monks and nuns, who are generally as ignorant as their predecessors of the 9th and 10th centuries. To support these establishments every means are used to prevail on Roman Catholics, living and dying, to give or bequeath a proportion of their properties to such pious uses; and the great merit of keeping poor Catholics from Protestant heresy is pointed out to them in the most glowing colours.

"However, in the division of the booty thus obtained, things do not always go on so smoothly as they could wish. Take a recent instance of some notoriety, which occurred in a pretty large town in Ireland. The pastors of the Holy Mother Church having prevailed on a wealthy Papist to bequeath, for the good of his soul, the interest of a large sum of money for the education of poor children in the Roman Catholic faith; the monks and nuns each contrived to possess themselves of a moiety of this property for the purpose or pretence above-mentioned, and left the parish priest in the lurch; but as his reverence thought he had as good a right to his share of the booty as the monks and nuns, who had made vows of poverty! he endeavoured to wrest it out of their hands, and made representations to the trustees that the parties in possession were totally unqualified to teach the children, being ignorant themselves of the very rudiments of learning. Now as the priest's opponents could not perhaps well rebut this charge without first going to school, for which they were rather elderly, they attacked the priest where he was most vulnerable, they charged him upon oath, with being guilty of certain practices, not reckoned amongst Protestants at least, very moral; such as kissing the young females at confession, &c. but although these nuns did not throw the veil over the grossest crimes with which they charged their priest, I must, for they are too indelicate to be mentioned. The priest, you may be sure, did not remain an idle or an indifferent spectator during these proceedings; he also accused the brotherhood and sisterhood upon oath with perjury, the subornation of witnesses, and with more immoral practices of a more personal and private nature. How this dispute will end is uncertain, it being referred to a higher tribunal.

"The parishioners have also divided, part siding with the priest, and part with the holy fraternity; and to such a height has this enmity been excited, that they have more than once from invectives come to blows.

"'By their fruits ye shall know them,' is a short but very comprehensive direction, given us by our Lord himself for the examination of individual or collective character:—'For a good tree bringeth not forth corrupt fruit; neither doth a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit;' now applying this rule to the religion of Papists, we shall find, that their practice produces fruit the very reverse of every moral law contained in the Bible. Every religious rite and ceremony from the cradle to the grave is, amongst them, succeeded by the grossest sensualities; and whether we observe their christenings, weddings, wakes, or funerals, they are all attended with the grossest idolatry and superstitions, and succeeded (among the lower orders) by revellings, drunkenness, and such like; 'of the which,' says the apostle, 'I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they which do such things, shall not inherit the kingdom of God.' The priests in Ireland look upon the unmarried daughters of their parishioners as forming a considerable proportion of their wealth; for a large share of their fees or perquisites arises from their weddings,—no female being allowed to marry out of her own parish; the priests therefore are extremely anxious to encourage matrimony, and they are frequently engaged in match makings. It being the rule or custom for the guests invited to the weddings of the better sort to pay the priest according to their abilities, he is anxious that a large number should be invited, and that a plentiful dinner be provided at the bride's father's expense; the whisky is so abundant on these occasions as to be sometimes brought out in cans, the priest himself partaking largely of the banquet; piping, dancing, and drinking, continues through the night. On these occasions the priest himself generally opens the dance with the bride, particularly if the collections are large. A melancholy accident not long since occurred at one of these weddings—the chimney happening to catch fire, one of the party took up a can of whisky, which he supposed to contain water, and dashed it on the flames, the spirits instantly exploded, and blew up most of the company.

"One very bad effect must always result from the interest the priests have to promote marriages; which is, that instead of dissuading, they induce the poorest sort who can beg, borrow, or steal a guinea, to marry, without having any provision made for a family; and they thus entail poverty and mendicity on the country. I have known matches of this kind so hastily made up, that the parties contracting had not seen each other before that day, and so poor as to be obliged to borrow a ginuea for the priest, for he won't take less, and if the parties should be under any church censures, he requires more. Ireland is thus overpeopled with a poor, ignorant, superstitious peasantry; and what is worse, there is no prospect of any change in their circumstances, while Popery holds them in her iron grasp, whose interest it is to keep them superstitious, by keeping them in ignorance. Nothing except a national system of general education for the poor, agreeably to the plans of the Hibernian School Society, where the scriptures alone are made the reading book, can effectually and finally promote the moral, intellectual, and religious improvement of Ireland, and this subject is well worthy the attention of the legislature.—J. A."

This plain unvarnished narrative exhibits such a view of Popery, as ought to excite universal detestation, not against the poor deluded people, but at the conduct of their priests, whose sole business it seems to be, to maintain the reign of ignorance and error, to rob the people of their little hard-earned property, and to fatten upon the soil: yet it has lately become fashionable to eulogize these priests as if they were the most virtuous men in the world. Panegyrists of their own communion boast of the "spotless purity" of their character; Protestant senators, in both houses, vie with one another in expressions of commendation, or in tacitly admitting the extraordinary merit of these ghostly deceivers; and it is esteemed of so much importance to Ireland to preserve the breed, that a college was twenty-five years ago erected at Maynooth for the purpose, at an expense to the public, originally, of about £40,000, and an annual charge of about £8000 ever since. This was no doubt meant for the best; but I am persuaded nothing of this kind would have occurred had the real character of the priests been better known to men in power. No dissenting sect in Britain ever received such countenance and support as is thus granted to Irish Papists, and yet these Papists are incessantly complaining of being an insulted, oppressed, and persecuted people.

"In 1795," says a late writer, "Maynooth College was established by an act of Parliament; by which, certain trustees were empowered to receive donations for establishing and endowing an academy for the education of persons professing the Romish religion, and to acquire lands, free from forfeiture by mortmain. Little short of £40,000 was granted for its establisment at first; and in every subsequent session, a regular charge of £8000 has been made to parliament, for its annual support. I may add, too, that this does not appear to content them. I have heard it represented as trifling, by gentlemen of that better informed, or rather deeper initiated class of Romanists, as to faith and doctrine, which is recognised as composed of 'competent expounders,' while the encouragement of the Protestant charter schools has been spoken of with contempt, dislike, and jealousy." The True State of the Question, by Joseph Spearing, junr, p. 229, Cork, 1816. The tithe of the money thus thrown away by Protestants, in bolstering up a system of idolatry and superstition, would go a great length in teaching the people to read the word of God, upon the economical plan of the Hibernian Society; but it has not yet appeared politically necessary to teach the poor Irish to read the Bible; at least not so necessary as the maintaining a regular succession of Popish priests. Candour, however, requires me to say, that in this matter there was only a choice of evils. The Maynooth College was not endowed because our government wished to encourage Popery; but because it was reckoned better to have the priests educated at home, than to lay them under the necessity of going abroad for education. My opinion is, that the worst of the evils was chosen; but I do not profess to be a politician.

A correspondent has favoured me with the following recipe for making Italian soup, with which I conclude the present Number. The reader will not consider it below the dignity of my work, seeing it has so close a relation to the person of the present head of the Romish Church. It is extracted from Galiffico's Letters, relating to Italy and its inhabitants, 1816, 1817, translated by John Murray, London, 1820. After describing Cardinal Gonsalvi as the most popular minister that any Pope ever had, the author proceeds, page 23:—

—"Whatever may be the liberality of the prime minister, it is not sufficient to put a stop to the most absurd superstition. Little prints of the miracles attributed to the present Pope, were publicly sold in the streets of Rome; and some time before our arrival, an immense number of his shirts were sold in retail to the common people, and perhaps to better informed persons also, who fully believed that a small piece of one of them boiled in their soup, was the surest of all remedies against any disorder. I could not have credited this story, if I had not had it from a very honest merchant, who told it to me in the simplicity of his heart, as a thing of which no real Christian could entertain a doubt." It is not said whether the shirts were first washed; but it is to be presumed they were not; for washing would take the virtue out of them.

Another curious piece has come in my way this week, for which, I see by the proof sheet, there is room; and I insert it here, for the sake of preserving it to future times. It is what will be called a very devout prayer, by "His Most Christian Majesty," the king of France, on the occasion of the baptism of his young grand-nephew, the duke of Bordeaux:

—"Let us invoke for him the protection of the Mother of God, the queen of the angels; let us implore her to watch over his days, and remove far from his cradle the misfortunes with which it has pleased providence to afflict his relatives, and to conduct him by a less rugged path than I have had, to eternal felicity." This act of devotion was performed not a fortnight ago, by the sovereign of the most enlightened Popish kingdom in the world. Here there is no God acknowledged but a mere creature; and if such idolatry shall be persevered in, it is probable that the young prince, if spared as long in the world, will have to go over a still more "rugged path" than that of his predecessor.

No. CXLIX.

SATURDAY, MAY 19TH, 1821.

I HAVE still some accounts to settle with my long forgotten opponent, AMICUS VERITATIS, though after the exposure which I have made of the character of Popery, any farther notice of his errors may be considered almost a work of supererogation. It is necessary, however, that I keep my word, and therefore I must devote a Number or two to his service.

I observe, then, in the first place, that I have found him out to be a great literary thief. I have already shown that part of his declamation about good works was stolen, without acknowledgment, from a recent English publication. (See PROT. No. 121.) And I have made such farther discoveries as lead me to doubt whether he did not pilfer the greater part of what he gave as his own. In a letter which he published in the Glasgow Chronicle, dated 25th June 1818, (see PROT. page 27.) we read as follows:—"If frequency of repetition could give to misrepresentation the substance of truth, an indulgence would be of all scandalous things the most scandalous. Your correspondent seems to have adopted this principle; he conceives he may justly assume the privilege of saying what has been said by hundreds before him, and, therefore, without hesitation, condemns the practice of indulgences, in terms the most pointed and severe." Now this passage is stolen verbatim, without marks of quotation, from a pamphlet, entitled, "A Vindication of the Remarks on the Charge of the Bishop of Durham," 1807, p. 42, with only this alteration, to wit, Amicus strikes out "the Bishop of Durham," and puts "your correspondent," that is, THE PROTESTANT, in his place, which, if it were not mere words, would be a very comfortable translation for the said PROTESTANT; though both church and state would be losers, if a prelate so truly venerable and estimable were to be superseded by a mere layman of the North.

AMICUS then proceeds to proclaim his own courage, in the following terms:—"But I am not to be intimidated by a sourness of aspect: the shafts of ridicule will not in the least discompose me, and I can despise the meanness of sophistical reasoning, whilst I pity the prostitution of talent." What pity that so bold a man was so soon put to silence! and that too, by a writer so contemptible as to prostitute his little talent for the purpose of mere sophistical reasoning. Surely it would have been easy to refute such a writer; and though Amicus was denied access to the Chronicle, after I had withdrawn, he might have found means to publish his reply to the Protestant in some other way.

But we must come to matters of more importance. He said he had "endeavoured to prove that it never was a doctrine of the Catholic Church that a Pope or Bishop could grant an Indulgence to commit sin." When I first used the word "indulgence," I did it in the common English acceptation of the term, —"to grant, or be favourable to:" and there is scarcely a page of my work from the commencement, in which it is not shown that Popery is favourable to the commission of sin, either by connivance or encouragement, or positive enactment. But I am aware that in the language of Popish catechisms the word indulgence has a technical meaning somewhat different; though the consequence remains the same as that with which I charged it. When a man knows beforehand that he can purchase from his priest, a remission of the temporal and purgatorial punishment of his sins, the natural consequence must be, that he entertains no great dread of sin; and the indulgence operates as an encouragement to the commission of it; especially when it is considered, that exemption or relief from purgatory, necessarily implies exemption from hell, insomuch that he who obtains a plenary indulgence, entertains no dread of any future punishment.

But call it indulgence, dispensation, or what you will, the evil of which I complain, is, granting permission to do what is sinful. Of this the Church of Rome is notoriously guilty, for proof of which I need not go farther back than the recent bull of the Pope, which was given in my last Number but one, in which power is granted to dispense with certain laws, with regard to the marriage of persons nearly related to one another. Such marriages are either sinful, or they are not; if not, why are they prohibited? and if they are sinful, the Pope's authoritatively allowing them, is permission to commit sin. AMICUS triumphantly asserts, that if the Popish bishops could have granted indulgence to commit sin, Henry VIII. had never professed himself a Protestant; but I cannot suppose my opponent to be so very ignorant as not to know this was the very thing that led to that event. Henry, when scarcely come to years of discretion, married his brother's widow. This was an unlawful, and a sinful thing in the ecclesiastical reckoning; but he had a dispensation from the Pope for doing it. Afterwards he had some real or affected qualms of conscience, on account of what he considered an incestuous connection. He applied to the Pope to dissolve the marriage, which he durst not do for fear of offending the emperor, who was the queen's brother: but he offered Henry another dispensation, namely, that he might have two wives. (See PROT. page 25.) Gross as Henry's notions of morality were, he was not bad enough for this; and finding that the Pope would not comply with his request, he threw off his yoke altogether, which was perhaps the wisest thing he ever did.

Amicus Veritatis attempts to evade the evidence which I had adduced of the great wickedness of his church in the article of indulgences, by doubting some of my facts, and denying others. "The doctrines or theses of Tetzel," says he, "were publicly condemned by the Pope's nuncio, Miltitz, and consequently cannot be Catholic doctrine;" for the truth of which he refers me to Mosheim and others. From the following extract the reader will judge how far this is correct; speaking of Miltitz's conference with Luther, we are informed that Miltitz "loaded Tetzel with the bitterest reproaches, on account of the irregular and superstitious means he had employed for promoting the sale of indulgences, and attributed to this miserable wretch all the abuses that Luther had complained of. Tetzel, on the other hand, burdened with the iniquities of Rome, tormented with a consciousness of his own injustice and extortions, stung with the opprobrious censures of the new legate, and seeing himself equally despised and abhorred by both parties, died of grief and despair. This incendiary being sacrificed as a victim to cover the Roman Pontiff from reproach, Miltitz entered into a particular conversation with Luther, at Altenburgh, and, without pretending to justify the scandalous traffic in question, required only, that he would acknowledge the four following things: 1st, That the people had been seduced by false notions of indulgences: 2dly, That he (Luther) had been the cause of that seduction, by representing indulgences as much more heinous than they really were: 3dly, That the odious conduct of Tetzel alone had given occasion to these representations: and 4thly, That though the avarice of Albert, archbishop of Mentz, had set on Tetzel, yet that this rapacious taxgatherer had exceeded by far the bounds of his commission." Mosheim by Maclaine, Cent. xvi. § 1.

Now, here is not a word that implies a condemnation of Tetzel's indulgences, but only of Tetzel himself. Like other doers of dirty work, he had overdone his part, and brought disgrace upon his superiors and employers. The bull was given under the authority of the Pope himself, the words of which are given in the THE PROTESTANT, page 18. This Miltitz had no right or power to condemn, and he does not profess to condemn it. If he had, he must have published another bull for undeceiving the many thousands whom Tetzel had deceived. But nothing of the kind was done. The people were allowed to believe in the efficacy of the indulgence which they had received and paid for; and there is not so much as a hint that the benefit of it was effected by the irregular and superstitious means which had been used for promoting the sale.

My second proof was a letter or bull of indulgence granted by the present Pope to the people of Cork. Amicus considers this so trifling and inapplicable as hardly to require notice; but the fact is, he could not notice it in the way I called the reader to do, without divulging the truth, that that very indulgence was a permission to commit sin, for it calls itself a "plenary indulgence," and "in form of a jubilee." Let Amicus inform the reader in what manner the Papists in Ireland celebrate their jubilees, and the question will be set at rest: unless, indeed, the principle avowed by a Papist to the writer of the letter in my last Number, be admitted; namely, that drunkennes and licentiousness of every description are not sins when committed on a saint's day, or day of jubilee.

Amicus writes in the true spirit of Jesuitism. When a document is produced that bears hard upon his church, he holds up a face of brass, and boldly calls it a forgery, though he had never seen or heard of it before. This is the case with the bull of the Pope, inciting the Irish Papists to murder their Protestant neighbours, which I quoted from State Trials. (See page 18.) This document, as I have already said, was produced on the trial of Lord M'Guire, one of the rebels, and its authenticity was not questioned by either the court or the prisoner. Both the fact and the document were new to Amicus Veritatis: and he found no reply to such confounding evidence, but by applying the rule which Papists have always at hand; that is, a broad denial, or charge of forgery. "Respecting the bull of Pope Urban VIII." says he, "the style and language in which it is couched assure me that it must be a forgery. Its very date increases my suspicion." Here Amicus leaves the subject, and raises a great hurricane of words about persecution; which makes it very evident that he knew nothing of the matter; but he had the presumption to imagine that his bare word, written in ignorance, would be sufficient to set aside the recorded evidence of the court of King's Bench! This is a piece of impudence which the Pope himself could scarcely match, even with infallibility at his back,—I say, Amicus was writing in ignorance. This is very evident from his mode of expression. The style and language assured him that it was a forgery; but after being assured, we find him only suspecting; and the date of the bull increased his suspicion. Now as for style, it was given in English, and it would of course partake of the manner of the translator; and its date was May 25th, 1643. It remains with Amicus to show cause why a document of this date should not be received as authentic.

As if doubtful that this charge of forgery in this individual case would not be believed, Amicus makes the following general, and sweeping accusation, believing no doubt, that if he got this to go down, all the documents I should ever produce would go for nothing: —"Who would take a review, from the year 1577 to the year 1684, that would not shudder at the horrific scenes that were the consequences of accumulated forgeries? It was this detestable habit of fabrication and lies, in your chief reformers, which drew from the pen of the Rev. Mr Whitaker, a Protestant divine, the following remarkable confession:—'Forgery,' says he, 'appears to have been the peculiar disease of Protestantism; originally coming forth as a kind of leprosy upon the brow of Presbyterianism in Scotland, it was conveyed by the intercourse of vice to the profligate head of the church of England.' Whitaker, Vol. III. p. 49." This, the reader will perceive, is nothing but mere rant and general assertion. Amicus does not so much as pretend to confirm his charge against our chief reformers by adducing a single fact; and they must be credulous indeed, who will take his bare word as sufficient to set aside the testimony of numerous contemporaries who have borne witness to the integrity as well as the intrepidity of the chief reformers, both in England and Scotland. Amicus may assert that John Knox was a coward; but most persons, instead of making a serious reply, would despise his folly, and laugh at his impudence. Yet the assertion would be every whit as true as that our chief reformers were addicted to lying and forgery. I defy the whole host of Jesuits to prove the fact with regard to any one, whom British Protestants have been accustomed to regard with veneration as instrumental in effecting the glorious work of overthrowing Popery, and establishing true religion. I do not deny that numerous Jesuits, in both Scotland and England, assumed the name of Protestants, and made a trade of lying and forgery, with a view to obstruct the progress of the reformation; and it was one of their main tricks to lay their own crimes to the charge of Protestants, so that some late writers, affecting to believe antiquated calumnies, have taken upon them to accuse the reformers of the vices of their enemies.

Amicus lays great stress upon the confession of Whitaker, who it seems was a Protestant; but the reader does not require to be informed, that there are, and have been, many Protestants, who maintain the hostility of Papists against the spiritual Christianity, and strict discipline of the first reformers, especially of the Scotch Presbyterians. Such men will condemn Popery as a system, on account of the political mischiefs which it occasions; and on this account they are far enough from being Papists; but they will gladly join with Papists or infidels, for the purpose of throwing discredit or ridicule on the character of men who were holier than themselves, and who would not have acknowledged such as they for brethren. Such seems to have been this Whitaker. He was not a Papist, for he did not worship the Virgin Mary; but he chose another Mary as an object of almost equal idolatry; namely, the unfortunate Queen of Scots; and he was as ready to break a lance with any man who should doubt of her purity, as Loyola was with any one who denied the immaculate conception. Dr M'Crie has, in few words, justly characterized this writer as "the fantastical Whitaker, a late author who has equalled any of his predecessors in prejudice, and exceeded them all in the illiberal and violent abuse with which he has treated the most respectable of his opponents." In the style of this writer, "Knox was a fanatical incendiary—a holy savage—the son of violence and barbarism—the religious Sachem of religious Mohawks." He styles Buchanan, "a serpent—a daring calumniator—leviathan of slander—the second of all human forgers—and the first of all human slanderers." Dr Robertson he calls "a disciple of the old school of slander—a liar—and one for whom bedlam was no bedlam." See Life of Knox, Vol. II. pp. 153, 257. notes. I suppose the reader will set down Whitaker himself for a raving bedlamite, and attach to his assertion no authority whatever: but it is of more consequence to know the fact, that Mr Malcolm Laing, in his dissertation on Queen Mary's accession to Darnly's murder, appended to his History of Scotland, has shown that every one of the documents represented by Whitaker as forged, is genuine.

I had given the Popish doctrine of indulgences, from the French Catechism, translated by Dr Bogue, of Gosport; on this Amicus remarks: "I am not astonished that Bogue's Catechism was the one which your correspondent has selected for his purposes. This is a work which was translated from the original French, by a Protestant, merely for the purpose of exercising his talent of ridicule, and it was natural to suppose that your correspondent would apply to such a valuable source of misrepresentation." Here again we see that Papists hold it for certain, that no Protestant is to be trusted, even in the simplest matters. It does not appear that Amicus had ever seen the Catechism in question, or that he had compared the translation with the original; but merely because the translator is a Protestant, it must of course be a "source of misrepresentation." This, I suppose, furnishes an index to the state of morals among Papists. They know their own tricks, and those of one another, so well, that they take every man for a knave.

> "There's none so ready to detect a cheat,
> As he who is a knave complete."

I have the happiness of being personally acquainted with Dr Bogue, as many of my readers are; and I believe a man of more sturdy integrity is not to be found in the three kingdoms. I consider his personal character a sufficient guarantee for the fidelity of his translation; but though it were otherwise, no reasonable man will suppose him to be such a fool, as, by a false translation, to expose himself to the detection and derision of any schoolboy who might choose to bring his work to the test. In point of fact, I have never read or heard of any man calling in question its fidelity, except Amicus Veritatis; and he does it merely upon the ground that Dr Bogue is a Protestant. He does not attempt to point out a single error in his translation; but he gives him the praise of being more candid than The Protestant, and even seems to admit that he gives a just definition of what is meant by an indulgence.

Having in former Numbers (120, 121.) answered that part of Amicus's letter which relates to good works and the character of Luther, I proceed now to the next in order, (see page 30.) and I shall despatch what relates to indulgences before I take up any other subject. Amicus affects to find me tripping in the following sentence, with which I began one of my letters in the Chronicle:—"I know that Papists maintain that indulgences are meant only to relieve sinners from the temporal punishment which their sins deserve, or, at most, from the pains of purgatory." "Now, surely," says Amicus, "what Catholics maintain, constitute their tenets;" and certainly so it would, if they were honest men; and if they made a candid profession of their faith to all persons, and at all times: but it is notorious that this is not the case. Papists in Glasgow will disavow many things which were firmly maintained by Papists of old, which are still maintained in other parts of the world, and which they themselves would maintain in other circumstances, and among a less enlightened people. We are not therefore to take what they maintain in words to their Protestant neighbours, as the real tenets of their church, in opposition to the bulls of Popes, and the canons of councils; and with this explanation of what I wrote three years ago, the reader will be able to judge whether I contradicted myself, as my opponent triumphantly boasts

I had given the real doctrine of Rome on the subject of indulgences, as laid down by St Thomas Aquinas; and for the sake of readers who may not possess the first part of the Protestant, I shall repeat it here. The words are few, but they are very comprehensive: "There actually exists an immense treasure of merit, composed of the pious deeds and virtuous actions which the saints have performed, beyond what is necessary for their own salvation, and which are therefore applicable to the benefit of others; the guardian and dispenser of this precious treasure is the Roman Pontiff, and, of consequence, he is empowered to assign to such as he thinks proper, a portion of this inexhaustible source of merit, suitable to their respective guilt, and sufficient to deliver them from the punishment due to their crimes." Amicus denies that this quotation is correct, for which, of course, there is nothing but his bare assertion. He does not so much as say what is erroneous in it; and I suspect that he knows no more about it, than he does of Pope Urban's bull, which he was first assured, and then suspected to be a forgery. I made the extract from the Edinburgh Encylopedia; and I have since found that it is verbatim, the same as that given by Mosheim, Cent. XII. Part II. To the rest of this paragraph I gave a very particular answer in my 18th Number, in which I showed that the doctrine of indulgences, in its most modified form, operated as an encouragement to commit sin.

With an equally bold front, Amicus pronounces, "The Tax of the Apostolic Chancery" to be a forgery; * and he says, that "to such gross and palpable forgeries a denial is all that can be expected." It is evidently all that he had to give, though he had promised more, which was never forthcoming. If this was a forgery, it was the work of Papists; it was extensively circulated and sold among Papists; and it was actually the standard by which, for many years, the priests were in the practice of selling absolution for the crimes specified. Protestant princes complained of it to the council of Trent, and mentioned it as one of the abominations of Popery, on account of which they rejected the council. If it had been a forgery, this was the time for the Church of Rome to have cleared herself; but there was not among all the fathers of the council so much impudence as Amicus has in his single person. In short, they had not the face to deny what was known to the whole world. They pretended, indeed, that Protestants had corrupted it, which was impossible, seeing it was corruption itself all over; and to show their regard for it, the holy council put it, along with the Bible, into the Index Expurgatorius.

No. CL.

SATURDAY, MAY 26TH, 1821.

IN my last Number, I paid my respects to AMICUS VERITATIS, and replied to several passages in his letters, which I had not particularly noticed before. It was, however, only a gleaning of passages that required the performance of this duty, as I had replied to some points very fully in the earlier part of my first volume, particularly in the Second Number, in which I exposed the imposition practised by Amicus, in garbling a passage of Luther's works, so as to make him appear to teach the lawfulness of concubinage and polygamy. In a subsequent Number, I showed that it had been the practice of Popish writers, for two hundred years, to garble the same passage, in the same way, and for the same purpose; so that on the part of Amicus it was only another literary theft.

The exposure which an inspection of Luther's works enabled me to make on this occasion, made a deeper impression on the public mind, than any thing I had previously written. From long inattention to the subject, people had forgotten that Popery was a system of lies and imposition; but the example of a Papist, living in the midst of us, practising such an impudent literary fraud, had the effect of opening the eyes of many. Amicus had not the courage, after all his boasting, to attempt a reply; but it was one of the first things which the CATHOLIC VINDICATOR took up. He professed to make it the subject of his Second Number,—one of the two or three that had a pretty extensive sale; but he occupied almost the whole Number with a discussion of the law of divorce, which seemed intended to divert the reader's mind away from the imposition practised by his friend. This he despatches in very few words, as follows: —"He (The Protestant) actually charges him (Amicus Veritatis) with forgery; and for what? Because in quoting Luther's words, he refrained from giving the whole sentence, and suppressed the explanation, which made the reformer's case worse." This is all that we have in the form of a direct reply to the main charge—that of garbling a man's words, to make him speak what he did not intend to speak, which I called a crime equal to forgery; and these words of the Vindicator, if not a vindication of the deed, make it evident that he thinks very lightly of it; nay, in another part of the Number, he calls it "perfectly correct and honourable," from which we may estimate the degree of credit that is due to the fidelity of his quotations. Andrews does not fall behind Amicus, in boldly asserting the thing which is not. It might have been expected, that from habit and long experience in defending Popery, he would have been able to write a credible lie; but it seems he cannot always do it, for the one which I have quoted carries its own refutation in its face. He represents Luther's explanation of his meaning, as making his case worse; and yet Amicus, whose object was to make Luther's case as bad as possible, "suppressed the explanation!" That the thing is a lie any person may satisfy himself, by reading the passage either in the original, or in the translation in the Second Number of the Protestant; and that the Vindicator knew it to be such, I cannot but believe, without supposing him possessed of a degree of stupidity, such as he would not thank me for ascribing to him. I will illustrate what I mean by supposing a similar case:—I maintain "that it is lawful for a man to marry two women, provided one be dead before he thinks of another." Now if any man, professing to give my words, should stop at the comma, substitute a period, and leave out the rest of the sentence, he would represent me as teaching polygamy. Then, suppose I had detected this imposition, and had charged the guilty person with it, and he in justification had pleaded, that he had only "refrained from giving the whole sentence, and suppressed the explanation, which made" my "case worse," what would the world think of such a controversialist? Just what all who know the Vindicator must think of him, seeing he declares such conduct "perfectly correct and honourable."

For the sake of illustration I have put the case in the strongest light; it is, however, a case perfectly analogous to that of Luther, which is the subject of dispute. He was speaking of the lawfulness of a man taking a second wife, his first being alive. In a case of obstinate desertion on the part of the wife, he says it is lawful; but explaining himself, he says, the man must not do it by his own authority; but must take all the regular steps which the law prescribes. The question at present is not whether Luther's doctrine be sound or unsound; but whether it be not gross imposition to pretend to give his doctrine in his own words, and yet leave out those which are essential to the understanding of it. This is the trick of a succession of Popish authors for more than two centuries—from Walsingham down to Amicus Veritatis, and which Mr Andrews attempts to vindicate. Such jugglery, if it were general, would unhinge the whole frame of civil society; and as it is unblushingly practised by Papists, Protestants ought to take care how they attach credit to any thing that they say or write.

Since I have the Second Number of the "Catholic Vindicator" under my hand, I may as well despatch it at once, which I shall do in few words, and then return to Amicus Veritatis.

Mr Andrews says a great many true and undisputed things about the unlawfulness of a man putting away his wife; and he cites our Saviour's words, Mat. xix. 3—9, as if they were against both Luther and The Protestant. Now I do most certainly admit the divine authority of these words, and so, I suppose, did Luther. I believe it is not lawful for a man to put away his wife, and take another, except in the single case which the divine Lawgiver allows. This, I suppose, no Protestant disputes; and therefore, the Vindicator's flourishes and harangues about it, are mere beating the air. Luther was not speaking of a man putting away his wife; but of a wife's obstinate desertion of her husband, or refusing to dwell in conjugal duty with him. This is a case for which, so far as I recollect, there is no provision made in the New Testament; and it would not be fair to apply to it any of the peculiarities of the ceremonial law. In as far as marriage is a civil contract, it falls to be decided by civil authority, like other matters of right and wrong, between man and man, or man and woman, according to the general rule of equity laid down in Scripture. Marriage imposes on the parties a religious obligation, under the form of an oath, or sacrament if you will, to be true to one another; but the infidelity of the one party relieves the other: yet the relief itself is a civil right, and can be obtained in a well-regulated community only according to law; that is, by a regular process of divorce. In this case if a man does put away his wife, he does it according to the law of the land, and consistently with the word of God.

But the case of a wife deserting her husband, and obstinately refusing to be reclaimed, is not a case of putting away. The words of Christ do not apply to this at all, and as there is no rule in the New Testament for this specific case, it seems, like other things of a civil and temporal nature, left to the decision of temporal authority. In the event of a divorce in this case, there is no injury done to the wife. It is only a confirmation of her own act. According to the doctrine of Luther, she was to have the most liberal indulgence. The husband was not allowed to take advantage of a hasty thought, or fit of passion, on the part of his wife, though followed by actual running away. He was not allowed to divorce her, until she had been publicly admonished a first, second, and third time, and that in presence of the church, that there might be no doubt on the mind of any person that she was wilfully obstinate. I think the only error of Luther in this matter was, that he made divorce a sentence of the church, when it should have been of the magistrate.

At all events Luther was only laying down what he considered an equitable rule of procedure, in an extreme, and perhaps difficult case. Suppose the doctrine erroneous, and suppose there is no legal relief for man or woman in the case of the one obstinately deserting the other, Luther's believing and teaching the contrary may be considered an error in judgment, but it is no proof that he practised or taught immorality; yet this is the very thing which Papists are incessantly labouring to fix upon him, and for which they refer to that part of his works. This should satisfy every impartial person that there is no real evidence of immorality on the part of Luther, either in life or doctrine, seeing his enemies can find nothing against him, but by garbling his words, and misrepresenting his meaning.

The Vindicator objects to my translation of Luther's words, that I have used the expression ought not, for could not; and though I am ready to maintain that my rendering is in the true spirit of the original, I do not think the distinction of any importance. I will even concede to him that the sexes could not be without each other, without very deplorable consequences; and though he should rail ever so much against Luther for teaching this doctrine, I must be excused from entering more particularly upon the defence of it. My work was not undertaken for the purpose of defending the doctrines of Luther, or of any other man; but to point out the false, insidious, and malignant character of Popery. And seeing that Papists have selected Luther, above all others, as an object on which to spew out the venom of their malice, I have thought it proper to spend a few hours, both now and formerly, in exposing their wickedness to the world. The character of the great Reformer needs not the weak advocacy of my pen; but any pen may, and every pen ought to be employed in holding up to universal detestation, the arts of fraud, falsehood, and forgery, by means of which the Church of Rome has so long imposed upon, and held in bondage the nations of Europe.

There is a great deal of ribaldry in this Number of the Vindicator, which I do not choose to answer. The main object of it is, to vindicate Amicus Veritatis' misrepresentation of Luther; and having replied to this, I leave all the extraneous matter to answer for itself. Amicus Veritatis proceeds as follows:—"Your correspondent says, that those indulgences of Luther which I adduced were solitary cases, I now ask him in short words:—Did not Luther issue more bulls than one, to absolve the Germans from their obedience to Charles V.? Did not Calvin and Beza require the Huguenots to rebel against their sovereigns? Did not Knox, and the Presbyterian clergy of Scotland in general, with thundering anathemas, impel their followers to shake off the dominion of the Queen Regent, and afterwards that of the unfortunate Mary? What else were the sermons and writings of Cranmer, Ridley, Jewel, Poynet, and other fathers of the new religion at home, in the reign of Queen Mary, but so many decrees in favour of rebellion, and so many absolutions from the duty of allegiance? Did not a new set of Protestant doctors, proceeding, however, upon the fundamental principle of the former, that of private judgment in the interpretation of Scripture, and in all matters of religion, preach up, on the alleged authority of God's word, the justice and necessity of deposing and murdering their king, the gallant Charles I., and subverting the constitution? Did not the same doctors, on the same pretended sacred authority, absolve the prisoners of war who were released to them at Brentford, from the oaths they had severally taken of not serving again in the republican army? Did not the most famous prelates and divines of the establishment, a few years before, pretend to absolve the King himself from his sworn duty to his subjects, and the very law of nature, by deciding that he was at liberty to send his favourite minister, Strafford, to the scaffold, notwithstanding he himself was conscientiously persuaded of the Earl's innocence? He will not now have to complain that I depend upon one or two solitary cases: let him answer these, and I can furnish him with more." PROT. page 31.

The above, it will be allowed, has a very imposing appearance; but the intelligent reader will perceive, that it does not furnish a single case of improper conduct on the part of any of the Reformers, even from Luther's time down to Charles the First's time. Amicus had furnished one case which presented Luther and his colleagues in an unfavourable light. I admitted this, page 23.) and remarked that it was a singular and solitary instance; and so it seems now admitted to be, for no other case of a like nature has yet been adduced by my Glasgow opponents, or their London proxy. I request the reader to observe, that putting a question is not adducing, much less proving a case; and that, according to the laws of literary warfare, no man is obliged to prove a negative. It does not, therefore, rest with me to prove that Luther, and Calvin, and Beza, and the other reformers did not do the bad things here laid to their charge; it rests with Amicus to prove that they did: at least let him bring his accusation in a tangible form; let him produce his evidence, and he may depend upon its being carefully sifted.

I shall endeavour to bring down this subject to Amicus' capacity in the following manner: Did not a certain professional gentleman, in a state of intoxication, oftener than once stumble into a certain house in the Saltmarket? Did he not require the inmates to rebel against their lawful superiors, and take the household affairs into their own hands? Did he not, with thundering anathemas, call for the officers of police to carry off a poor unfortunate quean who threatened to give him trouble? What were his letters to a London radical Popish editor, the associate of Wooler and Co., but so many absolutions from the duty of allegiance, unless "Catholic Emancipation" were granted in its fullest extent? I am merely supposing things; and I now ask Amicus Veritatis what he would think, if he were called upon to disprove all the bad things which these questions may be understood to insinuate against a third person in whom perhaps he feels no particular interest? He would give the whole a broad and indignant negative, with a much better grace than he gives to his denial of plain facts and public documents. He would say, Bring a specific accusation against the professional gentleman to whom you allude; produce your evidence and let him have a fair trial; but in the meantime let him have the privilege of a British subject—that of being counted innocent until he is proved guilty.

Now this is all that I demand on behalf of the reformers, in whom I have no particular interest, for I do not derive my faith from them; and though all the bad things insinuated against them were true, it would not affect the truth of the Protestant religion as opposed to Popery. I am entitled, however, to deny the whole indictment as laid. I deny that Luther issued more bulls than one, to absolve the Germans from their obedience to Charles V. I deny that Calvin and Beza required the Huguenots to rebel against their sovereigns; and so on, with regard to all the other counts in the libel. There are some of them, indeed, which I would deny with some explanation, some with a greater, and others with a less degree of positiveness. This denial ought not to be understood as maintaining that such crimes were not committed, for that would be the absurdity of asserting a negative, which no man can do who has not a perfect knowledge of all the words, and writings, and actions of hundreds of men who died from 150 to 300 years ago. It rests with the enemies of the reformers to prove them guilty of the crimes laid to their charge, which they have not yet done. No man can reasonably be called upon to prove their innocence. That ought, as in all other cases, to be taken for granted till there be evidence of the contrary.

It is easy to put into half a page a series of questions which it would require a volume to answer. It is easy even for persons of a convenient conscience to assert a number of falsehoods which it may be impossible to disprove; and hence it is that the burden of proof ought always to rest with the accuser, or maker of an injurious assertion. One may even by mistake make an erroneous assertion, which it is not easy to correct; an instance of which occurred very lately, which I give as an example. A noble peer, pleading the cause of Papists, declared that two noblemen of distinguished merit, and high in naval and military command, in the reign of Elizabeth, namely, Lords Howard and Cobham, were both Papists. This was to show that Papists might be safely admitted to places of power and trust; and though the assertion was made in the best informed assembly in the world, there was not one prepared to set the speaker right. A writer in the Morning Post has since shown that both these noblemen were zealous and distinguished Protestants; but he confesses that it cost him the labour of a whole week to find sufficient evidence of the fact. If it was so difficult to rebut an assertion made in ignorance, with regard to two of the greatest subjects in the kingdom, how much more difficult must it be to repel all that malice may invent against men so politically insignificant in their day as were Calvin and Beza, and a host of others who are not named at all, but introduced under the general designation of the "fathers of the new religion at home," "a new set of Protestant doctors?" &c.

If I were to go into a detailed refutation of the slanderous matter contained in this paragraph of Amicus' letter, I would show, that were certain facts which he alludes to fairly stated, they would redound much to the honour of the persons whom he meant to condemn. For instance, in the case of Knox, and the Queen Regent, a fair historian would not say, that he and his colleagues, with thundering anathemas, impelled the people to shake off her dominion; but that they did by sober reason, and reference to the first law of our nature, persuade the people to defend themselves and their wives and children against treachery and lawless violence, by the traitorous attempts of the said Queen Regent, to overpower them by means of a French army, and thereby subject the kingdom to a foreign yoke. This princess not only broke her engagements with the people once and again; but she actually maintained the doctrine, that the promises of princes were not to be considered as binding, and that the performance of them ought not to be rigorously exacted. She and her advocates therefore have no right to complain that the people considered themselves relieved from their engagement to her, especially as their liberties and their lives were at stake; and great credit is due to the leaders, whoever they were, who persuaded the people to such unanimity and moderation, that they were able to maintain their privileges, with comparatively small expense of human life, which would hardly have been the case had they been under the control of factious and violent demagogues.

At the same time, I freely confess, that I think ministers of the gospel are out of their element, when they take a lead in matters of political strife. But so far as this applies to the reformers, Popery was to blame for it, as well as for all its other mischiefs. In the Church of Rome there was little learning or science of any kind but among the clergy; it was their policy to keep all this among themselves; insomuch that they were usually the best qualified to manage state affairs, as well as those of the church. The Reformation found society in this condition; and the ill-taught laity, even among nobility, naturally looked up to their ministers for instruction and counsel as they had been accustomed to do; and the ministers, conscious of their own powers, and of the extent of their influence, believed it to be their duty to exercise such influence in the way they thought best for the good of their country. In the hand of Providence they were made the instruments of incalculable good, on account of which their names ought to be held in everlasting remembrance; but no man can tell how much more good might have been done, had there been a sufficient number of well qualified statesmen to manage state affairs; and had Knox and his colleagues attended to nothing else but preaching the gospel of the grace of God to a people, most of whom were as ignorant of it as the most benighted heathen. If, instead of troubling themselves with the affairs of a worldly kingdom, they had directed the whole force of their mighty minds against the kingdom of Satan, by preaching the gospel, and otherwise instructing the people, the result might have been a thousand times more beneficial to the state than that of their mixed labours was; because they might thus have been the instruments of effecting the more extensive prevalence of genuine Christianity among all ranks of the people, and so have established the political prosperity of the kingdom upon the surest basis.

But lest Amicus should suppose that I evade his questions, and that I shrink from a defence of the Reformers, I hereby call upon him to produce his charges in a tangible form. Let me have the very words of Luther, Calvin, Beza, Knox, Cranmer, Ridley, Jewel, Poynet, and all the rest whom the Churches of England and Scotland acknowledged as their chief Reformers, in which they are alleged to have taught sedition and rebellion, and I have no doubt I shall be able to show that they teach no such thing, without garbling and misrepresentation, as in the case of Luther, referred to in this Number.

No. CLI.

SATURDAY, JUNE 2ND, 1821.

I CONCLUDED my last Number by calling upon AMICUS VERITATIS to produce the very words of Luther, Calvin, Knox, and other Reformers, which, he says, were so many decrees in favour of rebellion. To allow him time for so arduous a work, I shall now commence my reply to THE CATHOLIC VINDICATOR, which will occupy a few Numbers; and if Amicus cannot persuade the editor of the Chronicle, or any other editor to insert his letter; and if he is unable to undertake the publication of it at his own expense and risk, he may send me the manuscript, and I shall readily give it room, if it be of moderate length, and written in a style fit to appear in THE PROTESTANT. But I give him warning beforehand, that I will not receive and publish such ridiculous bombast as that which he gave from Counsellor Philips, at the conclusion of his last letter in the Chronicle, to which I reckon this short notice a sufficient reply, and with which, for the present, I conclude my reply to Amicus himself.

WILLIAM EUSEBIUS ANDREWS, The Catholic Vindicator, was, in his own opinion, a great man; but he allowed THE PROTESTANT to be greater, in the proportion that Goliah of Gath was greater than David, the shepherd of Bethlehem. He set out by declaring it to be his object to "bring this champion of the Philistines to the ground." But whether it was because his own head was nearer the ground, or was heavier, or had a greater affinity with the clod, it so happened, that it reached the ground first. His Vindicator expired in December 1819, as described in my 80th Number; and exactly a year thereafter, his "Orthodox Journal" also became defunct. This I mention with no small regret. It was a very useful work for me, and will be found so by any other who shall attempt to lay open the true character of Popery, because it exposed many Popish secrets which are not revealed by any other journalist. I had heard of his fame before he made his appearance on this field of battle; and it was boastfully given out by our Glasgow Papists, that a little David would soon annihilate the great Goliah.

In his first Number, (col. 3.) Mr Andrews promised to follow THE PROTESTANT through the several counts which he had drawn up against Papists: which I suppose must mean that he intended to make a distinct reply to every thing that I had advanced against them; but in the very same Number, (col. 6.) he says, "To follow THE PROTESTANT through all his windings and flippant remarks would be impossible, without bewildering the reader." This was the Vindicator's "second thought;" and I suppose he considered it the best; for in point of fact, he did not follow me through any one subject of discussion, or fairly engage with any one series of argument. He often set down whole paragraphs of my work, with a view, as he pretended, to refute them; but his attempts at refutation, are very like what I suppose to be a charge of a troop of cavalry upon a firm square of rank and file, with fixed bayonets. Whenever they come within sword length of the bayonet's point, the horses, by a natural instinct, which is very commendable in the dumb creatures, turn about and fly as fast as their legs can carry them. This is precisely the way in which Mr Andrews behaves with regard to almost every paragraph of THE PROTESTANT which he quotes for refutation. When we think we have him just at the point of aiming a deadly blow at the head of his enemy, in less than the twinkling of a eye we find him scampering away after something else, and the object of his attack remains untouched.

This will appear from the following quotation from my 19th Number, and his remarks upon it in his first, col. 4—6, which I give at length, even repeating my own words, as the passage is short; and it may not be convenient for all my readers to refer to it:—"Previous, however," says Mr Andrews, "to entering upon the first charge laid against us, I shall notice a second declaration which THE PROTESTANT makes in his 19th Number, p. 103, as follows:—

"'My work was not undertaken with the view of defending the Church of Scotland, or any other church. I took my stand upon the true Protestant doctrine of the Bible, and the Bible alone, as the foundation of my religion; and what I find not authorised by the Bible, if it should be in the church of which I am a member, or any other, I am ready to disavow it as antichristian. Popery had taken so fast a hold of the human mind throughout all Europe; it had insinuated itself so much into all the feelings, and principles, and practices of the people; its influence has so descended from one generation to another; and it has become so interwoven with our modes of thinking, and speaking, and acting, that I question if there be any visible organized church in the world that does not possess less or more of the antichristian leaven. When the cry shall be made, Babylon the great is fallen! is fallen! there will be found, perhaps, some in every church crying, Alas! alas! for something that they have lost.'"

"Here," says the Vindicator, "I am ready to give THE PROTESTANT due credit for the sincerity of his professions, but I cannot speak much in praise of the accuracy of his judgment. He did not commence his undertaking with a view to defend any church; he takes his stand upon the Bible. As to the former, I believe him. His object undoubtedly is not to defend but to slander. Throughout the whole of his effusions, he has slandered and calumniated the doctrines of the Church of Rome, and in this very quotation he libels the Saviour of mankind, and declares him indirectly a LIAR.—He says he takes his 'stand upon the true Protestant doctrine of the Bible, and the Bible alone, as the foundation of his religion.' The Bible testifies that our Saviour solemnly promised that he would establish a church which should be a light to the world, a guide to the ignorant, a city placed on a mountain; that it should be guided by the Holy Spirit till the end of time, and that the powers of hell should not prevail against it. These solemn promises of Truth itself must convince every rational man that a church has been, is, and must be, in existence, which cannot err, and this church our Saviour commanded every one to obey, under pain of being declared a heathen or a publican; and yet the Protestant questions 'if there be any visible organized church in the world that does not possess less or more of the antichristian leaven;' which is the same as to say, that there is not a church but has committed error, or fallen under the power of darkness; whereas the Redeemer assures us there shall be one without spot or wrinkle, to the consummation of the world. Now, reader, who are we to believe? The Protestant, or the Bible, on which he pretends to take his stand, but contradicts the plain text of it, to support a groundless insinuation. He professes to be a member of the church of Scotland, and considers it to be, 'in constitution and doctrine nearer the divine pattern exhibited in the Bible than any other established church in the world.' This is a second acknowledgment, that he does not believe the veracity of the Son of God, but makes him an asserter of falsehoods, inasmuch as he contends there is not an infallible church on earth, when the Scriptures say there is, and shall be one. With this specimen of impious arrogance, need we wonder that he has perverted the tendency of the catechisms used by Catholics to instruct the ignorant, for the purpose of fixing his base charges on the Church of Rome?"

The reader is requested to trace, if he can, the connection between my paragraph, and the Vindicator's remarks upon it. I was avowedly speaking of visible organized churches; and he answers me partly by referring to Christ's words to his apostles as the light of the world; partly by Christ's promise to his spiritual invisible church; and partly by asserting that there is one infallible visible church in the world, a thing that never had existence, but in the distempered brains of deceiving monks, and of those who were deceived by them.

In language sufficiently revolting for its grossness, he accuses me of contradicting the Saviour, for questioning if there be an existing visible organized church free from the antichristian leaven, which implies errors in practice as well as in doctrine. By church, in this sense, I mean such a body of professing Christians as that which existed in Jerusalem, and in Corinth, and in Antioch; or if you please, such bodies as now exist, established, or not established, in most countries in Europe. Now, I think, he who should assert of any one of these, that it is free from error in both doctrine and practice, would easily be convicted of contradicting some part of the word of God. The apostles warned the early Christians that perilous times were coming, when some should depart from the faith. Antichrist was working in their own time; and of seven churches in the Lesser Asia, who were addressed by Christ himself, through the medium of the apostle John, only two were found without blame; that is, free of Antichristian leaven; but where to find two, or even one such, in the present day, I suppose that nobody can tell.

The Vindicator has the impiety to ascribe to our Saviour, words which none of the evangelists have ascribed to him. "The Redeemer," says he, assures us there shall be one (church) without spot or wrinkle to the consummation of the world." There is nothing like this in the New Testament; and Mr Andrews does not say where he found it. The words, "Not having spot or wrinkle," do indeed occur in Paul's epistle to the Ephesians, chap. v. verse 27, but they are not spoken of any church on earth till the consummation of the world, but of the church in heaven after that period, or of that part of it which is in heaven already: that is, the heavenly spouse, which Christ shall present unto himself, a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, but holy and without blemish. Mr Andrews means the words to apply to the Church of Rome, as she is, and always has been, which is as great an insult to the common sense of mankind as transubstantiation itself. It is worse than to say, that all that is pleasant and odoriferous, is to be found in raking up a dunghill. This is not a subject of argument, but a mere matter of fact, with regard to which any man may satisfy himself, by inquiring into the character of the Church of Rome, and of her members wherever they exist.

This writer proceeds with his assertions in a sort of hap-hazard way, without the least regard to truth. Thus he asserts that I profess to be a member of the Church of Scotland, though the paragraph in my 19th Number, in which he affects to find this, is perhaps the only one in my whole work in which the reader may find the contrary. I gave that church the commendation which I thought was her due, and plainly stated that I was not guilty of self-commendation in doing so; from which an ordinary degree of shrewdness would have inferred that I did not belong to the northern establishment. It has been my study to advocate the Protestant cause without identifying myself with any particular sect of Protestants; and though I cannot say that there are no traces of any sectarian peculiarity in my work, I do venture to say, that they are very faint, and such as would not lead any Protestant church to regard me as an enemy.

The Vindicator quotes, col. 8, a long paragraph from the first Number of THE PROTESTANT, on the subject of indulgences, in which I charged the Church of Rome with monstrous cruelty, for not granting relief to suffering souls in purgatory, without being amply paid for it; and in which I showed that by this means she drained immense sums from the people who confided in her. Now, what does the Vindicator say in reply to this? Why, he says nothing at all, but that if this were true, the Pope and his clergy must be very rich, whereas it is well known that they are all very poor; nay, so very poor is the Pope himself, "that the regent of this kingdom," says Mr Andrews, "is said to have offered him a loan of some thousand pounds sterling, to enable him to carry on his government." This would probably go sweetly down with Papists, who would be glad to hear that their holy father was in such favour with the Prince Regent, now the Sovereign of Great Britain and Ireland; but Protestants know that the Prince Regent never had thousands of pounds of his own to throw away for such a purpose; that of course he never could make such an offer to the Pontiff; and they will believe that the thing is a mere figment of the Vindicator's own invention.

It would be easy to show that the Church of Rome did amass immense wealth by means of her indulgences and pardons, and that without calling in question the fact of the present poverty of the Pope and his clergy. Bands of robbers may levy immense sums from travellers, and yet not be able to enrich themselves. Money gotten over the devil's back is said to be spent under his belly; and it is very possible that where thousands of idle luxurious priests are saddled upon a poor people, the former may not be able to get rich by their exactions upon the latter. Without enlarging upon this subject, I think it is fair to infer, that the Vindicator admits the truth of my statement, seeing he has nothing else to say in reply to it.

It is an avowed doctrine of the Church of Rome, that men must, in some way or other, satisfy divine justice for themselves. This I showed to be contrary to the tenor of the gospel, in which it is declared that God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them, 2 Cor. v. 19, and the reason why trespasses are not imputed to men themselves, is, because they were imputed to Christ, who in the words of the apostle Peter, "bare our sins in his own body on the tree;" or in those of Paul, "God made him who knew no sin, to be sin (or a sin-offering)for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." Now if our sins were imputed to Christ, and if he bare them, and gave himself to God in sacrifice for them, he either made complete satisfaction to divine justice, or he did not. To suppose he did not, would be to disparage the work of the divine Saviour, and effectually to reject the gospel; and if we admit that Christ did make complete satisfaction, to say that God still required men to make satisfaction for themselves would be to ascribe injustice to Him, than which nothing can be more impious. I represented the command to believe in Christ as virtually a command to forbear attempting to satisfy divine justice for ourselves; that is, to forbear what is hopeless, and absolutely impossible; and to accept the merciful provision which God has made for our salvation by the death of his own Son. This is a salvation not only from the punishment of sin, but also from sin itself; for the end of Christ's death is, that we being dead to sin, should live unto righteousness; for which also provision is made by the renewing and sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit, who furnishes the only means, and suggests the strongest motives for abounding in all good works. No man can think of satisfying divine justice in his own person, without looking upon God as such a one as himself; one whose justice is not very strict, and which is easily satisfied. Hence I represented Papists as having as low ideas of the divine Being as heathens who worship the work of their own hands: and Mr Andrews confesses this to be the case with himself, if the above doctrine be true. But let us have the avowal in his own words:—

"Such are the opinions of THE PROTESTANT as to the duty of satisfying divine justice; but if his doctrine is not more calculated to grant leave to commit sin than the Popish doctrine of indulgence, I confess I am one of those who have as low ideas of the divine Being, as the man who worships a stock or a stone for the Deity. It is asked by the question (in the French catechism) above quoted, if it is the intention of the Church of Rome to free us by indulgences from the obligation of God? (what a strange expression!) Now what is the obligation a Papist is taught he owes to God? He is to love God with his whole heart, with his whole soul, with all his strength, and with all his mind; and his neighbour as himself. From this obligation it is averred the intention of the church is not to free us; consequently she cannot intend either to indulge us in the commital of sin, or command us to commit it. On the contrary, the last answer quoted expressly declares, that she intends, by the dispensation of indulgences, to excite more and more in the heart PIETY and LOVE of God. The assertions, therefore, of THE PROTESTANT are paradoxical, inasmuch as the declared intentions of the Church of Rome are meant to produce the contrary tendency imputed to them by the writer."

It was that branch of the doctrine that requires men to satisfy divine justice for themselves, that I accused of gross impiety; and certainly nothing can be more hostile to piety and the love of God. The essence of true piety is obedience to the command of God. Now his command to all men is, that they repent and believe the gospel, and unless they obey in this respect, there is nothing else that God will acknowledge to be obedience; and therefore nothing of the nature of piety towards God. The belief of the gospel invariably produces a grateful acknowledgment of the grace of God in providing a Saviour for the guilty,—of the infinite love of Christ in giving himself a ransom for us; that is, laying down his own life to satisfy divine justice for us. The experimental knowledge of this love powerfully operates in the way of producing all obedience; and nothing else can do it. But the Church of Rome commands her members to satisfy divine justice for themselves; which is a command to commit sin in the highest possible sense; for it is to declare that the atonement of Christ is insufficient; it is to slight and reject the provision which infinite mercy has made for the restoration of a ruined world. It is not enough for the Church of Rome that her children are naturally enemies of God; she commands them to continue so. This is the necessary effect of disbelieving the perfection of Christ's satisfaction, by which alone sinners are reconciled to God, and made his friends: and that man must necessarily be an enemy who is unreconciled; that is, one who has yet to satisfy divine justice. In the mind of such a man there can be no right thoughts of God at all. No love, no gratitude, no obedience. Hence it is that the minds of all true Papists are so estranged from the worship of God, and so degraded as to worship mere creatures, even the work of their own hands.

Towards the conclusion of his first Number, the Vindicator gives us an abundant quantity of hackneyed nonsense about the doctrine of salvation by grace being unfriendly to good works, and an encouragement to sin, all which was anticipated and answered by the apostle Paul in his epistle to the Romans.

I have thus made a beginning in my reply to the Catholic Vindicator; and I suspect it will be very uninteresting to my Protestant readers, partly from the repetitions which it is necessary to make; and partly from the quality of the subject, which requires me sometimes to descend below the level of polite writing, and to adopt the less dignified alternative recommended by Solomon, Proverbs xxvi. 5. I shall not quote the words, as I hope, by omitting them, to send my Popish readers to the Bible for once. I find this the most irksome duty I have been called to perform since the commencement of my work. The style and matter of the Vindicator are so low and disgusting, that I anticipate no pleasure to myself, or profit to the reader in exposing his errors and misrepresentations; but as he was the public organ of our Glasgow Papists, and, I suppose, of all the strict, genuine Papists in the kingdom, including Dr Milner, whose patronage he enjoyed, and whose sentiments he was understood to express, it becomes necessary to pay more attention to his work than if it contained only the errors of an obscure individual. I shall, however, relieve the tedium of my subject by inserting from time to time such light matter as may come in my way. I am indebted to a correspondent for the following counterpart of the story of the Pope's shirt, which was given in Number 148, from Galiffe's work,—not Galiffico's, as the word was erroneously given. The following is from the Literary Gazette of May 12th, in the account of the death and funeral of the Sultan of Souracarta, in the island of Java; and it shows that the affair of the shirt, like most other Popish customs, was derived from heathenism.

"The washing of the Sultan occupied above two hours. The water used for the purpose, and in which, for the first washing, tamarind and burnt rice straw were mixed, was taken up by the bystanders as a mark of respect. Some wash their head and body with it; others swallow a part of it. In this operation it is the duty of the eldest son to clean with a large piece of linen those parts which most require it. The linen, being afterwards cut into small pieces, is distributed among the family and bystanders, who ascribe to it a certain occult power to preserve them in all the dangers of life."

No. CLII.

SATURDAY, JUNE 9TH, 1821.

THE CATHOLIC VINDICATOR begins his third Number with the following statement:—"Some of my readers, for whose opinions I entertain a high regard, disapprove of my using the terms papist and popery; but in this adoption I am not singular, as I only follow the example of the venerable and learned Gother in his Pulpit Sayings, and afterwards in his Two-fold Character of Popery, a work of general estimation among Catholics, it having passed through many editions, and is still in circulation. In Mr Gother's time, Catholics were always designated as Papists, and at this day there are many of our adversaries, from the prelatic chair to the cobbler's stall, who will not allow us any other title. Of this description of bigots is THE PROTESTANT; and as I am not very nice about names, so as I know the principles I defend are correct, I felt a willingness to humour my adversary, purposing, when occasion offered, to convince him, if he is open to conviction, as well as every candid Protestant who reads my VINDICATOR, that a Papist, and a Papist only, is entitled to the honourable distinction of Catholic; and that the system of Popery, and this system only, is the true church on earth, established by our Saviour and his apostles. This opportunity THE PROTESTANT has given me in the following remarks made by him on a similar objection to the epithet, by one of the newspaper disputants."

He then quotes a paragraph from my second Number, in which I showed that the Church of Rome never was universal, and of course never entitled to the word Catholic. This is another matter of fact, which every reader of history knows as well as he or I; and which scarcely admits of any argument, but a mere reference to history. Notwithstanding, Mr Andrews makes a very long and wordy reply, the substance of which is that the Church of Rome is entitled to the designation of Catholic, because her members are spread all over the world; and because she was the instrument of converting every country in Christendom to the Christian faith. I am by no means induced to concede to him that this last assertion is true; but though it were, it would not bear him out, for Christendom itself is far from being Catholic or universal; and as for the other fact, that the Church of Rome has her members spread all over the world, if that be enough to constitute her the Catholic church, then I maintain that Scotland is the universal empire, and Presbytery is the Catholic religion, for in what part of the world are not Scotchmen and Presbyterians to be found? But I am afraid the Jews will contest the point with us, for they were once the true church, and they are to be found at this day in all parts of the world, even in places where Popery and Presbytery would find it difficult to obtain a settlement.

The Vindicator admits that Popery and Papists are proper designations of the Church of Rome and her members; then it is surely unreasonable to charge with bigotry those who persist in using these proper words, and who refuse to use such as they think improper. In every controversy it is of advantage to use terms in which both parties are agreed; and when there are such terms, he would be a bigoted controversialist who would require his opponent to use any other. It seems, however, that the Vindicator's concession on this point was not agreeable to some of his brethren; and he justified himself by stating the fact that in Gother's time, that is, about a century and a half ago, Catholics were always designated as Papists. Luther, in his commentary on the Galatians, tells us, that Papist was the name by which they themselves chose to be called, and I have never read that this was contradicted by any of his contemporaries; but for about half a century our Scotch and English Papists have laboured hard to get themselves called Catholics; and through the indifference of Protestants they have very generally succeeded. Now what can be the reason why the professors of an unchangeable religion should be so anxious to change its name? for as they now call themselves Catholics, they call the system Catholicity. The fact is, the more respectable of them, mingling with Protestants, in an enlightened state of society, could not but come to know, that there were many horrible ideas associated with the words papist and popery; and such of them as were readers of history could not but know the fact, that these ideas had their foundation in truth;

hence they were led first to disavow the name, and to assume one less offensive; and one, which being recognized in a creed approved by Protestants, they thought would commend them to favour in a Protestant country.

The bulk of this more respectable class of Romanists differ from genuine Papists in many respects, though they are willing to be called by the same general name, Catholic. Though they all profess to hold fellowship with the Pope as the head of their church, there is as real a schism between them as between any two sects of Protestants. Their nobility and gentry in England, associating with Protestants of the same rank, have insensibly acquired a refinement, and in some instances a liberality, quite unknown to men of their communion in former times, and in countries where their religion is still predominant. They are conscious that they are not the savage, superstitious beings that all history represents Papists to have been, and which they know them still to be, in Spain, Portugal, and Italy. Hence, along with the name, Popery, they have renounced a great deal of the thing; and some of them go so far as to proclaim their dissent from the Church of Rome as papistical, and profess to adhere to it under a less objectionable character, which is virtually to give up its infallibility. But Mr Andrews takes his stand upon the system of Popery, as it was, is, and shall be, while it exists. He has on his side at least one Vicar apostolical bishop, most of the inferior priests, all the Jesuits, and almost all the common people; and he writes against the liberal and respectable part of his own communion with as much abuse and virulence as he did against THE PROTESTANT.

I shall confirm what I have said above by the authority of a doctor of their own, and, I suppose, the most learned man that has risen among them for a hundred years. Addressing one of his own bishops, Dr Geddes says:—"'The enlightened and well-principled Catholic,' your lordship observes, 'remains unshaken and unseduced.' Certainly, my lord. But who is the enlightened and well-principled Catholic? This is yet to be demonstrated. The CATHOLIC religion not only permits its children to be dutiful subjects, but expressly commands them to be such: but not so, my lord, the POPISH religion. These two ought never to be confounded. The former is a most amiable matron, who inculcates nothing upon the minds of her children but the peaceful maxims of the gospel; the latter is an ambitious termagant, who has often encouraged her children to commit almost every sort of crime. It was the Popish, not the Catholic religion, my lord, which (not to go out of our own country nor back to a remote period) could in 1537 excite 20,000 men, under the conduct of a monk, to rise in rebellion against Henry VIII. in consequence of his subjects having been freed from their oaths of allegiance by a bull of Paul III. It was the same Popish religion that, in 1539, attempted to depose the same King, and place on the throne the Dean of Exeter.* It was this religion that sent Radulpho into England in 1568 for the vile purpose of corrupting the loyalty of the English Catholics, and to pave the way for the famous bull of Pius V. which deprived Queen Elizabeth of her title, dominion, dignity, and privileges; and forbade all her subjects, under pain of anathema, to obey her! It was this religion that, the very next year, again erected the standard of sedition under the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland; and their want of success the Popish Surrius thinks, might have been owing to this, that the Papal denunciation had not been sufficiently made known to all the Catholics. It was this religion that in 1580 sent Parsons and Campion into England, with the qualified bull of Gregory XIII. which, in the hands of those two artful men, was deemed a surer means of raising a rebellion, than the more violent one of his predecessor. It was this religion that in 1588 sent the Spanish Armada to invade England, fraught with a 'powerful army, plenty of money, and treasures of indulgences, for the purpose of dethroning a queen, against whom Sixtus V. had confirmed all the censures of Pius and Gregory; and granted a full pardon to all who should embark in the holy enterprize! In short, my lord, I make no hesitation to affirm, that the Popish (not the Catholic) religion has been, mediately or immediately, the cause of almost all the political disturbances in Europe since the days of Gregory VII. It is against this religion, my lord, that we CATHOLIC † DISSENTERS protest; and whose interests ye Vicars apostolic appear to be contending for." See Life of Dr Geddes, by John Mason Good, London, 1803, pages 229—231.

Such is the true testimony of the most learned Romanist of the present age. He plainly declares that the religion of which the Pope was the head, was the cause of almost all the mischiefs which afflicted Europe for ages; and that the head of the church himself was the chief instigator of sedition and rebellion. Yet with a wonderful degree of inconsistency, he continued a priest of that church, acknowledging the Pope as his spiritual father, but intreating that he might not be called by his odious name: and the name which he chose for himself was so general, that it could not properly distinguish him from any other person professing Christianity, or his church from any other

* Afterwards Cardinal Pole.

† He means dissenters from the Church of England, and by the word Catholic, he distinguishes himself and brethren from Protestant dissenters; but the bishop whom he addressed strongly objected to the expression, declaring that Catholics were not dissenters from the Established Church, but truly and properly the church itself.

church called Christian. It is pretended to remedy this defect by adding another word; and so Papists are generally styled by Protestants, Roman Catholics, which implies a contradiction something like, particular general or limited universal.

It is enough for my present purpose to have it acknowledged by Mr Andrews, that it is Popery that he is defending, and to have it certified by a priest of his own communion, that this system of Popery has been the cause of unspeakable mischief to all the nations of Europe. The extracts which I have made from both these authors, will be found, I hope, to bear me out in what I have long been maintaining, —that Popery is the proper designation of the Romish system; and that this Popery is the convicted enemy, not only of real Christianity, but also of all that is amiable and virtuous in the world.

In treating this subject, the Vindicator writes as follows:—"In the first place our Redeemer singled out Peter as the rock on which he founded his church, and he assured his disciples that this church should exist to the end of the world, and that the gates of hell should not prevail against it. Here then we have a visible church, fixed upon an immovable basis, and in a distinguishable situation, defying the attacks of error and the malice of devils, to the end of time. In the second place, our blessed Lord chose twelve poor men, whom he commissioned to go to the farthest bounds of the earth, to teach all nations the truths and precepts he had imparted to them, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and commanding all men, under pain of eternal damnation, to hear and obey the church which they should establish. Accordingly, on the commencement of their mission, they formed a creed, called the apostles' creed, which was to be a symbol of the faith of themselves and of their followers for ever; and we find them in their acts, recorded in the New Testament, exercising that authority over the new converts which Christ had given them, when he said, 'he that heareth you, heareth me; and he that despiseth you, despiseth me; and he that despiseth me, despiseth him that sent me.' Here then we have an organized church, and that it was both visible and organized, is placed beyond a doubt, by the following words of St Matthew, chap. xviii. ver. 15—18."

Here we have the old figment of Peter being the rock on which Christ built his church, asserted with as much confidence as if the absurdity of it had never been demonstrated. This said rock, that is, Peter, is declared to be an immovable basis, against which the gates of hell, that is, the attacks of hell, and the malice of devils, should never prevail; and yet we find, in the very same chapter (Mat. xvi.) in which Papists affect to find that Peter is the rock, that he is exhibited by the inspired penman, as a mere reed, shaken by the wind; nay, it is declared that Satan had so far prevailed against him, and had got him to enter so far into his views, that the divine Saviour found it proper to call him by the name of the adversary to whose suggestions he had given a too willing ear:—"Get thee behind me, Satan; thou art an offence unto me; for thou savourest not the things that be of God, but those that be of men." A feeling of tenderness for the apostle, who was upon the whole a good and honest man, has led many readers of the Bible to suppose that such hard words were not spoken to Peter, but to the devil, who had somehow got the possession of his mind, and the command of his tongue; but there is no foundation for this tenderness. It was Peter himself, and none else, who at that time was called Satan, that is, adversary; for he was not a demoniac, or one possessed by a demon, who spoke through his organs, without the consent of his own mind. It was of his own deliberate judgment that he presumed to rebuke his divine Master, and to advise him not to submit to the shame and the pain of being crucified. In plain words, his advice went to dissuade Christ from finishing the work of our salvation on which he had entered. In this he acted the part of a very Satan, or adversary of both God and man; and this too, after that had taken place, which Papists understand to have constituted him the immovable rock against which the gates of hell should never prevail. It is painful to be obliged to advert to the fact, that even after this, the devil prevailed against this apostle once and again; but Papists by exalting him above measure, and putting him in the place of God, lay us under the necessity of showing that he was but a man.

The next thing of importance which the Vindicator asserts, is, that the apostles, on the commencement of their mission, formed a creed, called the apostles' creed, which was to be a symbol of the faith of themselves and of their followers for ever. Where he obtained this piece of information he does not say. I find, indeed, in the Douay catechism, after the question, Who composed the creed? Answer, The twelve apostles. But the Douay doctors were such moderns that they could know no more of the matter than we do. I have before me a large volume, entitled, The History of the Apostles' Creed, fourth edition, London, 1719, in which I find no evidence that the apostles were the authors of this comprehensive, and I must say, truly orthodox symbol. It contains just twelve articles, from which, I suppose, it is to be inferred that each apostle contributed one. The work to which I have referred does not assert this, but it gives it as an ancient opinion, "That the apostles were the real authors of the creed, and that they assembled together by their mutual consent to compose and frame it," page 8. The author shows that there is no foundation for this; and indeed to suppose that the apostles of Christ, who had so much important work upon their hands, should be gathered together from the different parts of the world, to compose a short summary of what any man of common understanding might find in their published epistles and narratives, appears to me no less absurd than to suppose that twelve of the most learned men in Europe should be assembled in solemn council, to decide upon the best means of making a pen, which every scribe is, or ought to be, able to do for himself. Systematizing was no part of the work of either apostles or prophets. There is a divine simplicity in their mode of communicating heavenly instruction, which corresponds with the other works of God; and as no one field or cavern of the earth exhibits a classified arrangement of minerals or plants, so no work of inspired men was intended to give us a systematical or classically-arranged view of Christian doctrine. I find no fault with any man for endeavouring to classify and arrange the truths of the word of God, for the edification of himself or others, but let it be always regarded as a work of man, and not ascribed to the divine Spirit, or those who wrote under his infallible influence.

I admit that this short summary of doctrine is unexceptionable in itself, if taken with the explanatory note of the Westminster divines about Christ having descended into hell, which explanation, by the by, shows how difficult it is to draw up a summary of religious belief on which all Christians shall agree. The articles of this creed are so few and simple, that it must have been composed before controversies were greatly multiplied; and those who framed it were no doubt agreed about the meaning of the clause, "he descended into hell;" but in process of time this itself became a subject of controversy; one party maintaining that Christ, after his death, went down to the place of punishment,—another, that the words signify only that he went down to the grave, that is, was buried, and continued for a time in the state of the dead. It is not doubted that this creed is a composition of great antiquity. The whole of it as it stands in the English Liturgy, was generally received as an authoritative confession in the fourth century; but the word "Catholic" was not originally in it, as is admitted by Rufinus, who wrote a commentary on it about the end of that century. This word must have been foisted in to serve a purpose, after the Church of Rome had begun to put forth her claim to be obeyed as the mother and mistress of all churches: and though the word is retained in all the Protestant versions of this creed, I do not see how they can make sense of it, consistently with their other avowed principles, otherwise than by applying it to the spiritual church or spouse of Christ, which is not of this world but saved out of it; that is, washed, and sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the Spirit of our God. This church is catholic, not considered as pervading the whole world, but as comprising the whole company of those who are saved, out of all kindreds, and tongues, and people, and nations.

That the Catholic Church must be visible and organized, the Vindicator attempts to prove from Christ's words, Mat. xviii. 15—18. "Tell it unto the church," &c. "From this explicit command of Christ to his disciples," says Mr Andrews, "to have recourse to the church, in the event of any dispute or division arising among them, it is demonstrably evident that there must be a visible organized church on earth having power to decide all questions referred to her, and her decision, in every instance, was to be final and binding on all believers, under pain of being considered an outlaw or an unbeliever, and consequently no longer a member of the true church," col. 37. Now it is very clear that our Lord's words, even with the Vindicator's comment upon them, prove the very reverse of what he means to establish. When Christ says, "Tell it to the church," he certainly means such a church as a man could speak to, which is impossible of the Romish, or any other church that pretends to be Catholic or universal. The command is perfectly intelligible, and obedience to it was practicable and easy in any church which apostles founded, and in which the earlier bishops presided. But none of these churches pretended to be universal. The assumption of this title distinctly points out the Church of Rome as not being such a church as Christ was speaking of; for it is impossible to tell any thing to such a body, not even in the sense of a representative church, if we were to admit this meaning of the word, for she has had neither council nor convocation for 300 years; and therefore, according to her own doctrine, she can have given no decision, during that period, that is "binding upon believers." Perhaps Mr Andrews will allege that telling a thing to the priest is enough; but he has a great deal to do before he can prove that a priest is the church; or that all the priests together are entitled to this honourable appellation.

The Vindicator blunders away through many a long page, applying to one thing what Christ and the apostles spoke of another;—such for instance as the promises that the church should be preserved in the world till the end of time, and that the gates of hell should not prevail against it. This is what no Christian disputes; and yet Mr Andrews constantly writes as if I denied it. Thus because the Culdees and Waldenses were overcome by the Church of Rome, he argues that they were not the true church. The same thing will apply to the churches in Jerusalem, in Samaria, in Judea, Galatia, and the latter Asia. We are sure these were true churches, yet most or all of them have been overcome and destroyed: yet the promise of Christ has been, and shall most certainly be fulfilled in all its extent. Plain facts therefore assure us, that this promise was not given to any particular church; that it does not insure perpetual existence to any one of them; but only to his church in that sense in which it is general, comprehending all real Christians in every age and country in the world. If I have succeeded in establishing this to the reader's satisfaction, I have answered the half of the Vindicator's great volume.

No. CLIII.

BY wresting my words, and making what I wrote of a church in one sense of the word apply to the church in another sense of it, the Catholic Vindicator affects to find me guilty of innumerable contradictions; and he triumphs mightily in the victory which he supposes he has obtained. I can scarcely allow myself to set this down to the account of mere stupidity; for though my opponent had never read the New Testament, he must have seen from some of my earliest papers, that I made the distinction to which I have here alluded. He might indeed question the propriety of the distinction, but seeing I laid it so plainly down, he must have been perfectly aware, that whatever my errors, in his opinion, were, the things which he calls contradictions were made such by himself, by perverting my words.

This general reply may serve for all that he has written about my "endless contradictions," a charge which is reiterated through almost every Number of his work. He was aware that he was writing for people who would readily swallow any thing that might have the appearance of being a defence of their superstition, or that would place its great enemy in an odious light. Besides, as his main object was to draw me away from the vital parts of the controversy, and to engage me in a quibbling personal contest, he made the bait as tempting as possible, by the grossness of his accusations, and the unfair use of my words, expecting that I would instantly and eagerly defend myself against his attacks. Had I done so, I should never have got a step farther in exposing the errors and abominations of Popery. I would soon have disgusted my readers, as he did his, by personalities and other unprofitable discussions, and for want of support, my work, like his, would have lingered with difficulty to the end of a single volume.

In the 4th Number of the Vindicator, we have some paragraphs of THE PROTESTANT, in which the design and tendency of Popery are contrasted with the design and tendency of Christianity; and which conclude with the following sentence:—"With regard to the destruction of men's bodies, we know from history that Popery has slain its thousands and tens of thousands; but with regard to the ruin of souls from this fatal error, (that of depending upon something else than Christ's death) no man can tell the millions who have been by Popery deceived, to their everlasting destruction." See the whole passage, page 115.

Let us now hear the reply which the Vindicator makes to this passage:—"Poor Popery! if this description of thy case be true, what must thy votaries expect at the last accounting-day? The picture is really horrible to behold, and even THE PROTESTANT, in contemplating it, is fearful that some of his readers will condemn him for colouring it too much; for he adds, 'I am aware that I am here treading on delicate ground, and that many who take themselves for Protestants, will accuse me of uncharitableness, but I care not, while I know that I am upon sure ground, which I consider myself to be, while I proceed upon the plain declaration of the word of God.' Presumptuous man! before advancing so frightful a charge against the most numerous body of Christians throughout the universe, in all ages, oughtest thou not to have searched into the principles of their religion, from the writings and instructions given by their own pastors and doctors, rather than from the disfigurations of their enemies?" col. 55. Then follows a morsel of verbal criticism on the word "consider," in one part of a sentence, which it seems is not strong enough to correspond with the word "know" in another, in which, perhaps, the Vindicator is right for once. After this he finds that if my representation be true, Papists are "bloody and unfeeling murderers and cut-throats;" which inference I shall not dispute with him. Again, if such were Popery, "how are we to account for its triumphing over the works of darkness, by supplanting the heathen rites of Paganism, and planting the cross of Christ in their stead; and this, not by sacrificing other men's lives, but by its agents and dupes laying down their own, when persecuted to death by their adversaries?" Thus by putting a question, he takes for granted the very point at issue; for if Popery had triumphed over the works of darkness, I should have no argument against it; and it is well known that instead of supplanting, Popery adopted the rites of heathenism; and planting the cross in the Popish sense, is setting up as great an idol as ever heathen worshipped. I merely state this here; but I refer to the numerous proofs of Popish idolatry which I gave in Numbers 39 to 62.

The Vindicator, of course, denies that Satan is the author of Popery; and then he proceeds, questioning as follows, in which he still takes for granted the very thing that is disputed:—"If the design of Popery originated with Satan, is it probable, is it reasonable, to suppose that God would permit its influence to extend over the whole of Christendom; nay, that Christianity itself should owe its rise to this very influence?" We have been accustomed to think that Christianity owed its rise to the mercy of God; but no, says Mr Andrews, Christianity owes its rise to the influence of Popery! Then Popery, as I have all along maintained, is not Christianity, but something different from it, for a thing cannot take its rise from itself; and, farther, Popery must have been before Christianity, for a thing cannot rise out of that which comes after it. Here I will admit that the Vindicator is right once more. Popery, as I had been showing, owes its origin to the devil. He infused the very essence of it into the minds of our first parents when he persuaded them to disbelieve God, and to believe a creature. This, I say, is the concentrated essence of Popery as it exists in the world at this day. This was before Christianity; and it is so far true that Christianity took its rise from it, that it furnished occasion for the display of divine mercy, by the promise of a Saviour, in which Christianity originated.

But to proceed with the Vindicator's catechism,—for Popish writers have all a trick of putting what they mean to affirm into the form of a question, insomuch that some of them cannot understand a series of questions otherwise than as so many assertions; thus when I put a few questions to Amicus Veritatis by way of supposition, (Number 150, page 620.), I have been understood by Papists, as I am informed, as affirming something about Amicus himself. Had this been the case I would not have said, "I am merely supposing things;" for I hold it to be as sinful to write as to speak a lie. I know nothing whatever of him personally; and if he has suffered any injury among his brethren or others, by the misapprehension of my words, I hope this declaration will do it away. But to proceed:—"Were not our Saxon ancestors converted to Christianity by the missionaries of Rome? Do we not owe the principal privileges enjoyed by Protestants under the British constitution to Catholic or Popish kings, prelates, and people? Were not all the infidel nations that received the faith of Christ converted by the agents of Popery?"—and so on to the end of the paragraph. Now it is evident that the Vindicator intends these questions to stand for affirmations; but there is not one of them founded in truth: Rome did not convert our Saxon ancestors to Christianity, but to Popery; and Gregory, the Pope of the day, instructed his missionaries not to abolish the Pagan rites of the Saxons, but to adopt them, which Christianity would never have done. It is not true that we owe our principal privileges to Popish kings, prelates, and people; for the greatest of all these privileges is liberty of conscience, which was never enjoyed under a Popish king, and scarcely enjoyed at all with any degree of security in this kingdom till the Revolution of 1688, when the government became decidedly Protestant, and a Papist was declared incapable of sitting on the throne. As for the infidel nations which Rome boasts of having converted, it is well known that their conversion consisted in little else than a change of one set of idols for another.

In all that the Vindicator has said on this subject, there is nothing that has so much as the appearance of a reply to my paragraph about the bloody cruelty of the system which I am opposing. The amount of what he has written in opposition to my statement, is, If this be true, Popery is cruel indeed; but he has not a word to prove that it is not true; and he cannot, he knows that he cannot, disprove my statement, for they are recorded in letters of blood, visible to every man who reads the history of Europe for the last six hundred years. Instead therefore of meeting the charge of bloody cruelty which I brought against his church, by disproving or confessing it, he calls away his reader's attention to many fine things which he pretends Popery has done; as if a man charged with murder should plead not guilty, because he had given a penny to every beggar whom he had met on the street for the last two years. I suppose no jury would acquit a convicted murderer on this account; neither can I acquit the Church of Rome of bloody cruelty, because her defenders plead that she has done some good in the world, while they cannot prove even this on her behalf.

The Vindicator is so extremely diffuse and wordy in all his discussions, that I am in some instances under the necessity of abridging. I know he will find fault with this; and I know also that I would not satisfy him by quoting any of his paragraphs entire, unless I were to quote them all, that is, transfer his whole volume into mine, which would be rather a hazardous undertaking, for I am persuaded the buoyance of The Protestant would not be able to preserve the united mass from sinking into contempt and oblivion. The reader may however rest assured that what I give as quotations from the Vindicator, marked as such, are his identical words; that I have not, and shall not garble or distort any sentence, so as to misrepresent his meaning. Indeed, if I were so wickedly inclined, there is no temptation to it; for there is more answerable matter than I shall be able to get through for a long time, without distorting or affecting to misunderstand his words.

He tells me that I ought to have searched into the principles of their religion from the writings and instructions given by their own pastors and doctors, rather than from the disfigurations of their enemies. I have done the very thing that he requires of me; and he knows that I have done it; but it is the practice of all Popish writers to represent their adversaries as acting a contrary part, and thus they attempt to do away the impression which writings hostile to their system are likely to make. My practice has been, when entering upon the discussion of any Popish dogma, first to lay down the doctrine in the very words of their own great and approved authors; and in the most important points, I have not rested satisfied with the words of individuals, however great, but have had recourse to public documents, approved catechisms, and even to the authentic canons of the Council of Trent; and I have not yet been convicted of misquoting or misrepresenting a single word. The Vindicator's call upon me, therefore, to have recourse to doctors of his own church, is a piece of disingenuous finesse, to make his readers believe that I know nothing of the system, but have taken a misrepresentation of it from its enemies.

The Vindicator affects to find, from the admissions of Luther and Calvin, that Popery is more favourable to good morals than the new religion. "Thus," says he, "writes Luther:—'Men are now more revengeful, covetous, and licentious, than they were ever in the Papacy.'—Postil. Super. Evang. Dom. I. adv. Again, 'Heretofore, when we were seduced by the Pope, every man willingly performed good works, but now no man says or knows any thing else, but how to get all to himself by exactions, pillage, theft, lying, usury, &c.' Postil. Super. Evang. Dom. 26. Post. Trin. Calvin complained in the same strain of the effects of the new system. 'Of the many thousands,' said he, 'who renouncing Popery, seemed eagerly to embrace the gospel, how few have mended their lives! Nay, what else did the greater part pretend to, but by shaking off the yoke of superstition, to give themselves liberty to follow all kinds of licentiousness.' Lib. de Scandalis. Such was the state of morals among the new evangelized people under the influence of Protestantism, as testified by its originators; and is it improved at the present period?"—Then follows a long account of the profligacy of manners in England in the present day, as proved by the reports in the house of Commons, and the records of the Old Bailey, all which is, of course, laid to the account of Protestantism. And we are invited to cast our eyes upon "Catholic" Ireland, and challenged to find, if we can, the same rapid progress of depravity and crime in that island.

To the last part of the above I shall reply first; and I admit that we have not of late had to remark, in Ireland, such "rapid progress in depravity," as in England, and even in our own city; because Ireland, I mean the Popish part of it, was so proficient in depravity long ago, that she had not the same room for "rapid progress;" and it is well known that her depravity was the offspring of her Popery. Besides, rapid as our progress towards depravity has been of late years, the most depraved spot of Great Britain is unspeakably less depraved than the average of the more Popish parts of Ireland. This is a mere matter of fact, for the truth of which I appeal to all who are acquainted with the state of both countries; and I await their verdict without any apprehension of being cast.

Besides, the progress of depravity in Britain, particularly in Glasgow, has been greatly accelerated by the influx of Irish Papists. This is another matter of fact, for which I appeal to our justiciary records, and to the personal knowledge of every public functionary in this city and neighbourhood. No writer but one who is in the habit of distrusting his own senses, or who writes for those who do, would have ventured a comparison between Britain and Ireland, with regard to their moral condition, with a view to prove the superiority on the side of the latter; but this Mr Andrews has done; from which the reader may draw his own conclusion with regard to his moral or intellectual condition.

Whether the words given as quotations from Luther and Calvin be genuine or not, I cannot tell. I have much reason to suspect a writer who publicly maintains that it is "perfectly correct and honourable" to give a half sentence as a whole one, and to suppress such words as explain an author's meaning. (See Number 150, page 619.) It would not be difficult to ascertain the fact; but it does not appear to be worth while. Luther and Calvin may have used the words here ascribed to them, without the least disparagement of the doctrines of the Reformation; and they may have used such language, not because the state of morals was really worse, but because they had acquired a more acute discernment of moral turpitude; as old, and especially religious old men have always been disposed to think the present age worse than the last.

It may be admitted, that when men shake off the yoke and the restraints of superstition, without coming under the influence of the gospel, they may exhibit more flagrant wickedness in their conduct than before. Calvin speaks of some who seemed eagerly to embrace the gospel, but who did not amend their lives, or that but few of them did so. There were some, it would appear, who had reformed; from which the inference is, that these had really embraced the gospel, and the others only seemed to do so: nay it appears they avowed their infidelity; they pretended nothing else by shaking off the yoke of superstis-tion, than to give themselves more liberty to follow all kinds of licentiousness. The Reformation is not to blame for the conduct of infidels and hypocrites, who never received its doctrines, or submitted to its discipline.

There is, however, one expression in the words ascribed to Luther, which leads me strongly to suspect that they are not his :—" when we were seduced by the Pope, every man willingly performed good works." Luther's best friends admit that he was often unguarded in his language; but if ever he said any thing like this, it must have been in his sleep; for he knew, and all the world knows, that it was the wicked works which were the effect of Popish seduction in the form of indulgences, which first opened his eyes to see the abominable character of Popery, and led him to throw off the yoke of Rome.

The Vindicator (col. 61.) makes a general reference to some documents and facts which I had adduced to prove the bloody cruelty of Popery; and the following is his reply:—"This system has existed for eighteen centuries; it exists now in full vigour in several populous and independent states on the continent; not all the cruel vengeance of Protestantism and Puritanism could subdue its influence in Ireland, where it has reigned fourteen hundred years; and does he (The Protestant) think that his imaginary cases are sufficient to establish his charge? No, no; he must explain to the reader the extraordinary methods used by Popery to make men love what is hateful to them. Few of us are fond of being tortured, and starved, and murdered, as The Protestant says the deluded victims of Popery are by its agents; and yet hundreds of Papists have suffered death under Protestant hands for adhering to it, while hundreds of others have fled to Popish countries from this Protestant kingdom, to avoid the same fate; and thousands and tens of thousands have borne every degree of insult and privation rather than renounce its influence. Now is not this something contrary to human nature and the usual course of things? Mankind in general love justice better than oppression; but according to the Protestant's logic, Catholics or Papists love cruelty and injustice better than mildness and equity. Protestants have had the exclusive care of the civil and ecclesiastical constitution of this kingdom for nearly two centuries, and the complaints from all parts of the island at this moment of the oppression of the taxes are so loud, and the burden so universally felt, that numbers are daily leaving their country to seek for relief in a foreign land, the same as Catholics were compelled to do under the penal laws; and publications are hourly issuing from the press, calling on those who are left behind to seek a remedy for their grievances. This is the natural consequence of discontent. But, notwithstanding Popery is described to be of so abominable a nature in its design and tendency, that it not only destroys our bodies by thousands and tens of thousands, but sends our poor souls to everlasting perdition by millions, it still preserves its influence over the minds of men of all nations, nor could the gibbets and knives of our Protestant ancestors root it out of this and the sister island; nor will the absurd nonsense of THE PROTESTANT and his associates in folly and falsehood, impede the progress it is making in the number of its members. The sequel then must come to this: either the greatest bulk of Christians are the most stupid and senseless of mankind, or THE PROTESTANT is an arrogant and barefaced calumniator."

Such is the Vindicator's full and particular reply to the plain facts by which I proved Popery to be a system of cruelty. The reader will perceive that there is not so much as an attempt to disprove any one of these facts. The sum and substance of the reply is,—if Popery be as I described it, Papists are great fools, as well as "murderers and cut-throats," and I shall not controvert this inference any more than the other, for there are simple ones who love simplicity, and scorners who delight in their scorning, and fools who hate knowledge. It is perhaps difficult to account for the taste of such persons; but it is a fact, that both heathens and Papists do torture themselves and one another, sometimes to death, with a view, as they think, to satisfy divine justice; and they prefer this to the merciful plan of salvation revealed by the gospel. While this remains an undisputed fact, all the Vindicator's flourishes about men not loving what is hateful go for nothing.

If we were to believe the Vindicator, we would suppose that by some unaccountable charm, the whole matter of history had been reversed;—that it was Protestants who kindled the flames of Smithfield to burn Papists; that it was Protestants in Ireland, who at different times rose in arms, and murdered their Popish neighbours by thousands. Yes, he would not hesitate to assert this in plain words, to serve a purpose. No doubt his Popish readers believe it is so; and therefore it is that they regard Protestants with such murderous hatred —"nursing their wrath to keep it warm."

No. CLIV.

SATURDAY, JUNE 23D, 1821.

IN his fifth Number, the Vindicator adverts to Mr Bourke's pamphlet, of which I gave an account in my twenty-third number. He does not know what to make of this production, which exposes in so strong a light the wicked practices of Irish Popish priests. He says "whether he was the publisher, or even the author of some of the sentiments imputed to him, is matter of doubt, as the work is printed for W. Whittemore, 56, Paternoster Row, London." I do not know any thing that he can allege against Mr Whittemore, but that he is a Protestant, from which we are to infer, that no work published by a Protestant, though written by a Papist, can contain the truth. The editor, it seems, took upon him to abridge Mr Bourke's observations, from which Mr Andrews infers that we can have no dependence upon his facts; which is a species of logic much of a piece with what follows:—

"But what will the reader think when I inform him, that the accuser-general (i. e. The Protestant) and the reverend Romish priest, whom he has brought forward to sustain his charge, are at variance with each other in their assertions? The Protestant avers, that the system of Popery is a system of error and delusion, of cruelty and oppression. Mr Bourke declares, in the preface to his work, from whence the former has so copiously quoted, and in his first letter therein to his prelate, that the Catholic or Popish religion, meaning of course the system, is HOLY, which word being defined by Dr Johnson to signify good, pure, sacred, must be opposed to falsehood and deceit," col. 71. Thus, because Mr Bourke has a better opinion of the Church of Rome than I have, he is not to be believed in a statement of facts, which not only came within his own knowledge, but which really regarded himself. This must be the Vindicator's meaning, else it will be difficult to find any meaning in his words; for I cannot suppose he seriously means to affirm that two persons, differing in opinion about the merits of a system, must necessarily contradict one another in a matter of fact. It is one of the inconsistencies of Mr Bourke, that he continued to adhere to a church in which such horrible oppression was practised; and that he still considered it a holy, and the true church; but this, so far from making his testimony doubtful, ought rather to confirm it, because it is not probable that so steady a son would belie his holy mother.

The Vindicator (col. 72) makes the following strange concession: "That corrupt practices are committed by some of the clergy of the Catholic church, no one will deny; it is the natural consequence of human frailty." I call this a strange concession, because it comes from one who boasts of the "spotless purity" of the Catholic priests in Ireland, and it is of these that he is speaking, when he admits that corrupt practices are committed by some of them. Now it is impossible that a church can be pure, if corrupt practices are known to exist among either priest or people, without instantly applying the divinely appointed means for the reformation, or expulsion of the corrupt members. Popish writers, and Mr Andrews in particular, think they have sufficient ground for condemning the Reformation, when they have it admitted, that the Reformers may have erred, even in a speculative opinion. Now there is no error greater than "corrupt practice," of which some of the Irish priests are admitted to be guilty; and this guilt must attach to the whole body, seeing they hold communion with such corrupt members, and allow them to exercise every priestly function. The lowest priest is greater in the Church of Rome than Luther and Calvin were in the Reformed Churches; for he professes to be a successor of the apostles, and an infallible word-of-mouth teacher of the faith, which no Protestant believes the Reformers to have been. When, therefore, such priests err grievously in their practice, the Church of Rome is condemned, according to the reasoning of her own advocates. When such a circumstance as that which is here admitted of Romish priests, is known to exist in a Protestant church, her really sound members acknowledge and deplore her imperfection, and do what they can to remove it; but in a perfect and infallible church, without spot or wrinkle, as Mr Andrews affirms the Church of Rome to be, no such acknowledgment can consistently be made; and to admit that some of her clergy are guilty of corrupt practices, is at once to overthrow the whole fabric of the church's holiness and infallibility.

In quoting Mr Bourke, I gave sometimes his own words, and sometimes their substance in an abridged form. This was done professedly, and without marks of quotation, when I did not insert his own words. The Vindicator finds one paragraph thus abridged, which he quotes, col. 76, and which he thinks ought to have been given entire; and, because it is not so given, he exclaims, "What a pitiful! what a mean! what a disgraceful trick is this, to impose upon the credulous and unthinking!" The thing is of little importance in itself, and not worth occupying the space which it would require to quote and reply to the accusation at length. But if any of my readers who took in the Vindicator, have preserved the 5th Number, I request they will turn to the passage, and see if there be any thing like trick or imposition in it? whether I did not give the substance of the paragraph, without omitting a single article? and whether Popery would have gained, or Protestantism lost any thing, by inserting it at length?

This brings me to a more serious charge against the Vindicator himself than that of concealing the truth. It is the assertion of a downright falsehood. In Number 5, col. 80, he thus writes:—"By the terms of the solemn League and Covenant of the Kirk of Scotland, the Covenanters undertook to extirpate all Papists by force of arms." I question if ever the Church of Rome produced a more impudent forgery. The words of that solemn document are: "II. That we shall in like manner, without respect of persons, endeavour the extirpation of Popery, prelacy, (of which a description is given in a long parenthesis,) superstition, heresy, schism, profaneness, and whatsoever shall be found to be contrary to sound doctrine, and the power of godliness; lest we partake in other men's sins, and thereby be in danger to receive of their plagues; and that the Lord may be one, and his name one, in the three kingdoms." There is not a word about arms, or force of arms, in the whole deed; and the above is all that it contains about extirpation. What a face of brass, therefore, must that man have, who can write such a falsehood!

Again, the Covenanters did not engage to extirpate Papists, as the Vindicator falsely asserts; it was Popery that was the object of their hostility; as it ought to be of every honest man. These things are as different and distinguishable as a man and his errors; and the word extirpate, when applied to principles, not only does not imply force of arms, but cannot imply such a thing. According to Dr Johnson, it signifies, to root out, to eradicate, to exscind. Who ever heard of cutting off, or killing thoughts by a sword, or any other material weapon? To extirpate, in reference to error, is no more than to supplant false principles by true ones, by means of reason and argument. An eloquent advocate of the "Catholic Claims," in the late Synod of Glasgow and Ayr, said, he desired with all his heart to extirpate Popery; but no man will suspect him of the least hostility towards the persons of Papists; nay he distinctly declared his conviction, that to put them upon a footing of political equality with Protestants, would have the effect of winning them from their errors; which is the same thing as to extirpate Popery. I cannot agree with my reverend friend in the consequence which he anticipated; but I refer to this part of his speech as affording an excellent illustration of the distinction between persons and their principles. In short, he is the best friend of the human race who endeavours to extirpate false principles of every kind; and every real friend of Papists must desire to extirpate Popery.

The Vindicator then draws a horrible picture of the sufferings of Papists, under the penal statutes; and as this immediately follows his false assertion, that the Covenanters undertook to extirpate all Papists by force of arms, he means to insinuate, that this persecution was the practical effect of the solemn league; though he has not so much as attempted to show that there was any connection between this, and the sufferings of his favourites, the Jesuits. That much individual suffering was the consequence of the penal statutes against Papists, I do not deny; but they have their own church to thank for it, for the murderous principles which she inculcated, her no less murderous practices, and the turbulent, incessant plotting of her members, which rendered restrictions upon them a necessary measure of self-defence.

These statutes have been repealed long ago; but instead of expressing gratitude for their removal, such writers as Mr Andrews delight in keeping alive the memory of them, that they may perpetuate the hostility of their brethren against Protestants. In this country, Papists suffer no molestation whatever on account of their religion. This is in consequence of more enlightened ideas of liberty of conscience, which began to prevail about the middle of the last century. But the Church of Rome has not yet received one ray of light on this subject. It is scarcely a month since it was declared by the authorities in Portugal, to be unlawful to write any book against the established religion, which induced the editor of the Glasgow Courier to warn the Protestant to beware of venturing his person in that land of liberty. Hundreds of Jesuits are suffered, in this kingdom, to preach and write as much as they please against the established religion; and the law of the land will suffer no weapon heavier than a quill to be raised against them; and it is very certain that, if they had the administration of the law, they would soon "extirpate" THE PROTESTANT. They have been labouring for three years to extirpate his good name; and, not many weeks ago, the Jesuits in Preston declared to the Mayor of that town, that he was a stirrer up of sedition; that in short, the publication of the Protestant was the cause of the late riots in Glasgow, meaning, I suppose, the radical rebellion; and that, if he did not interfere to put down the Protestant Lectures preached occasionally in that town, the peace of the country would be disturbed. See the Protestant Advocate, attached to the Antijacobin Review for May. The editor adds, that the Mayor, much to his honour, refused to interfere. The application, however, was a direct attempt to suppress free discussion, and to commence a system of persecution with the influence which they have already acquired. Such freedoms have been used with my name in that quarter, that one of the preachers found it his duty to bear testimony, from the pulpit, in favour of my character. (See an excellent Sermon on Purgatory, by the Rev. Thomas Raffles, of Liverpool.) Thus, when incessantly complaining of being a persecuted people, all the persecution is practised by themselves; and, were it not for the restraints of law, they would soon carry it much farther than the scourge of the tongue.

In his sixth Number, the Vindicator represents the gunpowder plot as a mere invention of Protestants to bring odium upon the Papists, for which I do not know that he has any higher authority than his great oracle and patron, Dr Milner. It would not require greater impudence to assert that the Pope invented the fable of King Henry's divorce. The plot is a matter of history to which every reader has access; and I should think it an insult to the understanding of my readers, to waste a minute in proving that it was a real conspiracy, planned by Papists, to murder the king and parliament, and overturn the Protestant establishment, in church and state, at a blow. History is nothing in the hands of such writers as Andrews. They have only to assert a thing was, or was not; and the dupes of a bigoted superstition take their word as enough.

In this Number, we have another important admission by the Vindicator. It is a matter of history too, but so recent, that even his assurance will not enable him to deny it. I had been remarking, that it was the manner of Popish bishops to approve of any thing, however repugnant, that served their purpose. "We know," said I, "that the Pope approved the usurpation of Buonaparte, so far as to crown him and bless him as his dear son in the faith, because he could not help it. Neither can he help his adherents in Britain, or procure for them the privileges which they desire, without their taking the oath of allegiance, which the law requires; he therefore approves of their taking it. But as he has never, by any public act that I know of, renounced his right to dispense with the oaths of his adherents we have no security that he will not do what was often done by his predecessors, whenever he shall think proper ;especially when he finds that it will promote the interest of the holy see." The Vindicator makes no attempt to refute what I here assert about the Pope's dispensing power; but replies as follows:—

"Reader, candid and unprejudiced reader, canst thou restrain the feelings of just indignation at this base and malevolent insinuation against the fidelity and loyalty of the Catholic prelates and people of this kingdom, and against the character of a pontiff, whose unbending integrity and heroic firmness have gained him the praise of every friend and admirer of virtue and probity? What if the Pope did crown Buonaparte, he did not by that act confer one atom of power to him more than he already possessed. It was merely the performance of a religious ceremony, the splendour of which was heightened by the presence of the head of the church, but conveyed no greater authority or security to the crowned head, than if the act had been done by a prelate of his own creation. But the Pope complied with the desire of Buonaparte 'because he could not help it!' He certainly would have resisted the request, if he had thought it contrary to his situation, the same as he resisted the command of the despot to declare war against this country, and lost both his territory and personal liberty, rather than violate the dictates of his conscience." Alas, for the conscience of a Pope that will not allow him to declare war against a people whom he excommunicates every year, on holy Thursday! and against a sovereign, whose predecessors were, by his predecessors, dethroned and denounced by successive bulls, not one of which has been recalled or reversed. There is reason to suspect that it was something more imperative than the dictates of his conscience, that prevented him from declaring war against Great Britain, seeing it must have been a very elastic conscience indeed, that could stretch so far as to prostitute what every Papist must regard as a solemn religious rite, at the will of a usurper, and to consecrate his usurpation: though he "certainly could have resisted the request, if he thought it contrary to his situation." I admit that he certainly could have resisted it; for it is not in the power of men, or devils either, to compel a man to do wrong, or to violate his conscience. When I said the Pope did so because he could not help it, I used the words hypothetically; that is, if he wished to preserve his life, or his dignity, he could not resist the usurper's command; but he might have resigned both dignity and life, and preserved his integrity, if he had any.

The Vindicator's apology for his holiness is like that of the boy, who, finding his companions bent on robbing an orchard, and would not be persuaded to desist, thought he might as well go with them, and give them his countenance. They were already numerous enough to carry off every apple; there would not be a whit more mischief done by his going, or less by his staying away. So Pius VII. lent the sanction of his high and pretended divine authority, to the usurpation of one of the most ruthless tyrants that ever afflicted the world, because, in doing so, he did not add one atom of power to him more than he already possessed. But did not the Pope know that the design of the thing was, and that the effect would be, to confirm the power which the tyrant had acquired, in the minds of all who attached any importance to the splendid religious ceremony of crowning and anointing in the name of the Lord? Thus he actually made himself, by his silly compliance, a party; or to use language fit for such a transaction, art and part guilty with the murderer and the plunderer of Europe.

As I have said, the Vindicator does not reply to what I had written about the Pope's dispensing power. He does not deny that he possesses this prerogative; he seems even to admit and justify it, in a long defence of the bull, by which the Pope granted to the kings and queens of France, and their successors for ever, the privilege of breaking such vows as "they cannot profitably keep;" or of exchanging them for something else that may be agreeable and profitable to them. The Vindicator has a long and laboured article in defence of this bull, which he rests chiefly on the assertion, that it was vows about religion that the Pope had in view, as if these were less binding than oaths between man and man; and because the favoured pair were to enjoy their privilege under the control of their confessor, which I did not conceal or deny: but when they were allowed to choose for confessor, any creature who was in priest's orders, they could easily find one whose conscience would be as accommodating as the Pope's in the case of Buonaparte. I consider any farther notice of this article unnecessary. Any man who regards truth and integrity, will find, in the Vindicator's own words, a sufficient refutation of his Jesuitical sophistry.

But as usual, he has a great many ifs:—if the Pope has such power, how do such and such things take place? and by putting a question in this way, hundreds of times, he leaves the object of his attack, or proposed refutation, just as he found it. Thus:— "If the Pope possesses this right of dispensing with our oaths, what occasion had he to approve that of 1791? Could he not have procured for us all the privileges we desire, by dispensing with our taking (i. e. permitting us to take) the oath of supremacy and abjuration, and the declaration against transubstantiation?" No doubt he could do this, and perhaps he would, were it compatible with the security of his children, and retaining them in filial subjection. But no man can take the oath of abjuration, without renouncing both the Pope's temporal and spiritual authority; and though most of our British Papists profess to renounce the temporal, they cannot renounce the spiritual, without renouncing the Pope altogether, and ceasing to be Papists. There may be some who do so, and continue Papists at heart; but they must not profess themselves such, else they would instantly be marked as perjured persons; and the same thing would attach to any priest, who should receive consecration, or any spiritual faculty, from his holiness. In short, if the oath of abjuration were universally taken, the Church of Rome would have no visible existence in this kingdom; and we are not to suppose the Pope will permit that to be done, which would subvert his own spiritual dominion.

There are some Papists who would not scruple to take the oath of supremacy, if they were allowed to attach their own meaning to the words. I showed, in a late Number, that one of Mr Andrews' correspondents, in the Orthodox Journal, argued the lawfulness of swearing that the king is the head of the Church of England: but he would not swear that he was the head of the church in England; for, in his opinion, the head of the church every where is the Pope. There is a very strong reason why the Pope should not permit his subjects to make the declaration against transubstantiation, and why they should not make it though he were to permit them: for suppose a man to declare upon oath to-day, that he does not believe that the bread and wine in the eucharist are changed into the real body and blood, soul and divinity of Jesus Christ; and suppose him to appear at the altar to-morrow, and worship the bread and wine, and hold them up to be worshipped with divine honour, he would be under the necessity of making his choice, whether the world should set him down for a perjured person or an idolater; for it would be impossible to clear himself of both; and no man, in his right senses, would choose to acknowledge himself guilty of either.

I request the reader's serious attention to these hints; for the argument which I am combating has much higher authority than that of Mr Andrews; it has been used by members of both houses of parliament, who gravely maintain that Papists must be very honest men, and may safely be admitted into places of power and trust, seeing they will not swear the oaths to which they have conscientious objections, though, by the swearing of them, they would become eligible to all places and honours. But there is no merit in refusing to do that by which one would instantly become felo de se; or would instantly make himself infamous; for no Papist can take the oath of supremacy, without ceasing to be a Papist; and no believer in transubstantiation can swear that he does not believe it, without convicting himself of perjury.

No. CLV.

SATURDAY, JUNE 30TH, 1821.

THE last four numbers of The Protestant were occupied by replies to the principal topics in the first six Numbers of the Catholic Vindicator. I have passed over a number of little personal matters, which are not worth the answering, because any reader who understands the subject may answer them for himself; and because I am very little concerned about the Vindicator's assertions with regard to my character and motives, seeing I have convicted him of gross falsehood, as the reader will see, in my last Number. I am as little concerned about the opinion he has formed and expressed with regard to my principles, seeing he maintains the principle that Christianity owes its rise to the influence of Popery, as I have shown from his own words, in the Number before last. If there be such things as works of supererogation, certainly it must be a work of this kind, to make a serious reply to the writings of such a man, because they carry their own refutation in the very face of them. His favourite, and often repeated reply to those parts of my work which convict Papists of impiety and absurdity is, If this were so, then Papists are the most besotted and stupid creatures in the world; and I must say, it is even so, if they continue to adhere to him as their champion and oracle.

I am now come to a part of his work in which there is something like system, in which, at least, he keeps a long while by a subject; that is, the doctrine of not keeping faith with heretics, which I accused his church of holding. To this subject he seems to have applied his whole strength; and I strongly suspect that he had the aid of abler pens than his own. After a great many proofs from Romish writers of great eminence, who all certified that the above was a commonly received doctrine of the church in their day, I agreed to rest the whole weight of the cause on one single point, namely, the declaration of the Council of Constance. I repeat it here, for the sake of connection, and to save the trouble of reference:—

"The holy Synod of Constance declares, concerning every safe conduct granted by the emperor, kings, and other temporal princes, to heretics, or persons accused of heresy, in hopes of reclaiming them, that it ought not to be of any prejudice to the catholic faith, or ecclesiastical jurisdiction, nor to hinder but that such persons may and ought to be examined, judged, and punished, according as justice shall require, if those heretics shall refuse to revoke their errors, although they shall have come to the place of judgment relying on their safe conduct, and without which they would not have come thither; and the persons who have promised them security, shall not, in this case, be obliged to keep his promise, by whatsoever tie he may have been engaged, when he has done all that is in his power to do."

The design of this canon was evidently to establish a specialty in the rule with regard to heretics, which did not apply to other persons, such as prisoners of war, or even robbers, and other such malefactors, for it does not appear ever to have been counted lawful to break faith with them, in any circumstances. But with heretics no promise was to be kept, if it should in any wise prejudice the catholic faith and ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The canon farther proceeds upon a principle held indisputable by the Council, that heretics were to be examined, judged, and punished, if they refused to revoke their heresy; that is, some opinion which they held, not quite consistent with the faith of Rome; and, if convicted of holding any such opinion, however blameless in their lives, the emperor, or any magistrate, who had advised them to come to the Council, with a passport, and solemn oath, that he would see them conveyed safely home again, was relieved from this solemn obligation, provided his protegee was convicted of heresy, and he had done all that he could for him. In short, the canon clearly establishes,—first, that persons holding any opinion different from the established faith of Rome, are to be punished as heretics, which is, to be burnt to death, as the fact proved in the case of Huss, for which it was framed; and, secondly, that persons convicted of heresy, and who, conscious of their innocence as to any crime, came to a tribunal to which they were summoned to answer for something laid to their charge, under a solemn pledge that no ill should befall them, and who would not have come without such pledge, are yet, by a solemn declaration of the Council, deprived of the benefit of the promise and oath of the magistrate, on which they had depended for their personal safety. This, I say, was a special rule made for heretics alone, for nothing of the kind appears ever to have been decreed against thieves or murderers.

Now The Catholic Vindicator, the accredited organ of our Glasgow Papists, approves and defends the above canon in every iota of it, and yet he is incessantly calling for liberty of conscience, and abusing our government for withholding it. Here, to prevent the least suspicion of doing him injustice, I shall give his own words:—"Here then we have the doctrine of the Council of Constance, as given by THE PROTESTANT; and by what perversion of language can he make out that this decree established the tenet, that faith is not to be kept with heretics, and that, as it has never been repealed, it remains as much a law of the church as communion without the cup? What is there odious in the words of this decree? What that can be offensive to the most fastidious Protestant? The synod declares that every safe conduct granted, ought not to prejudice the catholic faith, or church authority, nor hinder the individual holding the passport from being examined, judged, and punished, as JUSTICE shall require. And what injustice can be in this? The particular object in question was John Huss, who was then a professed member of the Catholic Church, but disagreeing with the church on some fundamental principles of doctrine, she assembled her judges to decide on his opinions, and call upon him to correct his error, if found to be such, on pain of being put out of her communion. Now this right THE PROTESTANT has declared exists in every society, by virtue of the writings of St Paul, and surely he will not deny it to the Church of Rome, nor blame the fathers of the Council of Constance for asserting such right, which is all that they did in the first part of the decree. And what is the correct inference to be drawn from the concluding part of it? Why nothing farther than that the civil magistrate, if he has engaged to perform more than he has authority to do, is not obliged to keep his promise, provided he has done all that he can do, to fulfil those conditions of it which he can and ought to perform. This is the true construction of this famous decree which The Protestant has produced, to convict the Church of Rome of teaching antichristian doctrine, inimical to the happiness of society, and the divines of six of her universities of falsehood, in denying the fact! Turn and twist the meaning as he pleases, the writer cannot make more of it than that it was confined to a specified local object, and by no means intended to (be) a general rule. It related solely to the construction and power of free passports, from the lawful and just obligations of which none could be released, according to the decree itself, until 'he had done all that was in his power' to do, to fulfil them; there is no mention or allusion whatever, directly or indirectly, to any other promises or contracts, and therefore they could not be comprehended in it." col. 121, 122.

Here the decree in question is defended in every point, from which it is clear the Vindicator thinks it just and lawful to examine, judge, and punish men for difference of opinion. He quotes my own doctrine, that, according to Paul's writings, every church has a right to put out of her communion those who disagree with her in fundamental points; and he would have his readers believe this was all that was done to Huss by the Council of Constance. But there is a trifling circumstance which he did not think proper to mention in this connection;—had Huss been tried by such a church as The Protestant was speaking of, and put out of her communion, he would have been allowed to go home without molestation, under the safe conduct which he had received from the emperor; whereas, the Council of Constance delivered him up to be burnt to death; and persuaded the emperor that, seeing he was a heretic, he was not bound to keep faith with him.

The Vindicator would have us believe that the emperor Segismund had promised more than he had authority to perform, and therefore his promise was not binding. Now what the emperor did was this:—he required one of his own subjects, living in Bohemia, to appear at the Council of Constance, and answer to some accusations preferred against him, in relation to certain points of doctrine which he was alleged to have preached, not quite accordant with the reigning standard of orthodoxy. Huss, knowing the temper of the Council, was afraid that some mischief would befall him. In order to remove his apprehension, the emperor gave him, in writing, what was called a safe conduct, or passport for going to the Council, sojourning at Constance, and safe return home. After the Council had condemned Huss, and delivered him over to the secular power to be burnt, the emperor actually pleaded his solemn promise of security to the Bohemian; but the Council told him in effect, that he had now no business with him, but to see that he was burnt to death. He had done all he could do; he had no power to interfere with regard to any sentence of the church. This is the fair construction, which, according to Mr Andrews, is to be put upon that nefarious transaction; by which it appears that sovereign princes were the bond slaves of a band of insolent priests; and that even an emperor had not power to keep his promise, by protecting one of his own subjects from priestly rage, though that subject had put himself within their power, relying upon the promise of his sovereign, that he should be conducted home in safety. The emperor would have acted like a sovereign prince, if, instead of yielding to their sophistry, and gratifying their malice, by murdering an innocent man, he had surrounded the Council by an armed force, broken up their sitting, and sent every one of them about his business. This is what he had power to do, and what he would have done, had he been a man of spirit, and a man of his word.

The law of the holy church about not keeping faith with heretics was thus explicitly declared. I challenged the Church of Rome to show when it was repealed, or condemned by equal authority, and promised that, if any person could show this, I would give up the point, and allow that the Church of Rome was better now than she was of old. Mr Andrews, absurdly enough, calls this a challenge to prove a negative; but it is no such thing; the repeal, or authoritative condemnation of a law, is as positive a thing as the enactment of it. He undertakes, however, to prove that the doctrine in question was condemned by the Council of Constance itself; and the following is the manner in which he does it:—

"Although, as the theologues of Alcala say, there was nothing defined concerning breach of faith by the Council of Constance, yet the fathers of that assembly, by the following decree, passed by them in the very session alluded to by THE PROTESTANT, most clearly condemned the very doctrine which they have been accused of establishing and maintaining:—'This most holy synod, being solicitous, as it is in duty bound, (having been assembled for that especial purpose,) to provide for the extirpation of error and heresies in various parts of the world, has, of late, heard that certain propositions erroneous in faith, and adverse to good morals, highly scandalous, and tending to subvert the order of governments, have been publicly taught, and, amongst others, this especial one has been reported to it:—

"'Any tyrant, as he may licitly and meritoriously, so he ought to be slain by his subjects or vassals, without awaiting the sentence or order of any judicial authority, though his death be effected by secret fraud, insidious flattery, and blandishments, and be in violation of a pledged oath or engagement entered into with him.

"'This holy synod, anxious to oppose itself to this error, and effectually to eradicate the same, after having maturely considered it, decrees, determines, and declares this doctrine to be erroneous in faith and in morals; and reprobates and condemns it as heretical, scandalous, and leading to frauds, deceit, lies, and treach-ery. .It moreover determines, decrees, and declares, that all persons pertinaciously holding this most dangerous opinion, are heretics, and ought to be punished as such, according to canonical regulations.' Concil. Studio Labbei. tom. xii. p. 143. Edit. Par. 1672.

"Surely," says Mr Andrews, "this declaration is sufficient to convince even the sceptic, that this charge brought against the Church of Rome is totally groundless, and that it was invented for the basest of purposes." col. 158, 159. Now let the reader remember, that the Council of Constance is charged with having laid it down as a genuine principle, that it was lawful to break faith with heretics; and, in particular, that the emperor was not bound to keep faith with a heretical subject. This was the decision, or decree, call it what you will, concerning which I challenged the Church of Rome to show that it had ever been repealed or condemned by equal authority, promising that if this were shown, I would give up the point. The Vindicator accepted the challenge; and he triumphantly produced the decree which I have just quoted, as sufficient to convince even the sceptic, that my accusation of the Council was unfounded. I acknowledge it to be a very good and wholesome decree. It declares it unlawful for subjects to assassinate their princes, though they be tyrants "in violation of a pledged oath or engagement entered into with them." But this is very different from the question of a prince, a priest, or any other tyrant breaking faith with heretics, of which this decree says not a word: and, therefore, it cannot be a repeal or condemnation of the other decree past in the same session, by which it was declared that the emperor, kings, and other temporal princes, who had given promises of safety to heretics, were not obliged to keep their promises, by whatever tie they might be engaged.

The above is all that the Vindicator had to adduce in answer to my challenge; and, as it relates to a very different subject, it must stand for no answer at all. The charge, therefore, is completely substantiated. It was decreed by the Council of Constance, that engagements with heretics were not binding; that is, that faith was not to be kept with them. The Vindicator, with the aid of his patron, Bishop Milner, and all the Jesuits in England, has not been able to produce a document that so much as implies a subsequent condemnation, or disavowal of this doctrine; but has attempted to divert the public mind from the point at issue, by citing a decree upon a quite different subject; from which it clearly follows, that my point is established; and what was declared by so great a Council, as the doctrine of the church, was, and is, and must be her doctrine, while she exists; for she is unchangeable and infallible. For a great deal of collateral evidence on this subject, I refer to my first fifty Numbers; in which I showed, from great authors of their own, that the principle was undisputed, and was acted upon, without shame or scruple, for hundreds of years.

This point established, I decline having any thing to do with the various cases which the Vindicator adduces, to show that Protestants also have been guilty of breach of faith; such for instance, as the Bank of England breaking faith with the public, when she suspended specie payments, which seems to occasion the Vindicator great triumph, as a complete set off against the decree of the Council of Constance. The Bank of England is not a Christian church; and, though it were, I have no voice in it, and am not responsible for its doings, any more than for its notes. If this great national corporation had passed a law, declaring that they would pay no note that was presented by a Papist, for that no faith was to be kept with Papists, I grant that there would have been some analogy between that and the canon of Constance; but this was not the case; and I venture to assure Mr Andrews, that if he will go to the Bank of England with one of her notes, he will receive payment in gold, without being asked whether he is a heretic or not.

I suppose I need not use many more words to show that my accusation of the Church of Rome, with regard to not keeping faith with heretics, is completely established; and that the Vindicator has failed in his attempt at rebutting it. I shall advert to only one article more on this subject, as affording a fair specimen of the Vindicator's mode of evading a question, and of arguing from one thing to another. He approves of all Bishop Lanigan's reasons for breaking promises, for which see his 12th and 13th Numbers. I had said, that Lanigan's elastic morality would allow me to refuse to accept the bill of a correspondent in Dublin, from whom I had ordered a lot of linen, and to whom I had given a promise of honouring his draft, if circumstances were so changed, that the price of linen had fallen in Glasgow, before that which I ordered had arrived. Every merchant knows that such refusal would be a breach of faith; but I showed that Dr Lanigan's doctrine, supported by St Thomas, would bear me out in breaking my promise, because "the circumstances are changed; and because I intended to fulfil my promise when I made it, I am guilty of no untruth, though I should now break it." To this the Vindicator replies:— "What a flimsy sophister! what a dull reasoner! but what a bold asserter! And could not THE PROTESTANT find an argument more in point than his lot of linen, and his correspondent's bill? St Thomas, when giving his case, knew very little of commercial affairs, and did not contemplate, I will answer for it, the meaning which the accuser has given to it. However, supposing he did, Papists are not so ignorant as to be unacquainted with the civil laws of the country, which will enforce a compliance, should they be inclined to such swindling propensities. But they know that such a circumstance will not free them from the obligation, although there are other circumstances, which I am sure THE PROTESTANT would most readily avail himself of, were he under a promise of the kind. For example; suppose him to order a quantity of linen of a certain quality, and he promises to accept his correspondent's bill for the same; but, suppose his correspondent to send him a lot inferior to the sample he ordered and expected, but at the same price, would he accept the bill according to promise? Or would he not demur because the circumstances are changed? Would he be guilty of an untruth, by thus breaking his promise, as he intended to fulfil it, had the contract been executed according to order? He will not answer me in the affirmative; and, if he did, no one, I am sure, would believe him. No, no; he would be glad to shelter himself under St Thomas' case; and, if that did not protect him, he would apply to some lawyer, to enforce the doctrines of the theologians and canonists, read by the Rev. James Lanigan." col. 202, 203.

Let the reader remember, that St Thomas' doctrine, applied and exemplified by bishop Lanigan, is, that a man is freed from the obligation of his promise on a change of circumstances; that is, any providential change that may happen, without blame being attachable to either party. But the Vindicator proceeds upon the supposition, that one party has not fulfilled the condition with which the promise was connected, and then he argues that in such a case I would break my promise as well as any Papist. Here, however, the intelligent merchant will perceive that there is no promise to break. If I order fine linen, and promise to accept my correspondent's bill for the value of fine linen; and if he sends me coarse linen at the price of fine, and draws accordingly, I break no promise by refusing to accept his draft, for he has not obeyed the order to which my promise was annexed. He has committed a fraud, or indiscretion at least, for which he himself ought to be responsible. I am afraid that I shall be accused of trifling with my readers, by adverting to such an absurdity in the form of an argument; but I cannot adduce a fairer specimen of the manner in which Mr Andrews endeavours to reply to THE PROTESTANT.

I conclude the present Number by informing the reader, that the long depending action between Mr Scott and me was decided in the Jury Court, Edinburgh, on the morning of Tuesday last, after a trial of seventeen hours. Mr Scott laid his damages at £3000 for injury which he alleged to have sustained by some passages in my work; and the Jury awarded him £100 for my share of the mischief, £20 against Mr Sym, of the town's hospital, for his share in it, and 1*s.* against each of my printers, for their share. I have not time to give a more particular account of the trial in the present Number; but it shall occupy a large space in a future one.

No. CLVI.

SATURDAY, JULY 7TH, 1821.

A FRIEND informs me that he lately overheard two Papists conversing on the subject of THE PROTESTANT, when the one said to the other, "That fellow is driving our religion all to jaup, but Mr Scott will get the better of him at the law." There happens to be more truth in this, than we usually hear from the mouth of Papists. The reader is able to judge of the truth of the first part of it, when he sees the jaupy appearance that Popery makes when exhibited in her naked deformity; and for the truth of the second part of the observation, I have to inform him, that Mr Scott has indeed got the better of me at the law. I mentioned this in a short notice at the end of my last Number; and as my readers at a distance will not be able to comprehend how this should have happened, I shall proceed to inform them.

At the commencement of my work, I stated what was then the subject of general belief and conversation, that the Chapel in Clyde Street was built at the expense of a poor and starving people. In my Ninth Number, I related some anecdotes to confirm the fact; and Mr Scott, considering himself aggrieved by what I had written, raised an action of damages against me about a year ago.* His complaint included the letter of Mr Sym, contained in my LXXII. Number, and this gentleman was comprehended in the action. When the cause came to be tried, I was allowed a proof of some of my statements, but not of others, because I could not condescend on dates of things which I had published three years ago, and which had happened a long time before that; and from some rule of court, quite new to my Counsel, and which I cannot comprehend, I was not allowed to prove the truth of Mr Sym's statement. Things of this nature, when brought to trial, whatever they be in fact, are considered false in law, if not positively proved by competent witnesses; which, as a general principle, I am by no means disposed to condemn. I was allowed to prove four issues, as they are called, three of which were declared by the chief commissioner of the court, in his address to the jury, to have had evidence adduced in their support, and the fourth not proved, inasmuch as that which was stated in the issue to have happened about six years ago, could not have taken place since the year 1813. The court were decidedly of opinion that certain words which I had used in reference to the manner, and the means by which Mr Scott levied money from his poor people, were libellous; and the jury being of the same opinion to a certain extent, found a verdict for the pursuer, as mentioned in my last. The trial excited an uncommon degree of interest; and much eloquence was displayed by counsel on both sides. A report of it has been published in all the newspapers, with which it is needless to occupy my pages; but I intend to publish, as soon as possible, in a separate form, a more detailed account, with several documents connected with it. I thought at one time of giving it at length in THE PROTESTANT, but as it could not be contained in one Number, the connection would be so broken as not to afford a fair view of the case.

I am aware that the fact of Mr Scott having "got the better of me at the law," will occasion great triumph among all the Papists in the three kingdoms. It will be considered as a complete set-off against all that I have written about Popish idolatry, error, and superstition. Much need they had of something of the nature of a triumph. They have picked out a few sentences in three large volumes of weekly papers, all written during the intervals of business, and amidst innumerable interruptions; and these sentences not being worded with that caution which a writer better acquainted with the law would have used, they have found me liable in damages, and exposed me to an enormous expense. This is all their triumph; but Popery remains as it was, unvindicated and undefended; —a bloated system of idolatry, superstition, and cruelty. As such I have been, for three years, holding it up to the scorn and derision of the world; as such I shall continue to expose it; and the trial which has taken place, with the verdict against me, will have this happy effect, that greater interest in the cause will be excited, and my work more extensively circulated.

The trial has given me one advantage which I did not formerly possess,—that of identifying Mr Scott, in some measure, with the Catholic Vindicator. I was never before able to ascertain this, else it would perhaps have been a sufficient defence against any claim of damages that he could make, because the language of the Vindicator is infinitely more abusive of me, than ever mine was of Mr Scott. Aware of this, the pursuer was at great pains to make it appear that he had no hand in that work. His counsel in the strongest language disavowed, and, I think, even condemned it; and Bishop Cameron, the first witness examined on his side, deponed that he disapproved of both Andrews and his writings; that he believed no Catholic clergyman in Scotland approved of them; and farther, that of the four Vicars Apostolic in England, they were approved by only one, namely Dr Milner. Mr Scott had been at the pains to get a deposition from Mr Andrews himself, which was read in court, in which he declared that he had been informed that at first Mr Scott approved of the Vindicator as a work of controversy, but that towards the conclusion, he had discouraged it, and that he was not the writer of any part of it. But Mr Henniker, another of his witnesses, deponed that Mr Scott, one Sunday, after Christian doctrine, that is, after sermon in his chapel, actually exhorted his people to buy the work, in order to indemnify the committee who had become bound to Mr Andrews for the expense of it, and who were suffering loss in consequence of its not selling. I am therefore entitled to consider him as an approver of the CATHOLIC VINDICATOR, and a party concerned in all the libellous matter which it contains; and had I known the fact in time to have taken an issue upon it, I am persuaded he would not have obtained a farthing of damages.

I shall here quote a few pasages from the work which Mr Scott recommended to his people, to show the freedoms which have been used with my name. I am afraid of disgusting the reader, but he is well off in being called upon to suffer nothing but disgust. It never came into my head to bring the calumniator into a court of law, to answer for his libellous productions, because I felt conscious that none of his calumnies applied to me; and that I was able to answer him by facts and arguments; and it is only those who are conscious that they have not this advantage that would take advantage of the law to silence an adversary:—

"If," says Mr Andrews, speaking of the Protestant, "if he thinks me an infidel and a heathen, I have proved him to be a fabricator and a forger; and before he again asserts that I worship the devil, I would recommend him seriously to break off his connection with the father of lies. If he does not attend to my advice it will be the worse for him, and he will, before long, wish that he had been as incapable of writing, as his three credible witnesses; for then he would not have exposed himself, as he has now done; nor given the honest citizens of Glasgow the opportunity of pointing their finger at him, and saying, There goes the calumniator of Catholicity, and lying advocate of Protestantism," col. 480.

In col. 511, I am called a "convicted fabricator and confuted liar." In 548, a rancorous bigot and "a cowardly assassin." In 557, an "unprincipled libeller." In 567, I am represented as "a convicted forger, and protector of an adulterous strumpet."* This surely is

* This refers to the woman whose husband left her because she would not become a Papist. Her character is bad enough, and had I said any thing like this of Mr Scott, I deserved to pay heavy damages. The following is equally calumnious, but more artfully laid. The Vindicator, by a sort of side wind, endeavours to identify me with the first of the radicals, as if I were one of that noisy and turbulent fraternity. In col. 607 we read as follows:—

"How came The Protestant to forget the trials of Mr Thomas Muir, before the supreme court of Justiciary at Edinburgh, and the Rev. Mr Palmer, a dissenting minister of Dundee, before the circuit court of Justiciary, in the year 1793; the first of whom was sentenced to be transported fourteen years, and the latter seven? Has he forgotten the trial and execution of Mr Robert Watt for high treason at Edinburgh, in the year following? What, however, I wish particularly to ask him is, if he does not recollect 'the British Convention, which assembled about this period; and whether he does not know a person then residing at Paisley, who became a member of this political assembly, and after possessing himself of its secrets and proceedings, went to the office of the Sheriff court, and there basely betrayed his former associates, by which disgraceful proceeding some of them were transported beyond the seas for sedition, of whom a Mr Margarot, I believe, for I write from memory, was one, and who returned from exile but two or three years since? I hope The Protestant will not refuse me a plain and unequivocal answer to these questions, nor delay satisfying me so long as he did in the case of the man in the Wynd."

This is evidently meant to insinuate that I was a member of the famous British Convention, held at Edinburgh in 1793, of which, and of its consequences, Mr Andrews seems to know much more than I do, for certainly I was not then of age to be a member of so grave an assembly, though I do recollect something of it. He insinuates also, that I became an informer, and that I betrayed my associates, so that some of them were banished. In a subsequent part of his work, he proceeds upon the assumption of this being a fact, which he at first puts forth as a matter of enquiry, and he affects to be afraid lest I should inform against him at the Sheriff's Office, col. 657. I can scarcely call this libellous matter, because, upon the supposition that I had been a member of a political assembly, and that I had unexpectedly found them seditiously disposed, it would have been my duty to inform against them, and to put the magistrates upon their guard. In point of fact, however, no such event ever took place in my history. The thing was a mere fabrication of Mr Andrews, or of his Glasgow committee; and the intention of it evidently was to mark me out as an object of vengeance to the radicals, who then considered themselves as lords of the ascendant, and about to become proprietors of the soil. From his Glasgow correspondents he would learn that I was extremely active in opposing the machinations of the radicals, and in exciting the citizens to take up arms for their defence; for which purpose I went from house to house through a whole ward of the city, and superintended the distribution of arms from the barracks. In order, therefore, to mark me out as an object of vengeance, he, or his correspondents, invented the above story; and had I raised an action of damages against him and them at that time, I have no doubt I should have been able to make some of them leave the country, or to continue in it against their will under lock and key. But it was never the persons or the property of Papists that I suffered to occupy my attention, but only their errors; of which it was indeed my wish to denude them, not for my advantage, but for their profit.

But I shall give a specimen or two more of the libellous manner in which the Vindicator writes; and let it not be forgotten, that this is the work which Mr Scott recommended to his people, one Sunday, "after Christian doctrine;"—"I tell you, Mr William M'Gavin, this will not do: you must come forward and clear yourself from the many gross contradictions, and misrepresentations, and falsehoods, which I have proved against you, or the work which you have undertaken will only be considered, what it really is, a tissue of inconsistencies and untruths, penned by a convicted fabricator, and retailer of lies," col. 672.

Towards the conclusion of his work, the Vindicator gives my name and surname in connec-without reproach in the neighbourhood in which she has long resided; yet Mr Andrews never, or scarcely ever mentions her name, or refers to her, but in such language as the above. If she had the means of taking him and his committee to the law, there can be no doubt she would obtain damages suitable to their ability and her circumstances. By "protector," as applied to me, nothing more can be meant, consistently with truth, than that I have taken this woman's part against her enemies; but he knows that the word has a fashionable meaning, especially when connected with such words as he has made to follow it; and no doubt he wishes it to be applied to me in this fashionable sense; and if Popery shall exist next century, these words will be raked up out of the dust; and such writers as the Vindicator will boldly maintain that "THE PROTESTANT," who wrote against Catholicity in the nineteenth century, was literally such a man as these slanderous words indicate. Luther and other reformers, in this manner, are slandered by Papists at this day; and it does not appear that any cotemporary writer laid such a foundation for it as the Vindicator has here laid for the abuse of my name, if the remembrance of it shall survive myself. Here the malignant character of Popery appears in its true light. This is a species of persecution more cruel than that of the stake or the gibbet; and who can doubt that these will be put in requisition also whenever Papists obtain the power? I am not speaking of Papists in Spain or Italy, but of those who live in the midst of us, who hired and paid the Vindicator for writing such abominable calumnies, who gave them all the publicity in their power, and had the work containing them recommended on a Sunday in their chapel.

tion with all that is vile and infamous; and not content with this, he, or his committee, had me posted upon the corners of the streets every week, in great hand bills, as a coward, a forger, a defender of adultery, &c. &c. all which I suffered without ever thinking it worth while to apply to a court of law, because I was sure that those who knew me did not believe that I was guilty of such things. I hoped to live down, and to write down all such calumnies. I have done so; and had I taken any other way to silence my adversaries, had I raised an action of damages against them, it would have laid the foundation of a reasonable suspicion that I really was what they represented me to be, that is, "a deceiver and a cheat, and as such, deserving the execration of all honest men," col. 674.

I am persuaded the reader is heartily tired of such coarse and scurrilous abuse, and I should have spared him the pain of reading it, had I not ascertained the fact that it was approved and paid for by a committee of Glasgow Papists, and actually recommended to them, "one Sunday, after Christian doctrine."

The Catholic Vindicator contains, amidst all its abuse, some curious disclosures, relating both to the doctrine and discipline of the Church of Rome. It was my intention to have touched but slightly on these, and to have made the third volume the last of my work, extending it a few Numbers beyond the size of the first and second; but the flattering approbation which I continue to receive from all quarters, Rome always excepted, and the extraordinary degree of interest which I have been honoured to excite in behalf of the Protestant cause, which I consider the same as genuine Christianity, have determined me to persevere for a longer period, and to commence a fourth volume, of which the first Number will be published on Saturday next, the 14th instant, to be continued weekly as heretofore.

The question, cui bono? is not asked so frequently now, as it was when I began to write three years ago. The public mind is more alive to the subject than it was then. Events have risen in the course of providence which have drawn the minds of many to serious reflection, and to anticipate the possibility of danger to our civil and religious privileges, from the countenance that is given to Popery in different quarters. We hear not indeed of many conversions to Popery, at least among persons of education and respectable rank in society; but there is a very prevailing indifference to Bible Christianity among all ranks, which leads men to the verge of Popery before they are aware of it. Having the name of Christian, without the thing signified by it, persons are in a state the most favourable for embracing Popery, because it flatters them with the notion that they have the thing, if they are but observant of certain forms, which they can easily be, without any change of heart; without giving up their love of sin, or even the practice of it; without love to God or deadness to the world, or any of the features of that holiness, without which, it is declared, no man shall see the Lord.

Add to this prevailing indifference to real Christianity, the extraordinary degree of favour into which Papists have wrought themselves with many of our senators, I may say a majority of them, in the lower house; insomuch that a bill actually passed that house, which, had it passed into a law, would have brought Papists in among them, and into the upper house also, and into all places of power and trust, with one or two exceptions, which exceptions would not long have remained, had Papists themselves been brought in to legislate along with persons already prepared to go all lengths in concessions to the "Roman Catholics," as they are now almost universally denominated, and whose virtues are praised in such terms as if it were believed that virtue would die with them.

I have often said that the subject of "Catholic emancipation" did not belong to my plan, though I have at different times slightly touched upon it; and I venture to affirm, that no person is capable of judging of the merits of that question, until he has studied the character of Popery as exhibited in the writings and in the practice of Papists. I affirm this with the more confidence, seeing I know both sides of the question, and because a careful study of the system has overcome my own prepossessions, which, at the time I began to write, were all on the side of emancipation. Ever since I was capable of reflection, I have abhorred every species of persecution for conscience' sake, or for the sake of religion; and I abhor it at this hour as much as ever I did; but my mistake lay in considering that persecution which is not so. It is not persecution to prevent aliens from sitting in parliament, or in our courts of justice, because every state requires, for its own security, that those who legislate, or administer its laws, be in a condition to maintain undivided allegiance to the sovereign. This an alien cannot do, for he is under a previous obligation of allegiance to a foreign power, which may levy war against the state under which he enjoys protection. A Papist is precisely in this state. Let him declare allegiance to the crown of Great Britain and Ireland, in terms as strong as words can make them, they cannot set aside a previous allegiance which he owes to the Pope, in virtue of a grant which he believes Jesus Christ to have given to him through the medium of St Peter. This is an allegiance to which every other must of necessity give place. They say it is only spiritual allegiance, but it is impossible to render spiritual allegiance to a creature without being liable to render temporal allegiance also, whenever the spiritual power shall require it. To suppose the contrary, would be to suppose that a man's spiritual interests have no influence over his temporal ones; or that his religion is not the rule of his conduct. When, therefore, a dispute should arise between the King of Britain and the Pope, a thing which has happened oftener than once, and may happen again, a Papist would be under a spiritual obligation to the Pope, from which nothing of a temporal nature could relieve him; and to exclude such a person from power in a Protestant state, is not persecution, but a necessary measure of self-defence.

Besides, a genuine Papist is not a free agent. He is not at liberty to act according to his own convictions, farther than it may be agreeable to his priest and confessor. His confessor is lord of his conscience, to whom he is obliged, under pain of being held guilty of mortal sin, to reveal his most secret thoughts. Depending upon his ghostly father for the forgiveness of his sins, and what are called the consolations of his religion, without which he must live without comfort, and die without hope, he must of necessity conduct himself, in every respect, so as to stand upon good terms with his priest. If intrusted with power in a Protestant country, he must exert himself to promote the interest of the holy church; that is, the interest of the court and see of Rome. Every priest is under a solemn oath to do this, to the utmost of his power: and how could he do it better, than by using the influence which he might possess over the consciences of men in power, if any of his penitents were in that situation? I say, then, it is not persecution to exclude such persons from places of power and trust; because they have not power over their own actions; they have resigned themselves to the will of others; and are, therefore, not in a situation to legislate and administer justice. There are three parties: themselves, their priests, and the public at large: they are the slaves of the second, and cannot safely be intrusted with the interests of the third. Those who legislate and administer the laws of men, ought to be independent of men, and free from all human influence. This a Papist cannot be: he wants an indispensable qualification for a public trust; and it is not persecution to exclude him from it, any more than it is persecution to exclude the deaf and dumb from parliament.

No. CLVII.

SATURDAY, JULY, 14TH, 1821.

IN some previous numbers I discussed, at considerable length, the subject of withholding the bible from the common people, of which the Church of Rome has been notoriously guilty. I quoted the rule of the Council of Trent, in which it is positively forbidden that any layman should possess a bible in the vulgar tongue, without a license in writing from the bishop, or some other functionary. And now that Papists, who live in Protestant countries, have been shamed into the measure of allowing the reading of the bible, as Dr Hodgson justly remarks in his excellent sermon on the subject, they make a boast of the permission, granted, in certain cases, by the Trent Council. They take the exception for the rule; and boldly maintain, that it never was a doctrine of the Church of Rome, that the common people should be denied the use of the bible. Amicus Veritatis made the strange assertion, that the church did no more in this respect than the Bible Society does, that will not permit the distribution of any but the authorized version of the scriptures. This was representing the Bible Society as interfering with the freedom of the press, and prohibiting the circulation of every translation of the Bible in English, but one. But all the world knows that this is not the fact; and all persons of common sense may know, that the rule of the Bible Society, by which they bind themselves to distribute the authorized English version only, does not prohibit the distribution of any other version that persons may choose to sell or give away. I thought I had made this sufficiently plain in my reply to Amicus Veritatis; but the Catholic Vindicator does not, or will not understand it. Thus he writes, speaking of THE PROTESTANT.:—

"He accuses his former opponent, Amicus Veritatis, of 'falsely asserting that the Bible Society will not permit the circulation of any but the authorized version of the scriptures;' but is not this a palpable falsehood of his own? The Bible society expressly confines its distribution to the version authorized by Act of Parliament; and, consequently, as far as its power and influence extends, the Society excludes all other versions but that approved by its rules. What is this, then, but following the example of the Church of Rome, which approves of the Vulgate as the most authentic and correct? As a body, the Bible Society permits the circulation of one edition only, and therefore the assertion of Amicus Veritatis is consistent with truth, unless THE PROTESTANT can show there is one rule in the Society to limit the circulation of the bible to the approved version, and another to allow the promiscuous distribution of any of the various editions now in existence." Col. 231.

I am almost ashamed to attempt a serious answer to such deplorable quibbling. The Bible Society never professed to allow or disallow the circulation of any version of the scriptures; and therefore there can be no analogy between its procedure and that of the Church of Rome, which authoritatively puts the bible in the list of prohibited books; and declares that if any man shall presume to possess one without a license in writing from a bishop, or inquisitor, he shall not receive the absolution of his sins till he has returned it to the ordinary. (De Libris Prohibitis, Regula IV.) One thing, however, we learn from the Vindicator's pleading, that is, he is really ashamed of the conduct of his church in this matter. This appears from his attempt to show that she does nothing but what Protestants do, and it is reckoned sufficient justification of her conduct, to allege, that Protestants do the same thing. The allegation is false, to be sure; but the very making of it is an admission that there is something in Protestantism which Papists would fain attach to themselves, and have the credit of possessing. They wish to be thought friendly to the distribution of the bible; but it is easy to see from their writings, particularly those of the Vindicator, that they set little value on its authority.

That the word of God was addressed to all men, and intended to be read by all, I showed from the introduction to the lxxviii. Psalm, which is evidently an address of the God of Israel to his people, not to the priests in particular; and that address calls upon the people to attend, not to itself only, but to the whole of his word:—the words are, "Give ear, my people, to my law; incline your ears to the words of my mouth." The word law is a common expression for the whole of divine revelation, especially when connected with the word testimony, as it is in the 5th verse: "He established a testimony in Jacob, and appointed a law in Israel." This testimony and law is that to which the people are called to attend: and Isaiah exhorts the people of his time to bring the doctrine of every teacher to the test of the written word; "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, there is no light in them." On this subject, the Vindicator remarks: "I think my opponent has chosen a most unfit text on which to rest his argument, because the words of the royal Prophet evidently convey a different meaning to that which THE PROTESTANT has put upon them; inasmuch as they relate to traditional communication, and not to any written or printed interchange of knowledge. How this proclamation is to establish the assertion of our accuser, that the word of God is to be universally READ, when there is not a word in the whole psalm about reading, requires deeper skill than this scriptural sage at present possesses, to explain to the satisfaction of any reasoning mind: little ingenuity, however, is required to dislodge our accuser from the high mound on which he imagines himself secure. Until the time of Moses, embracing a period of 2500 years of the world's existence, the will and law of God were made known to his chosen people through the oral communications of the patriarchs, and consequently could not then be universally read. When Moses received the written law of God on mount Sinai, he received but one copy, which he destroyed on witnessing the idolatry of the stiffnecked Israelites, and was obliged to supplicate the Almighty for another table; which having received, together with every instruction necessary for his own and the people's future conduct, he was not commanded to publish copies of it for the use of the people, but to build a tabernacle, which was to contain an ark in which was to be placed the table of the law; and to this ark none were to have access but those who were expressly chosen by God himself for the sacred purpose; —this ark was called the ark of testimony, and the ark of the covenant, by which name the law itself is often called in holy writ. From this fact alone, then, it is convincingly plain, that, although the law was in the first instance (Exod. xix.) published by God to the whole people of Israel, yet succeeding generations were to receive it from those who were appointed to teach them it, not by distributing multiplied copies of it, to interpret it according to their own fancies, but by oral communication; and in case of any division or dispute, recourse was to be had to those who were selected to decide on the subject." Col. 238, 239.

It is the reading of the law and testimony that occasions so much anxiety and alarm among modern Papists. They conceive that all would be safe, if every thing were left to the word-of-mouth teaching of their priests, for then care would be taken that nothing should be promulgated that might be prejudicial to their church. Thus they try to evade the force of what is contained in the lxxviii. Psalm, by maintaining that it does not contain a word about reading. Very true: but then what was the use of writing it? The fact that the psalm was written for the use of the people, necessarily implies that it was to be read by the people, else the writing of it was needless. If all religious instruction was necessarily to be oral, as Mr Andrews seems to allege, then David should have merely recited the psalm to the priests, and commanded them to recite it to the people; but the simple fact of its being written under divine inspiration, implies the obligation of reading it upon all to whom it is addressed.

I admit, that until the time of Moses, it does not appear that there was any written revelation of the will of God, and of course no obligation upon the people to read it. The Almighty was then pleased to hold direct communications with the patriarchs, in a manner quite unknown to us; and the Popish priests would have the people to believe that they stand in the same relation to God as the patriarchs did: and that their word-of-mouth teaching is entitled to the same respect as that of Noah, of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: but this proves nothing but the impiety and impudence of these priests; for they are not able to show, by any sign or miracle, that they have received such power or authority; and their general character is not such as to induce us to believe that they have more direct communication with heaven than other men.

Whenever we bring a Papist to the bible, we are sure to find him in error; and this shows it to be their wisdom to keep at as great a distance from the bible as possible. The Vindicator has fallen into several mistakes in his account of Moses and of the law. For instance, he tells us, that Moses having broken the two tables, "was obliged to supplicate the Almighty for another table." This is a mere invention of his own, or of some other Papist, from whom he has taken it; for it does not appear that Moses ever thought of supplicating the Almighty to replace that which, in his anger, he had destroyed. The renewing of the two tables was as much of God himself, as the giving of the law at first; and it was without any supplication on the part of Moses, as the reader may see, Exod. xxxiv. 1.; Deut. x. 1.

Again, the Vindicator would have us believe, that when Moses received the law, he was commanded to lock it up, and to conceal it from the people, just as the Church of Rome concealed the bible, and that nobody was to see it but the priests, who were to declare it to the people by word of mouth. It is admitted, that the identical tables, written by the finger of God, were to be deposited in the ark of the covenant; but Moses engrossed the very words in his book of Exodus, and again in the book of Deuteronomy, which shows that he understood it to be his duty to commit the law to writing, that it might be read by all the people. Nay, he gave a commandment that every head of a family should write it, or have it written, that all his household might have it constantly before their eyes as well as sounded in their ears. "Hear, O Israel; the Lord our God is one Lord: and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart. And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates;" Deut. vi. 4—9. The Vindicator says, Moses was not commanded to publish copies of the law for the use of the people; but it is all the same if he did, acting under divine direction, publish copies of it, and command every family to have a copy of it. He entertained no fear that the people would misinterpret it, or wrest it to their own destruction, as the Church of Rome always affects to fear that her children will do with the bible. It is probable that many a Jew did misinterpret and wrest the law to his own destruction, by trusting in it, instead of trusting in Him who is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth; but that was no reason why every Jew should not possess a copy of the law; so the possibility of persons wresting the bible to their own destruction, is no reason why they should not possess, and be allowed to read, a bible.

In reply to the cavils of a writer in the Orthodox Journal, I had said, that if any man was so wickedly inclined, as to wrest the scripture to any sense or nonsense he pleased, I knew no power on earth that had a right to hinder him; that God reserved judgment in such a case to himself; and that though every church had a right to put away from among them, those who should pervert the scriptures, no man or body of men had a right to prevent the exercise of private judgment. The amount of this is, that every man has a right to judge for himself; and that if he happens to judge differently from the church to which he belongs, they have a right to put him away, if they think the difference of such importance, as to affect the fundamental principles of their association. They have no right to say, you shall not believe so and so; but if such be your faith, that we cannot have fellowship with you, you must depart from us. This they have a right to say; and this a church ought to say to every one who departs from the faith, or holy practice enjoined by Christ, and illustrated by his apostles. In this simple statement of a very obvious principle laid down in the New Testament, the Vindicator can find nothing but a mass of contradictions and inconsistences. The following are his words; and though the passage is long, I hope the reader will have patience to peruse it with attention:—

"Well, were the Church of Rome to exhibit such a mass of nonsense as 'THE PROTESTANT' would fain persuade himself and his readers she does, I am sure it does not, it cannot be, equal, be it what it will, to the absurd, ridiculous, and contradictory rhapsody I have just quoted from his 32d Number, p. 255, 256. The sapient writer knows no power on earth that has a right to hinder a man from turning the word of God into nonsense, if he is so inclined; and yet he admits that God has authorized his churches to exclude him from their communion for so doing! What inconsistency is this! If men choose to turn the truth of God's word into falsehood, they must answer to God not to man, because he has reserved judgment in this case to himself; and yet he has also authorized his churhes to pass judgment upon a case which he expressly reserves to himself; for this they must do, if they have power to put the offenders from their body for their gross perversion and wickedness. Well, reader, having allowed that God has authorized his churches to put away the wilful perverter and falsifier of his sacred word, he denies in the very same sentence that He has given any man or body of men on earth, the power either to allow or prevent the free exercise of private judgment. Were ever such barefaced contradictions before submitted to a British public in an age so enlightened as the present is presumed to be? Talk of the monstrous nonsense of the Church of Rome, truly; why what are we to call this specimen of 'new light' logic?—'THE PROTESTANT' intimates in his 31st Number, p. 348, 'it is vain to expect that Mr Andrews will argue upon scriptural principles;' I wish he would endeavour to argue on rational ones. That there is a power on earth to disallow the free exercise of private judgment on matters of faith, is as clear from scripture as the sun at noon-day, and nothing but ignorance or wilful perversion could instigate my opponent to advance so palpable an untruth. Does not our Saviour in a before-quoted text from Matt. xviii. declare, that the church has this power of allowing and preventing the exercise of private judgment? If a man presumed to differ from those things which he commanded his apostles to teach all nations, did not Christ order him to be reported to the church, and if he would not hear the church, that is, if he did not relinquish his private judgment to the public decision of those who are appointed to be judges in Israel, was he not to be cast out as an unworthy member, and consigned to infamy? What is this but conferring a power on a body of men to disallow and prevent the exercise of private judgment? The men from Judea, mentioned in a preceding page, exercised their private judgment; but did not the apostles and elders condemn them for so doing? And did not Peter inform the multitude, that God had chosen them to convey the words of the gospel by word of mouth, that hearing they might believe? Again, 'THE PROTESTANT' avers, that the bible, if perused with an unbiassed mind, is 'the plainest book in the world;' that it 'is perfectly level to the capacity of a child.' But is not this setting up his own arrogant opinion in opposition to the sentiments of the apostle St Peter, who, in his second epistle, iii. 15, 16, writes, 'Even as our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you. As also in all his epistles speaking in them of these things, in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, unto their own destruction.' These words clearly dmonstrate that the scripture is not so plain a book, is not so perfectly level to the capacity of a child, as 'THE PROTESTANT' affirms it is, and therefore he stands convicted of twisting and perverting scripture to a contrary sense than what an inspired apostle declares it to be. Whether the biblical sage was fearful he had overstepped the bounds of truth in this assertion, I cannot say; but I find him, in his 33d Number, p. 261, admitting, that 'while he maintains that such parts of the bible as relate directly to the salvation of sinners are level to the capacity of a child, he must allow that there are some things not easily understood, particularly prophecies not yet accomplished, and of which (he says) the priests are as ignorant as the meanest of their people.' Well, this is an admission which I think operates against the system of universal distribution and universal reading.—St Peter says, that in all the epistles of his chosen co-apostle Paul there are some things hard to be understood, which men wrest to their own destruction, as they do also other parts of the scripture; and is it not therefore clear that these epistles were not intended for the multitude, but that the people were to confide in those who were appointed bishops and pastors of their souls? If the scriptures were meant to be accessible to all men, would not copies of them have been multiplied before the apostles were sent on their commission? And yet the New Testament was not even penned until a vast number of Jews and Gentiles had been converted to the faith of Christ. Surely this fact is sufficient to overthrow the Protestant doctrine of the bible, the bible alone, is the rule of faith, and more particularly the newfangled and popular one of universal scripture reading. Let a bible be put into the hands of a child, or even of an adult, without note or comment, and let him be left to point out from the book, without any instruction from a second person, the passages which relate to the way of salvation, and I will answer for it, either of them will make a pretty hand of it."—Col. 246—249.

In this passage the reader will find the persecuting spirit of Popery explicitly defended. There is, says the Vindicator, a power on earth to disallow the free exercise of private judgment. This power he ascribes to the church, meaning of course the Church of Rome, all the authority of which is exercised by the Pope and his clergy. It is the Pope and the clergy, therefore, that have the power of disallowing the free exercise of private judgment; that is, to cast out, and consign to infamy, all who presume to find, in the word of God, any doctrine or ordinance which the Church of Rome does not teach; or who find that some of the doctrines of that church are contrary to what they read in the bible. We all know that the practice of the Church of Rome has been, to consign to infamy, and to flames too, a countless multitude, in many nations, for no other crime than the exercise of private judgment, which was nothing but the use of that understanding which God gave them, about matters infinitely interesting to themselves. Modern Papists, at least British ones, have of late endeavoured to throw a veil over this part of their church's history; and it has become fashionable even among them to condemn persecution for conscience sake; but here is the organ of our Glasgow Papists laying it down as an incontrovertible principle, that his church has the power of punishing men for presuming to think for themselves upon matters which relate to the salvation of their own souls. This is the very essence of persecution for conscience sake; and we need no more to convince us, that if Papists had power over us, Protestants would be punished by being consigned to infamy and the flames.

There is a great quantity of nonsense in the above extract, which, I think, it is needless to notice, as every intelligent Protestant reader will be able to answer it for himself. What I mean to show by it, is, the deep-rooted dislike that Papists have to the bible, as a book of general instruction,—a dislike which they cannot conceal, even when affecting to respect it. They present, therefore, the very reverse of the character of the righteous man, described in the first Psalm, "whose delight is in the law of the Lord, and in his law he meditates day and night." All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and it is so profitable for every Christian purpose, as to make the man of God perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works; 2 Tim. iii. 16, 17. Of this perfection Papists practically can know nothing. It is of the very essence of it, to seek to promote the perfection of others; and if the priests had it, they would labour to impart the same blessing to the people; but by withholding the bible from them, or by dissuading them from the reading of it, they effectually keep them in an ignorant and carnal state.

No. CLVIII.

SATURDAY, JULY 21ST, 1821.

LET us now attend a little to the subject of apostolic succession. I had maintained, and I maintain still, that the apostles had no successors; meaning, as I distinctly explained my words, that their extraordinary and miraculous powers, as inspired men, were not transferred to others, but terminated with them, personally and respectively. The Vindicator maintains, with the Douay catechism, that every Popish priest is a successor of the apostles, and of course possessed of every apostolical power, for this must be implied in the word succession, when used without limitation; for it is a succession as complete as that of George the fourth to George the third.

"Against this doctrine," says the Vindicator, "the accuser expressively avers, that the apostles had no successors; but in this statement he is decidedly opposed by the very Scriptures, which he makes the rule of his faith. Does not the bible inform us, that the very first act of the apostles, after the ascension of Christ, and before the descent of the Holy Ghost, was the choice of a successor to fill up the vacancy occasioned by the death of the traitor Judas?" To which I answered, this is partly true; and if the Popish priests would limit their claim of succession to that of the apostle Judas, I would not dispute the point with them. But who does not know, that it was a necessary qualification in him who should be chosen to succeed even Judas, that he should have been a personal attendant on Christ's ministry on earth, and a companion of the other apostles, during "all the time that the Lord Jesus went out and in among them; beginning from the baptism of John, unto that same day that he was taken up from them;" Acts i. 21, 22. To this no pastor of any church after the first century could pretend; and of course no one could justly claim to be a successor of the apostles. Paul himself, though not one of Christ's companions, as the other apostles were, rests his title to apostleship upon the fact of his having seen Christ personally, and having received his commission directly from him, and not through the medium of other apostles; 1 Cor. ix. 1; Gal. i. 11—16. Here there is a broad line of distinction drawn between apostles and all other ministers of Christ. An apostle was one who had seen Christ in the flesh, and received commission from Christ's own mouth, and who had received farther, the extraordinary and miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost, by which he became an infallible teacher of the truth, and was enabled to confirm the same by miracles and signs from heaven. It is not said that these gifts were confined to the twelve, or the thirteen, including Matthias and Paul, for there were seventy whom Christ distinguished among his followers, and commissioned to be preachers of the gospel, who would not probably be silenced after the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the hundred and twenty; and we find that some of the early converts, such as Barnabas, were endowed with extraordinary gifts, and associated with the apostles, under the same general name, for the propagation of the gospel; but still these were men divinely called, and miraculously endowed. As such, I maintain that they had no successors; and those that maintain that they had, and who profess at this day to be their living successors, ought to produce evidence of their having been so called. Until they shall do this by miracles or otherwise, we must continue to regard them as no better than impious impostors; especially as the personal character of most of them is so different from that of the men whose successors they profess to be.

I said that what the Vindicator alleged as to the choice of a successor to Judas was partly true; for it is not wholly true, as he states it. He says, it was to supply "the vacancy occasioned by the death of Judas." Now this is not the fact; for it was not the death but the apostasy and treachery of Judas that made the vacancy. It was not the office that fell vacant at the death of Judas; but the office "from which Judas by transgression fell," before his death, and independently of it, that was to be filled up. Superficial readers may think this a nice and unnecessary distinction, but it is not so by any means. The Church of Rome will have Judas to have retained the office of an apostle till his death, notwithstanding his treachery; and then she finds that persons in holy orders are officially holy, independently of their personal character; and if Judas had his office, at his death, devolved upon Matthias by the election of his brethren, then it follows, that any successor of St Peter, though as wicked as Judas, may, by the election of the college of cardinals, devolve all the holiness of St Peter's character, and all the authority of his apostleship, upon a new Pope. This is the doctrine of Rome; but there can be nothing more opposed to that of the New Testament.

I had said that Christ gave to his church apostles first; that is, men divinely inspired for the extraordinary work to which they were called, as witnesses for Him of what they had seen and heard; but that for the permanent edification of the church, and for preaching the gospel in after ages, he gave pastors and teachers, men whose business it is not to publish any new doctrine, but merely to preach and make known what is already published in the Scriptures. Seeing these pastors and teachers came after the apostles, and did not go before them, the Vindicator cannot understand why they were not their successors; and so, I suppose, he would not understand me, if I were to say he is not a successor of King George the third, seeing he lives after, and did not live before him. But let us have his own words: "Admitting that Christ gave to the church, after the decease of the apostles, pastors and teachers, merely to make known what had been already published, what were they but successors to them? They did not precede them; they were not coeval, but they followed them in the ministry; and therefore by all the rules of sound logic and common sense, they must be their successors."—Col. 262. Certainly, if they followed them in the same office, with the same powers. But this is what remains to be proved, and nothing that the Church of Rome has yet adduced, is so much as the shadow of a proof.

The apostles were divinely commissioned to declare what they had seen and heard, and which was new to the world; that the Saviour, long promised and expected, had actually come unto the world, and finished the work of salvation, by dying on the cross, and making himself an offering for sin; that he had risen from the dead, and had gone into heaven; that most of them had seen him alive after his resurrection, and witnessed his ascent from the earth; and that one of them had actually seen him and heard him speak from heaven. These things were not only new to the people, but they were also new truths, or rather facts, because they were things which had recently happened, of which the apostles were witnesses; and the peculiar work of their office was to bear witness of what they had seen and heard. In this it was impossible, in the nature of the thing, that they could have successors after their own age; and the fact that the extraordinary powers with which they were endowed were not transferred from them to others, shows that it was no part of the divine plan that they should have successors.

The Vindicator affects to be agreed with me on one point. "There is one avowal," says he, "made by The Protestant which I perfectly coincide with; that is, that God gave pastors and teachers, men whose business it is not to publish any NEW doctrine. Here we are agreed; this is a point for which all Catholics contend; it is the basis of their faith; it is the ground on which they rest the infallibility of their church; and it is the rock against which all those who are tossed to and fro with every wind of doctrine are wrecked. On this point I am ready to take my stand; and to bring the matter to an issue with my opponent, I will detail, in as brief a manner as possible, the progress of Catholic teachers and missionaries, from the time of the apostles to that of Luther's pretended reformation, and contrast their mode of conversion to that of evangelical reformers, so that the reader may form his own opinion as to the claim which each has as to the merit of not publishing a new doctrine, and, of course, entitled to the character of pastors and teachers of the church."—Col. 263.

He begins by assuming, and asserting as a fact, what has never been proved, and I am sure, never will be proved while the world stands. "In the first place," says he, "Catholics can show an uninterrupted succession of bishops of Rome, from the martyrdom of St Peter in that city, in the year of Christ 36, to the present pontiff." Were this true, Peter could not have exercised his apostleship much more than two years; but I suppose the Vindicator did not know that the Christian era commences at the birth of Christ, not at the period of his death; and he did not know that writers of his own communion fix the date of Peter's martyrdom at least thirty years later than he has done. This is of very little importance, seeing it has not yet been proved that Peter ever saw Rome, much less that he was martyred there. The Vindicator next assumes it as a thing indisputable, that the apostles and their successors were all staunch Papists; and that it was Popery that was by their ministry propagated through the different nations of the world, whose very names fill a column of his work. This is that sort of waste of words that is called beating the air, or thrashing the water; it leaves no impression, for there is no truth in it. Through a number of pages we have the changes rung upon the words "no new doctrine;" and here again the Vindicator proceeds upon the assumption, that the doctrine of Luther and the other reformers was new, and that of Rome was old. But this was never conceded by any Protestant; it is the very point at issue between Protestants and Papists, and therefore, the latter have no right to take it for granted, as the Vindicator does.

Protestants maintain, upon good grounds, that the peculiarities of Popery are mere novelties. They grant that the principle of it is as old as the entrance of sin into the world; but every thing in the Church of Rome, that can be distinguished from ancient heathenism, is a mere novelty. Such, for instance, is transubstantiation. There is nothing like this among the ancient heathen; for such an absurdity never entered the head of any of them that a man might eat the God that made him. For this the Church of Rome alone is answerable; and it was not established as a doctrine of this church earlier than the 13th century of the Christian era; I mean, by the Lateran council, which met, I think, in 1215.

This corner stone of Popery, therefore, is no better than a great novelty. It was a new doctrine brought into the church, by those who pretended to be successors of the apostles, but who had themselves apostatized from the truth and simplicity of the gospel. Luther and the other reformers introduced no new doctrine, or commandment, when they began the Reformation; but an old commandment which was from the beginning. They returned to the New Testament, and threw aside the rubbish which had been accumulating for ages. Having tasted of the old wine, they did not desire the new; for they said truly, the old is better; and this applies not merely to transubstantiation, but to every Popish peculiarity that happened to start up in the dark ages.

Notwithstanding that the Vindicator agrees with me, that pastors and teachers, the ordinary ministers of the church, are not to publish any new doctrine, he seems unable to understand what is the use of them, if they are not commissioned to do the very thing which he admits they cannot do. I had said that the business of the ordinary ministers of the church was not to publish any new doctrine, but merely to preach and make known what was already published in the Scriptures. This he admits; and yet he cannot comprehend the use of men making known what has been already published. "What," says he, "should we say of our government, if it were to appoint men to proclaim and expound laws which were already published, and which every man was at liberty to interpret according to his fancy?" This strikes at the foundation of a gospel ministry altogether, unless it be understood that every minister possesses the extraordinary powers of an apostle. This, I suppose, is what the Vindicator and every Popish priest would have us to believe; but we must demur a little; and we shall soon see that there is no occasion to concede so much.

Pastors and teachers, by which are meant the ordinary ministers of the gospel, are not appointed to publish new truths, but to make known those which are already published in the bible. On this subject, it may be worth while to dilate a little. The bible contains all that the Almighty has to say to the children of men until the day of judgment. Christ came not only to make an end of sin-offering—to cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease; but also to seal up the vision and prophecy, Dan. ix. 24. that is, to close or complete the volume of inspiration. This he did by a revelation to the last of his apostles, whose concluding words direct Christians, not to expect any other prophecy, or revelation, but the revelation of Christ himself in person at the last day. The book thus completed contains every thing that is necessary to be known for the salvation of sinners, and for the edification, sanctification, and comfort of Christians. This is best known to those who are best acquainted with it; and no argument is necessary to prove the point to them. As for those who are not acquainted with the bible, I fear arguments on such a subject would be of little avail with them; just as arguments to prove that honey is sweet, would be thrown away upon a man who had never tasted honey. To every enlightened mind it must appear certain, without reasoning about the matter, that if God is pleased to give a revelation of his will, it must be a good and a sufficient one; for nothing that is bad, or insufficient, can proceed from Him, and the bible proves itself to be what I have here represented it, to all who really know it. This, therefore, I think I am entitled to take for granted in the present controversy; and the doctrine which I build upon it is, that the pastors and teachers of Christian congregations, as well as missionaries to the heathen, have no new truths to publish, but only the old truths which they find in the bible.

This truth, however, though old in the bible, is new to every man, when it is first presented to him; and here again the Vindicator will find many contradictions in my statements; because I admit, that what is old in one sense, is new in another; and he will affect to reason from my use of the word in the one sense, to the known use of it in the other sense; and so he will flourish away about contradictions and inconsistencies without end. No matter. Pastors and teachers have nothing to do in the way of preaching, but to publish the old bible truth. Those of them who understand their business best, will be content with the work that is thus assigned to them. It is the truth that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures; that he was buried, and rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures, that is the subject of their testimony. This truth is as old as the days of the apostles; and yet it is no older than yesterday, to him that did not know it till yesterday: and thus it is the business of every preacher of the gospel to make known the old truth, and nothing else, that those to whom it is made known may be saved by it.

The preaching of this truth is as necessary in the present day, as it was in the days of the apostles, because it is not yet universally known. It is not unknown, and therefore it is not new to men called Christians, that Christ died. All Christendom knows this; but that Christ died, according to the Scriptures, is not so generally known; and without this the general historical knowledge of the fact of his death is of no use to any man or woman under heaven. Now the pastors and teachers of Christian churches have enough to do in preaching this old truth, and in pressing it as good news upon the attention of all who will hear them, that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures; that is, that he made the atonement for sin, which the Scriptures declare to have been necessary, in order to the pardon of sin, and the salvation of the sinner. This old truth is new to every sinner, when he at first receives it; and when it is afterwards repeated to him it has a new zest; and though in the ministrations of pastors and teachers, there were nothing else brought to view, he would find in this old truth, new comfort every time it was called to his remembrance. Plain honest Christians will know what this means; but I am afraid none of our Papists will understand it. My business is, to give them a reason and an argument, but I cannot give them an understanding.

The Vindicator winds up his 19th Number with a wonderful puff, which he ascribes to the Right Honourable the Irish Chief Secretary of State, who is represented to have spoken as follows, in the House of Commons, on the state of disease in Ireland, and the fact to which he referred is declared by the Vindicator to be a complete "refutation of the charge of cruelty and wickedness on the part of the catholic priesthood, advanced by the Protestant." "The clergy of the established church (said Mr Grant) had distinguished themselves by the most exemplary exertions, and the Catholic priesthood had not been found inferior to their Protestant brethren. Their religion, indeed, called them to the closest contagion with the dead and dying: and not a single instance occurred wherein they shrunk from their duty. One instance, and he did not mean to say it was a solitary one, of excelling virtue, had fallen within the sphere of his own knowledge, and was of such a nature, that he could not refrain from disclosing it to the House. A Roman Catholic priest was called upon to visit a small cabin, in which six individuals were lying, all violently afflicted with the typhus fever. The priest had no other means of receiving the dying man's communication, and of administering to him the consolations of religion, than by throwing himself on the wretched pallet upon which the sick man lay, and thus inhaling contagion from its source." "Would The Protestant," says the Vindicator, "or any of his friends, have acted thus kindly and affectionately towards this dying Papist?"

I have quoted this passage for the purpose of affording me an opportunity of giving an answer in the affirmative to the question at the end of it. I see no great merit in the conduct of the priest, who is praised so highly, seeing that, upon his own principles, he could not refuse to do what he did, without violating his most solemn engagements, and making himself guilty of the damnation of the person who should have died without the aid of his ministry. But I can tell the reader, and the Vindicator too, that when this said typhus fever, which was imported from Ireland, was raging in Glasgow, at the very time that THE PROTESTANT began his work, he and his friends were doing the very things which the Vindicator asks if they would do. It is a fact, that for several months I was exposed almost every day to the contagion, by coming in contact, in Hutcheson's Hospital, with persons come from infected houses, with petitions to have their diseased relatives removed to the Infirmary, or Relief Hospital; and yet the risk which I ran, and the trouble which I took, on that occasion, was as nothing in comparison of the trouble and risk of some of my friends, who voluntarily exposed their lives for the sake of their poor fellow-creatures, many of whom were Papists, by going into their houses, and actually turning up beds in which infected persons lay, concealed by their friends, lest the knowledge of the fever being there, should subject them to the disagreeable operation of cleansing and fumigation. I could give the name of one of our late magistrates who was at all this pains, at the hazard of his life. In short, I could give the names of upwards of twenty gentlemen, who laboured and exposed their lives in this good work; who, notwithstanding many discouragements, nobly persevered in their benevolent and well-directed operations, until they accomplished their object,—the extirpation of the disease.

These facts are known to our whole city; and seeing my own part in them was comparatively small, (being merely secretary of the committee, and not a visitor of the sick in their apartments,) I can with more confidence present them in contrast with the boasted individual case of one single priest in the kingdom of Ireland, doing no more than his official duty, in circumstances of similar affliction among the poor of his flock.

No. CLIX.

SATURDAY, JULY 28TH, 1821

I HAVE lived long enough in the world to know something of the character and manners of persons around me; and I have uniformly found, that the best men are those who are best acquainted with the word of God,—who read the bible most carefully, and who recommend the reading of it to others. Official duties of various kinds, particularly as manager of a Female Penitentiary, have given me opportunities of studying the temper, character, and manners of the most profligate and degraded of my fellow-creatures; and I have found, without a single exception, so far as I recollect, that these were not bible readers. Many of them could not read at all; and by those who could, I have been told that they seldom or never looked into the bible. I have known instances of such persons reforming, and leading a virtuous life; some of whom, I believe, have died in the faith, and others are honouring the profession of it. This happy change, I know, was connected with their reading the bible; and I never knew an instance of one being injured by this exercise, or being induced by it to injure others. I appeal to the managers of Bridewell, and other public penitentiaries, whether the same things have not come under their knowledge? Nay, I may appeal to every man who has paid any attention to the subject, whether he ever knew a good man become bad, or even a bad man become worse, in consequence of his reading the bible? I am persuaded, I shall never receive an answer in the affirmative from any man who can discern between good and evil.

But, if we believe Papists, their experience is so very different, that we might almost doubt if they be of the same species, or if their acquaintance be with creatures like ourselves, and those with whom we are acquainted. According to them, the reading of the bible is like the opening of Pandora's box. The Catholic Vindicator fills several of his Numbers (see XV. to XXV.) with minute details of the horrible effects of bible reading. He ascribes almost all the evils which have afflicted Europe for the last three hundred years to this single cause; and he is not in jest, but in furious earnest. The simple statement of this fact will, I think, be considered a sufficient exposure of it, at least with all those who value the word of God. It is not necessary that I should enter particularly into this subject again, as I could add little to what I have already said, on the duty of reading the scriptures; and on the excellence and divine authority of the word of God; see particularly, Nos. XXX. to XXXVII. and Nos. CXXXII. to CXXXV.

I come now to the Vindicator's defence of saint worship, which is laboured with more care; and it possesses a greater show of argument than his declarations against bible reading. He is extremely indignant at the charge of idolatry which I brought very plainly against his church. I affirmed that the Virgin Mary was as really an object of worship in the Church of Rome, as Diana was in Ephesus, or Venus in Paphos, or any other god or goddess in any heathen nation of the world. This he denies in language sufficiently coarse; and yet the thing is known to be true by every person acquainted with Popish worship, or who has read their books of devotion. "No one," says he, "is ignorant that the heathens worshipped Diana and Venus with divine honours as deities: but to say that the Church of Rome pays the same adoration to the blessed Virgin Mary, is contrary to truth, and incapable of proof, unless indeed the unsupported assertions of The Protestant are to be taken for facts, and his gross perversions of the sentiments of Catholic writers, for correct definitions of Catholic doctrine." He then favours us with his friend Dr Milner's sentiments respecting saint and image worship, concluding with Gother's heavy curses against "every goddess worshipper, that believes the blessed Virgin Mary to be any more than a creature; that worships her, or puts his trust in her more than in God, and that believes her above her Son, or that she can in any thing command him."

"Let the candid reader," proceeds Mr Andrews, "compare the above definition of Catholic doctrine with the assertion of The Protestant, and say which is most entitled to credit: the solemn and plain exposition of a Catholic prelate, or the unsupported declaration of a rattling puritan? If the Catholic believes that the man who puts his trust in the saints as his redeemers; who prays to them as such; or gives to them that honour which is due to God alone, is guilty of a damnable sin: If the Catholic believes that every goddess worshipper, whether this worship be applied to the Virgin Mary, or to any saint, or to any created being whatsoever, incurs the sentence of damnation,—can he be an idolater by principle, or can his creed be idolatrous? It is impossible. And yet our accuser unblushingly asserts, that the holy mother of God is as really an object of worship in the Church of Rome, as Diana was in Ephesus," &c. col. 408.

The reader will perceive that the Vindicator goes farther in stating what Papists believe on this subject, than he is warranted by the authority of Gother, as cited by Bishop Milner. This great oracle of English Papists does not say that it is damnable to trust in the Virgin Mary; it is damnable only if he trust in her more than in God. He does not say it is damnable to look upon her as equal to her son; it is damnable only to say she is above him, and can in any thing command him. This leaves room enough for idolatrous worship without incurring the frightful curse which is here denounced against it; for it is direct idolatry to trust, in a religious sense, in any creature whatever; or to associate with the Supreme Being, in religious worship, the highest creature, though in the lowest degree of devotion; and we cannot read a page of their prayers and hymns to the Virgin and other saints, without being disgusted with the grossness of the idolatry.

I made a quotation from a book written by Mr Andrews for the use of schools, in which he plainly inculcates idol worship upon the very children, by recommending devotion to the blessed Virgin, and trust in her for the attainment of virtue in youth. Of this work the Vindicator writes:—"Without any vanity I hereby invite The Protestant to produce a book better calculated to inspire a love of God, which is the essence of religion, in the minds of those who use it, than that which has incurred his censure. But, unluckily, I introduced a chapter, which also inculcated, as a mean of attaining virtue, an inferior respect and devotion to that immaculate Virgin, who bore the Son of God in her chaste womb; and this single precept is sufficient to condemn us for idolatry, and stamp me and my fellow-Catholics as base goddess-worshippers as the heathens of old. Now the Pagans, as I have before observed, offered sacrifice to their goddesses, and attributed to them the powers of a deity; this, however, is not the case with Catholics, who look upon the blessed Virgin certainly as the most exalted of all creatures that God has ever created, and, in quality of her being the mother of the Son of God, a powerful mediator for sinners in heaven. But in so doing The Protestant will have it that we invest this idol with the attributes of deity; that the Virgin must be omniscient and omnipresent." Col. 412. Most certainly, she is invested with the attributes of deity, if she be "a powerful mediator for sinners in heaven;" and if she be able to hear and answer the prayers which are addressed to her from this world. I appeal to every one who understands the terms, whether the Vindicator does not in these very words convict himself and his church of gross idolatry. That there is but ONE mediator for sinners, is as prominent a truth of divine revelation as that there is but ONE God. The Vindicator transfers the title from the Son of God to a mere creature, who was honoured to be his mother according to the flesh; and he is thus guilty of robbing Christ of his glory and giving it to a creature, who, in this connection, must be an idol. I know it will be replied, that to honour the mother is not to rob the Son; but I know also that this is a mere Popish figment; for Jesus never commanded, or even encouraged his disciples to give more honour to his mother than to any other woman who did the will of his Father.

Papists, it seems, do not offer sacrifice to the saints, and this is reckoned to exculpate them from the charge of idolatry; but there are other acts of worship as direct as that of sacrifice, such as prayers and hymns of praise; and besides these, it is well known that Papists build altars, and present votive offerings to the saints, which is little better than offering sacrifice to them. Such, for instance, was the worship paid to St Thomas-a-Becket at Canterbury, that Hume tells us, "The devotion towards him had quite effaced in that place the adoration of the Deity; nay, even that of the Virgin. At God's altar, for instance, there were offered in one year three pounds two shillings and sixpence; at the Virgin's, sixty-three pounds five shillings and sixpence; at St Thomas's, eight hundred and thirty-two pounds twelve shillings and threepence. But next year the disproportion was still greater: There was not a penny offered at God's altar; the Virgin's gained only four pounds one shilling and eightpence; but St Thomas had got for his share, nine hundred and fifty-four pounds six shillings and threepence."—Hist. Eng. vol. vi. ch. i. I believe a pound was then about three times its present value, viz. sixty shillings, and ten times its present efficiency; so that there was a sum equal to nine thousand pounds of our present money, devoted in one year to one single idol in England.

I find the Vindicator cannot be trusted even in quoting his own words. In the above-cited passage, he represents his school book as recommending an inferior respect and devotion to the immaculate Virgin. But there is no such qualifying word in the original. It is "devotion to the Blessed Virgin," absolutely and without any qualification, that is enjoined; and it is enjoined, "because it affords at the same time the most powerful intercession in the sight of God for obtaining his favour."* Most powerful, is not language suitable to that which is inferior. It is therefore divine worship, in the highest sense of which he is capable, that the Vindicator addresses to a mere creature.

* The Vindicator afterwards makes a distinction between mediators of intercession, and a mediator of redemption, and informs us that the latter is peculiar to Christ, while the former belongs also to the saints; but this distinction is a mere invention of Popery. The apostle Paul declares that Christ is able to save unto the uttermost, because he ever liveth to make intercession; so that, if the saints are able to be mediators of intercession, they must also be able to save to the uttermost.

This is confirmed by what he says elsewhere. Speaking of my representing him as holding up the Virgin Mary as an object of religious worship, he says, "I am not ashamed to own it, and that I mean it in a religious sense. By the term devotion is meant strong affection, ardent love; and who, I ask, can help feeling both love and affection towards that spotless woman, in whose womb the divinity itself chose to dwell, when he took upon himself our nature, in order to redeem us from sin and death?" Col. 443. It is one of the greatest abominations of Popery, that it places certain important gospel truths in contact with the most pernicious errors, and that it makes these truths a covert for the errors which it means to establish. Here the incarnation of Jesus Christ, and the redemption which he effected are distinctly recognised; and thus the dupes of Romish superstition are made to believe that their church holds the bible doctrine; but then the incarnation of Christ, and the redemption effected by him, are brought into view, not for the purpose of honouring Christ by exciting love and devotion to him; but for the purpose of honouring the Virgin Mary by exciting love and affection for her. This withdraws the mind from the Saviour as effectually as if we were to put the crocodile in his place; for while we give the mother of Jesus all the honour that is justly due to her, we are sure that she is no more entitled to worship or devotion, in a religious sense, than the crocodile, or any reptile that creeps on the earth. When religious worship is the subject under discussion; and when the question is, Shall this worship be given to any but the true God? the difference between the highest creature and the lowest,—between the angel Gabriel, or the Virgin Mary, on the one hand, and a worm of the dust, on the other, the difference shrinks into nothing. The reptile is as much entitled to devotion, in a religious sense, as the Virgin Mary, or the angel Gabriel; and no man can deny this who believes these words of the God of Israel, "I am the Lord thy God; thou shalt worship ONLY me."

By this romantic devotion to the Virgin, Mr Andrews shows himself to be a true disciple of Loyola; that is, a true Jesuit. He believes in the immaculate conception, seeing he calls her, "that spotless woman;" and, no doubt, like Loyola, he is ready to knock on the head any man who denies that she was born without sin; though in that case he would shut her out of heaven altogether; for we are sure there are none of the race of Adam there, but those who acknowledge and declare, that they owe their salvation to him that loved them, and washed them from their sins in his own blood.

In reply to what I had said about the saints in heaven having done with worldly cares, the Vindicator maintains "that the saints do trouble themselves with worldly matters, since it is written in the sixth chapter of the Apocalypse of St John, ver. 9, 10. 'And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of them who were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held. And they cried with a loud voice, saying, How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and revenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?' This passage from holy writ convincingly shows that the blessed in heaven do concern themselves with the things of this world, for if they cry out to God to avenge their blood on their enemies, common sense tells us they are as likely to supplicate for blessings on their friends. Lest, however, our adversary should not be satisfied with the testimony of the beloved disciple of Christ, I will give him the word of God himself as recorded by St Luke, chap. xv. 10.—'I say unto you there shall be joy before the angels of God upon one sinner doing penance.'"* Col. 422, 423. Here I must cut my opponent short, for he is, as usual, running quite away from the point, and asserting things which are not disputed. What I said was, the saints in heaven are at rest with their Saviour, and have done with worldly cares; meaning the little affairs of this world, such as herding swine, feeding geese, and such other undignified employment as Papists assign to them; see page 208. But the glory of God by the punishment of his enemies, and the increase of the church by the repentance and salvation of sinners, are not worldly cares, but spiritual and heavenly things, which certainly do engage the attention of both saints and angels. In this way the Vindicator evades all the main points at issue; that is, by writing about one thing instead of another; and thus he draws away his reader's attention from those deformities in his system, which even he has not the face to defend. He does not say a word about the ridiculous drudgery with which the Church of Rome employs the saints in heaven, as exposed at the conclusion of my forty-fifth Number. He slurs it all over, without the least notice, as he does many other things which he cannot deny, and which he has not the grace to acknowledge. Nay, though he boasts that he has gone over, and answered my work, paragraph by paragraph, there is scarcely a paragraph in twenty that he has touched.

It is not necessary that I inform the intelli-

* This is the Douay translation; and, like every thing else that is peculiarly Popish, it degrades the subject to which it relates. Angels rejoice when a sinner repents, which implies a change of mind that is connected with salvation; but the Douay version would represent the angels as rejoicing when a sinner torments himself, which is an exercise with which salvation has no necessary connection.

gent reader, that the above two passages of scripture give no countenance whatever to the practice of praying to either saints or angels. Let us see if the Vindicator is more successful in his other references to the bible. "A glorified saint," our accuser says, "is but a finite creature. He cannot be in more than one place at one time, any more than a sinner on earth can be. I certainly do not pretend like this presumptuous man, to know the mysteries of heaven, or to limit the omnipotence of God. I know that the saints in heaven are in a state of perfection and glory, that they know what passes in the hearts of men upon earth, but how is not for me to inquire or explain; for, as I said in my last Vindicator, it is not for man to scan the wondrous works of his Creator." "As to the impossibility of a saint being in more than one place at one time, this is no obstacle to his knowing of what is going forward in the world. If Eliseus could see the ambush which the king of Syria had prepared for the Israelites, without being on the spot, (4 Kings vi. 9.) surely the saints in heaven, by the same divine power, can tell whether a Papist is praying to him or not." Col. 423, 424.

Here the Vindicator again ascribes an attribute of deity to his idols. He says, "they know what passes in the hearts of men upon earth." This prerogative the Almighty challenges for himself as peculiarly as the work of creation; and the saints in heaven can know no more of what is passing in my heart than Mr Andrews does, unless God is pleased to reveal it to them; and they cannot know who is, and who is not, praying to them, but by such a revelation. In the passage respecting Elisha, which, in our version of the bible, is 2 Kings vi. 9—12, there is not a word about the prophet seeing what he was not on the spot to see; or hearing what he was not present to hear. It is said, indeed, that he could tell the king of Israel the words which the king of Syria spoke in his bed chamber; but this was not by any extraordinary faculty of seeing or hearing with which he was endowed, but because God, who knows all things, had revealed it to him. This, therefore, is no proof that the saints in heaven hear the prayers which are addressed to them by their votaries on the earth.

"Universal presence," says the Vindicator, "is not necessary, if knowledge and power is given to the saints and angels by the omnipotent Lord of all; and we have the bible in our favour in support of this belief.—Jacob prayed the angel that delivered him from all evil, to bless the children of Joseph, (Gen. xlviii.) But will THE PROTESTANT charge the holy patriarch with idolatry, and blasphemy for thus invoking the assistance of an angel? I imagine he is not quite so presumptuous; and yet, notwithstanding Catholics do no more than what Jacob did, they must be idolaters. Is this impartiality and justice?" Col. 424. The Vindicator has said, that he would not be surprised by any thing that I should write, else I would surprise him by saying, that I would have the presumption to charge the holy patriarch with idolatry, had he, like modern Papists, invoked a created angel, in the language which he used in blessing the sons of Joseph; but every intelligent reader of the bible knows, that The Angel whom Jacob invoked, was no other than Jehovah the God of Israel, who appeared to him as the Angel of the everlasting covenant; and therefore, the words of the holy patriarch furnish no example for praying to saints or created angels.

"The royal prophet David," says the Vindicator, "teaches that whosoever puts his truth in God, angels shall defend him, and keep him from harm. Here are his words, 'He shall give his angels charge over thee, in all thy ways; they shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone,' Ps. xci. 11, 12." Col. 423. But what has this to do with worshipping of angels, who, on every recorded instance of its being offered to them, peremptorily rejected it? see Rev. xix. 10; xxii. 8, 9; see also Col. ii. 18, in which it is expressly condemned. Angels are ministering spirits sent forth to minister to the heirs of salvation; but this is no reason why we should worship them any more than the elements which are employed by Christ in the same service. He made the stars in their courses fight against the enemies of Israel; and he makes fire, hail, snow, vapour, and stormy winds fulfil his word; but this is no reason why we should worship the winds, the fire, or the snow.

The Vindicator next refers to a prayer of an angel for Jerusalem, Zec. i. 12; but though it were admitted that this was a created angel, it would be no warrant for men to pray to angels.

We are now come to his last and concluding argument for the lawfulness of praying to angels. It is taken from the apocryphal book of Tobit:—"In the 12th chapter of Tobias, and 12th verse, the angel Raphael tells that holy man,—'When thou didst pray with tears and bury the dead, and didst leave thy dinner, and hide the dead by day in thy house, and by night buried them, I OFFERED THY PRAYER TO OUR LORD.'" Col. 425. Though this were admitted to be real canonical scripture, it would scarcely make out the lawfulness of a practice which is so positively condemned in other passages. It is needless, however, to insist on this, seeing the book of Tobit is of no authority whatever. It is indeed such an absurd and contemptible romance, that none but persons who take a creature for their god, could ever take it for the word of God. That Papists so take it, is another proof that the state of intellect and taste, as well as knowledge, among them must be deplorably low.

The contemptible character of the book of Tobit appears even from the short quotation which is given above. Vast importance is attached to the holy man's leaving his dinner in order to carry the body of a dead brother off the street. One would think the angel Raphael had mistaken Tobit for a London Alderman, or some such worshipper of the good things of the table, which is a very ancient species of idolatry; as the apostle Paul says, there were many in his time whose god was their belly. Few days pass in which I am not called to leave my dinner to attend to far less important business than that of burying a dead friend, by persons who have an idea that the dinner hour is the most likely time to find me disengaged. I never thought of attaching merit to this, or supposing it would give weight to my prayers, as the angel is represented, very absurdly, to address the holy man who could no doubt return to his dinner, as easily as I can do, when he had done his duty.

No. CLX.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 4TH, 1821.

A MAN who worships the true God in spirit and in truth, needs no other object of worship. The perfections of the divine nature, revealed in the scriptures, present enough for the devout contemplation, and grateful adoration of the soul of man to all eternity. The mind that is truly engaged in the worship of God has no room for any creature, however exalted; and cannot look upon angels and glorified saints in any other light than as fellow-worshippers, and fellow-servants of Him who is God over all, and blessed for ever. God was pleased to make himself known in the character of the just God and the Saviour to our first parents, immediately after the fall. It became their duty to teach this knowledge to their children; but they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, in those characters by which he was pleased to make himself known; for which cause he gave them over to a reprobate mind. They became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. Professing themselves to be wise they became fools, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God, into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things, Rom. i. 20—32. The same thing happened again after the ascension of Christ and the promulgation of the gospel by his apostles. Men called Christians, not liking to retain God in their knowledge, in those characters in which the gospel presents him, fell into the very same errors; they were given over to the same reprobate state of mind; and they soon came to pay their devotions to objects as low as creeping things and four-footed beasts. Their voluntary humility led them first, indeed, to worship angels; from these they descended to dead men and women;—then to their rotten bones, and remnants of their clothes;—then to objects still more vile and loathsome.

In my last Number, I gave the Catholic Vindicator's vindication of the Popish practice of worshipping angels; on concluding which he proceeds as follows:—"So much in defence of the doctrine of the Church of Rome, so far as angels are concerned: that saints are also to be included we may gather from the Revelations of St John, who writes, chap. viii. 3, 4, 'I saw another angel that stood before an altar, having a golden censer: and there were given to him much incense, that he should offer of the prayers of all saints upon the altar of gold, which is before the throne of God. And the smoke of the incense of the prayers of the saints ascended up before God, from the hand of the angel.' From hence it is clear that the prayers of the saints are propitious in heaven, and as they can have nothing to ask in favour of themselves, having received their reward, their supplications, common sense leads us to infer, are made in behalf of those they have left behind, and their prayers are delivered by the hand of the officiating angel, according to the testimony of St John.

"In further corroboration of this opinion we have the evidence of the apostles, who, in forming the creed which goes by their name, and is the symbol of Catholic faith, expressly enjoin a belief of the communion of saints, which has always been understood, from their time to the present day, as embracing prayers to them. That the apostles invoked and prayed to the blessed Virgin Mary and other saints, I think cannot be doubted, when it is known, that in all the most ancient liturgies of the church, commemoration is made of her by name, as well as the saints. I know it will be objected by some, that mention is not made in scripture of praying to the Virgin Mary and the apostles, but to this I answer, no mention could be made of this circumstance, because the objects of veneration were living on earth when the New Testament was written. In the gospel of St Luke, however, chap. i. 28, we find the angel Gabriel saluting the holy Virgin with these words,—'Hail, full of grace, the Lord is with thee! Blessed art thou among women.' In the same chapter too, ver. 42, we see that her cousin Elizabeth, inspired with the Holy Ghost, cried out, as the Virgin Mary was approaching to visit her,—'Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb.' The immaculate Virgin is also related in the same chapter, to have said, ver. 48, under the spirit of prophecy,—

'Behold, from henceforth all generations shall be blessed.' Accordingly, the apostles honoured her memory by invoking her aid, and teaching those who believed in the doctrines they taught to follow their example. So early as the first century we have the writings of St Clement the third Pope, who was the disciple of St Peter, and fellow-labourer with St Paul, and is mentioned by him in his epistle to the Philippians, ch. iv. 3, as having his name in the book of life. These writings testify, that in the liturgies then in use among the Christians, commemoration was made of the saints. In the liturgy of St James the apostle, who was the first bishop of Jerusalem, there is this mention made of the blessed Virgin—'We make commemoration of our most immaculate, most glorious and blessed Lady, Mother of God, and ever Virgin Mary, and of all the saints and just, that by their prayers and intercessions we may obtain mercy.' St Dennis, the Areopagite, who was a disciple of St Paul, in his Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, notices the practice of invoking the saints. Lindanus says, that commemoration of our blessed Lady was the same in St Peter's liturgy as the Latins have it now. The Ethiopian liturgy (which is attributed to St Philip the apostle) hath the following prayer:—'O Virgin, in all times Mother of God and Christ, offer up on high our prayer, with the elect of thy Son, that our sins may be remitted. Rejoice, O Lady, who hast born to us the true light, Jesus Christ our Lord; pray for us to God, that he may have mercy on our souls; pray for us in the sight of the throne of thy Son Jesus Christ. Rejoice, O immaculate queen, O true mediatrix before our Lord Jesus Christ, we humbly beseech thee that thou be mindful of us, pray for us, that our iniquities may be blotted out.'—Thus we see the doctrine of praying to the holy Mother of God and to the saints, taught and practised by the apostles, who were given by Christ to his church as 'witnesses for Him, of what they had seen and heard.'—(See Protestant, No. XXXV.)" Col. 425—427.

I have made this long extract that I might give, at one view, the absurdities and idolatries which are practised in the Church of Rome, and which are defended by the Vindicator. It is true Bishop Cameron deponed, that he disapproved of both Andrews and his writings; and that he believed no Catholic clergyman in Scotland approved of them; but how then did it happen that he was hired, and paid for writing this very work, by some of the leading men among our Glasgow Papists? and how came Mr Scott to exhort his people to buy this very work? It was to indemnify the committee who were suffering loss in consequence of its not selling. But was this a sufficient motive for recommending the book, had it contained any thing contrary to "Catholic doctrine?" Was the loss of a few pounds by the committee a matter of so much importance, that to spare their purses, the Papists in Glasgow were exhorted by their ghostly father to buy a bad book, a book which no "Catholic clergyman in Scotland approved?" Nothing of the kind ought to be supposed; and, therefore, I consider Mr Scott and his committee as consenting to the whole doctrine laid down by the Vindicator, and responsible for it.

I request the reader to attend particularly to the use which the Vindicator makes of the passage, Rev. viii. 3, 4. He says, "from hence it is clear that the prayers of the saints are propitious in heaven;" but the words themselves bear no more than that they are presented in heaven by the angel, with much incense. And it is evidently the prayers of saints on earth which are thus presented, while he makes them only those of the saints in heaven, who have nothing to pray for on their own account. This is indeed natural enough in a Papist, who perhaps does not believe that there are any saints in this world at all, or even in heaven, till the Pope has made them such by canonization, which cannot now take place for a hundred years after their death; but every man who understands the bible, knows that every believer in Christ, that is, every real Christian, is a saint; and it is his privilege to know that his prayers are acceptable to God through the merit of Christ, which is signified by the much incense that ascends from the golden altar before the throne. Mr Andrews makes it the incense of the prayers of saints that ascends from the altar, which is indeed according to the Douay version; but this proves no more than that Papists can mistranslate the word of God, in order to prop up their system of falsehood and error. The prayers of saints have no incense, that is, no merit belonging to them; but in virtue of Christ's merit they are accepted, and not forgotten, which is all that they desire in relation to them.

In the creed ascribed to the apostles, though I believe none of the apostles ever heard of it while in this world, (see pages 629, 630.) the expression "communion of saints" occurs, which, says the Vindicator, "has always been understood from their time to the present day, as embracing prayers to them." Col. 425. He gives no higher authority than his own for this general understanding of the words; and if he were correct in his assertion, it would be the duty of saints on earth to pray to one another, and of those in heaven, to pray to those on the earth, as much as of the latter to pray to the former. There is a communion of saints in praying with, and for one another; but their praying to one another in the sense of religious worship, has no countenance in the word of God; and in short, it could have no place in the mind of any man but an idolater. This is a mere assertion; but it is enough to oppose to a mere assertion; and the intelligent reader will judge which is most agreeable to the general tenor of scripture. I have cited the command of God, thou shalt worship only me. I have shown, by reference to several passages, that he condemns all creature-worship; and the Vindicator has not adduced a single passage to show that he approves of it. Surely then it requires more than his bare word to establish the doctrine, that the saints may be prayed to; and that the expression, "communion of saints," has always been understood, from the apostles' time, to imply that this high degree of worship may be addressed to mere creatures.

"That the apostles," says my opponent, "invoked and prayed to the blessed Virgin Mary and other saints, I think, cannot be doubted, when it is known, that in all the most ancient liturgies of the church, commemoration is made of her by name, as well as the saints." Col. 426. This assertion would have gained nothing in point of impudence, though he had added, that the apostles invoked the great goddess Diana; or had he asserted, like the Jesuits in China, that the story of the crucifixion was a fable, invented by the Jews to discredit Christianity. It is enough that I deny that the apostles invoked the Virgin Mary, or any creature; and I challenge him to the proof of his assertion. I challenge also the recommender of his book, and the committee that procured it to be written, and that paid for it, and gave circulation to it, to prove the point. If they shall not do this, I shall hold them not only convicted of idolatry themselves, but also of the shocking impiety of charging idolatry upon Christ's inspired ambassadors. I say, I challenge them; and if they shall not answer me, I shall, to use the language of Mr Andrews for once, hold them as guilty, by suffering judgment to go by default.

We shall see by and by what credit is due to what are called "the most ancient liturgies of the church." In the meantime let us attend to those passages of scripture which are alleged to teach the invocation of the Virgin Mary. These are, Luke i. 28, "Hail, full of grace, the Lord is with thee! Blessed art thou among women;" ver. 42, "Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb." And ver. 48, "Behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed." From the first of these three verses is formed the Ave Maria, or Hail Mary, in repeating which a great part of Popish devotion consists; though there is not a word in all the three passages that gives the smallest hint that prayer was to be addressed to her. The word Hail, is a friendly salutation; and can never be understood to imply religious worship, else Christ, after his resurrection, must have worshipped his own disciples; see Mat. xxviii. 9.

There is nothing in the other words of the salutation of the angel that can afford the least foundation for worshipping the Virgin Mary. "Full of grace," is a literal translation of the vulgate, Gratiæ plena; our common version is, "thou art highly favoured;" Dr Campbell translates it, "Favourite of heaven." Perhaps "Full of grace" is the strongest, and suppose we concede to Rome that it is the truest rendering of Κεχαριτωμενη, there is nothing in it that implies that we ought to pray to the person so favoured. Every Christian is exhorted to be "filled with the Spirit," which is, to be full of grace. Nay, more, Paul prays for the believing Ephesians, "That they may be filled with all the fulness of God." Surely it was not meant by this that they were to become objects of worship; yet the language respecting the Virgin is not so strong as this.

The next clause of the sentence, "the Lord is with thee;" or, "the Lord be with thee," as Dr Campbell renders it, certainly lays no ground for offering worship to the Virgin, for take it either way, it expresses no more than what any Christian may say to any other Christian.

In the words which follow I grant there is a peculiarity of expression, which cannot be applied to any other individual of the human race:—"Blessed art thou among women," and "Blessed is the fruit of thy womb;" and "From henceforth all generations shall call me blessed." From the time that the promise was made to our first parents, that a Saviour should be born of woman, it became the desire of every believing woman, that she might be the honoured, the happy, the blessed individual; and it was the deprivation of this blessedness that constituted the curse of barrenness, which was so keenly felt by Sarah, and other holy women, from her time down to the time of Zacharias and Elizabeth. This feeling was not confined to the mothers in Israel; it extended to every member of every family in which the knowledge of the God of Israel remained, and in which he was worshipped in a spiritual manner. In short, it was the desire of every true Israelite that the promised Messiah might be born in the family to which he belonged. Hence the impassioned language of Solomon, in one of his inspired writings, which is, I am afraid, little understood, "O that thou wert as my brother, that sucked the breasts of my mother!" Cant. viii. 1.

Mary, the espoused wife of Joseph of Nazareth, when the appointed time arrived, was declared to be the distinguished individual. She was what every woman in Israel would call the blessed woman; blessed above all other women, as honoured above them all, being chosen of God to be what every one of them wished to be; and when the thing was announced to herself, and when she began to feel in herself that the promise had begun to be accomplished, she acknowledged the great mercy of God to her; and taking her faith and her feelings together, she very naturally anticipated the remembrance of her name in the church to the end of the world, as the honoured instrument of giving birth to the Messiah; and thus in the joy and grateful fulness of her heart she exclaimed, "From henceforth all generations shall call me blessed." All generations of Christians have done so hitherto, and they shall do so to the end of the world, if Papists would not divert them from it by putting her forth as a goddess, and an object of worship; for then those who worship only one God feel themselves obliged to oppose her claims, and to argue against her title. These claims, however, are not her's; but those of false friends, who, by putting her out of her place, do more to dishonour her than Protestants ever did.

In the above-cited passages, there is not a word of encouragement to pray to the Virgin, or to worship her in any sense whatever; and there is very little of her subsequent history recorded. Indeed, we are apt to wonder that so little is said about her; but He who knew the propensity of the Israelites to idolatry, and who concealed the place where Moses was buried, has also drawn a veil over the history of this blessed individual, in order that no occasion might be furnished for honouring her in an idolatrous manner; and that if men would depart so far from the truth as to give divine honours to this creature, the whole guilt of it might rest upon themselves. None of it can be charged directly, or by implication, on any part of the apostolic writings, for no apostle or evangelist has written a word that by fair construction, or even by force, can be made to express any such meaning. That Jesus discouraged his followers from doing honour to Mary on account of her being his mother, is evident from Mark iii. 31—35. for an illustration of which see page 194,—one of the numerous passages to which the Vindicator made no reply.

The Vindicator proceeds in the following confident tone of assertion, not doubting that his readers will implicitly believe him:—"Accordingly the apostles honoured her memory by invoking her aid, and teaching those who believed in the doctrines they taught to follow their example." I call again upon Mr Scott and his committee to make good this assertion of their hired advocate. Let them show when, and in what form of speech, the apostles of Christ invoked, and taught others to invoke, the Virgin Mary. The knowledge of the simple fact which I have thus brought to view; namely, that such an assertion is made by a living Popish writer, hired to write by our Glasgow Papists, and who has had his work recommended by their priest, will, I hope, convince every person who applies his mind to the subject, that Popery remains as it was in the dark ages; and that it is not divested of one particle of its grossness, falsehood, and impudence.

The Vindicator refers to a writing of St Clement, in order to show that, as early as the first century, "in the liturgies then in use, commemoration was made of the saints." Every ecclesiastical historian knows this to be a gross imposition; but though it were otherwise, we have no such name as Clement in the list of inspired writers; and, therefore, we are not obliged to submit to his authority. But it is of more importance to attend to the following:—"In the liturgy of St James the apostle, who was the first bishop of Jerusalem, there is this mention made of the blessed Virgin,—'We make commemoration of our most immaculate, most glorious and blessed lady, mother of God, and ever Virgin Mary, and of all the saints and just, that by their prayers and intercessions we may obtain mercy.'" Here I ask Mr Scott and his committee, if they really believe that the apostle James wrote such words as the above? If they answer in the affirmative, they will be ready to give a reason for their faith; if in the negative, then I ask how could they recommend, pay for, and give circulation to such abominable nonsense?

There has, indeed, been such a forgery palmed upon the world as the liturgy of St James, with a short account of which I shall here entertain the reader. It is without doubt a composition of considerable antiquity; but I have seen no evidence of its being older than the beginning of the 8th century. It contains the impious expression, "Mother of God," which was not in use in the apostle's time. It contains several citations from Paul's epistles, of some of which it is doubtful if they were written before the death of James:—It contains the word "consubstantial," in reference to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, which, so far as appears, was not in use before the council of Nice, at least not fathered upon an apostle, else it would have been used with overwhelming effect in the controversies of that period. It contains the Trisagion, (thrice holy) and the Gloria patri, (glory to the Father,) which were not commonly used in the church till the 5th century. In this pretended apostolical liturgy, there is a prayer for those who are shut up in monasteries, but I defy Mr Scott and his committee united, to prove that there were monasteries in St James' time. There is mention made of confessors, a designation which Cardinal Bellarmine himself acknowledges was not in use for a great while after St James' time. This liturgy speaks of temples, and incensing of altars, words which, if used in St James' time, it must have been by Pagans. Upon the whole, the ceremonies which it prescribes by no means agree with what we know to have been the practice of apostolic churches. These things are acknowledged by Dupin, one of the most respectable historians which the Church of Rome has produced.—See Preservative against Popery, Tit. xii. page 8.

The Vindicator writes as if he had a copy of this liturgy before him, seeing he gives the very words of it with marks of quotation. If he had really read it, he must have seen that it was a downright forgery; and yet he adduces it as confidently as if it were of equally undisputed authority with the Acts of the Apostles. Happily the monks of the dark ages could not write any work of considerable length, without making anachronisms, and other blunders, which have served to detect their impositions: and this is one of those collateral evidences which satisfy the inquisitive mind, that none of the books of the New Testament are of later date than the apostolic age; for no anachronisms have been detected in them; and nothing inconsistent with the character of the writers, or of the age in which they wrote.

No. CLXI.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 11TH, 1821.

My last Number contained some remarks on the liturgy of St James, showing that it is a forgery of a much later age than that of the apostle. I have a remark or two more to make on the subject of pretended liturgies. The Vindicator treats us with a prayer to the Virgin, from the Ethiopian one, which, he says, is ascribed to St Philip. We happen to know that others have ascribed it to St Matthew; but it is very evident that it had no existence for hundreds of years after these holy men had gone to their rest. Those who use this liturgy are taught to pray for the Popes, as well as for kings, patriarchs, and archbishops. Now it is certain the word Pope was not used to designate any particular bishop for ages after the apostles' days. Nay, in this liturgy the apostles themselves are invoked, or prayed to, which they would not have consented to while they were alive. Besides, this pretended apostolical form of worship contains the Nicene creed, with the famous particle Filioque, which was the subject of so much controversy in the fourth century; and it condescends even to mention the names of certain Romish saints, such as Athanasius, Basil, and Gregory, who certainly were not cotemporary with any of the apostles. —(See Preservative against Popery, Tit. xii. p. 8.) Yet upon the authority of this absurd and impious forgery does the Vindicator declare as follows: "Thus we see the doctrine of praying to the holy Mother of God, and to the saints, taught and practised by the apostles, who were given by Christ to his church as witnesses for him of what they had seen and heard."

A passing allusion is made to a liturgy ascribed to St Peter; and it is a fact, that a work under this title was published by Lindanus in 1589, and republished in Paris in 1595. The former professes to be taken from a manuscript of Cardinal Sirlet, of no great antiquity; and the work bears internal evidence, like the other two, that it is an impudent forgery. It is by means of such impositions, that the author of the book which Mr Scott exhorted his people to buy, endeavours to defend the worship of the great Popish idol, the queen of heaven. I shall now proceed to show how she came to take the place of the true God, and to engross almost the whole devotion of the Church of Rome.

Some of the fathers of the second and third centuries, whose writings are extant, speak with great respect of the Virgin Mary, as it became them and all Christians to do. Some of them indeed amused themselves, and perhaps meant to instruct others, by drawing fanciful parallels between her and Eve; and, sometimes, equally fanciful contrasts. Justin Martyr writes as follows; and there is little more about her to be found in his works:—"Eve, being a virgin, conceived by the word of the serpent, and brought forth death: but the Virgin Mary, receiving the message of the angel, conceived in faith; therefore, that which was born of her was holy, to wit, the son of God." After Justin comes Irenæus who pursues the comparison at greater length. He opposes the cheat that was put upon Eve, to the truth that was told to Mary. He opposes the Virgin Eve, now designed to be a wife, to the Virgin Mary, who was also espoused; and the Virgin Eve, deceived by an evil angel, to the Virgin Mary, believing a good angel. And, says he, "As Eve was seduced and forsook God, so Mary was induced to obey God, that the Virgin Mary might be a comforter of the Virgin Eve; and that as mankind was, through a Virgin, bound over to death; so they should be released through a Virgin. One thing being thus rightly balanced against another, the disobedience of a Virgin by the obedience of a Virgin."

This conceit seems to have been wonderfully pleasing to these great men. It was used by one after another, just as many good people in the present day insensibly adopt and use the phraseology of their favourite author or preacher. Thus Tertullian took it up from Irenæus; and added something of his own, a little more extravagant: "Eve had believed the serpent, Mary hath believed Gabriel: the offence which the former hath committed in believing, the latter hath blotted out by believing." If Tertullian had stopped here, he could not be acquitted of teaching that Mary was the Saviour; and the church of Rome might justly have claimed him as one of her children; but from what follows it is evident that he meant no more, by blotting out Eve's offence, than "that Mary brought forth him who was to save even his murderers; and that Christ was to come of her for the salvation of men."

I will admit that this conceit of the fathers was exceedingly childish; and the churches were to be pitied whose pastors had forgotten the simplicity of the gospel so far as to amuse them with such reveries. I will even admit, that ascribing so much to Mary's agency, as opposed to Eve's transgression, laid the foundation, and prepared the way for all the idolatrous worship that has since been addressed to her; but none of the fathers whom I have mentioned seem ever to have taken it into their heads that Mary was to be invoked, or worshipped, in any sense whatever.—See a Discourse by Dr Clagett, in Preservative against Popery, Tit. vi. p. 194.

From this able work it is shown very clearly, that Mary was by no means the first with whom the apostate church began to commit idolatry. Numerous martyrs had the start of her; but when she had once got her name in the list, she soon overtopped them all; and came, in the course of ages, to engross almost all the devotion of the Church of Rome, as she does at this day in Popish countries. Some, perhaps most of the apostles, and many of the pastors whom they appointed over churches, and many of the successors of these pastors, were honoured to be martyrs for the truth. The memory of such was cherished with peculiar veneration by the Christians who survived them; and perhaps they erred in attaching more respect to the memory of those who were put to death for the truth, than to that of those who were equally laborious and faithful, and who had really suffered more for it, during their lives, but who happened to die a natural death. The memory of the just is blessed. It is of little importance to them what death they die; and the churches ought not to apportion the honour with which they remember them according to the manner of their death, but according to the activity of their lives.

What, however, was at first a very natural, and perhaps a very amiable feeling, in reference to those whose blood was shed for the truth, was, through human corruption, made an occasion of very great abuses; and, from venerating the memory of the martyrs, men came by degrees to call upon their names,—to address prayers and supplications to them. Matters came not to this detestable height of idolatry all at once. It required ages of darkness to perfect the system, as it appeared in Europe at the time of the Reformation, and as it still appears in a great part of what is called Christendom.

The first shade of departure from the simplicity of gospel worship that can be traced in ecclesiastical history, (for I speak of this as a matter of history,) was that of Christians meeting for prayer, and other religious exercises, at the graves of martyrs. The thing was perhaps quite harmless in itself; and under the direction of enlightened and spiritually-minded men it may have been profitable to many, as religious exercises may always be, at the burial, or over the graves, of Christian friends. But unless such exercises are conducted by enlightened men, they will almost to a certainty degenerate into superstition. Now there is reason to think, that many of the earlier Christians were not very enlightened. They knew the truth by which they were saved; but when we consider their scanty means of acquiring general knowledge, we may conclude that they knew little more than the first principles of Christianity. They had also their Jewish and their heathen prejudices to contend with; and were, in short, in circumstances to become an easy prey to false teachers, whatever name they might assume. "It had been a very ancient custom," says the writer above quoted, page 200, "for Christians to meet at the cemeteries, or burying places of the martyrs, and the rest of the faithful, there to celebrate anniversary commemorations of the martyrs. Thus the church of Smyrna having intimated that they had buried the body of St Polycarp in the usual place, they added, 'that in that place, God willing, they should assemble together to celebrate the birth-day of his martyrdom with all the joy they could express.' And the reason of this custom, they express in this manner: 'Both to commemorate those who had already undergone the trial of martyrdom, and to exercise, and to prepare those who were to follow, for the like conflicts.' But they did not meet here to celebrate the memories of the martyrs only, but at other times also for the celebration of divine service."

By and by, the graves of the martyrs came to be considered as places more holy than the ordinary places of worship. Churches were built over them; and, in course of time, he was reckoned the most pious man who should go the greatest length in advancing the glory of the martyrs and the honour of the holy places built over their tombs, and consecrated to their memory.

If the places where the bodies of martyrs lay were thus believed to be holy, it was easy to believe that any remaining fragment of their bodies must be holier still. Then the graves were opened; the bones of the martyrs were dug up; they were kissed with religious reverence; miraculous powers were ascribed to them; many diseases they were believed to cure,—not that the cures were at first ascribed to any virtue in the rotten bones, but to the power of God who thus honoured the relics of his saints;—the sale of these relics became a very lucrative employment to the multitudes of lazy monks who spread over the world; and the saints whose bones they were said to be, became as much objects of religious worship as heroes and demi-gods had been among the heathen. The reader will perceive, that by this time the glory was departed from the churches. ICHABOD was written upon them. All of them had apostatized; but that of Rome began to appear pre-eminent as the leader in the march towards perdition; and, like the serpent into which the rod of Aaron was transformed, she swallowed up almost all the rest.

During a great part of the period to which these remarks refer, the Virgin Mary was of comparatively little account. She was not a martyr, and therefore she was not entitled to that peculiar honour which belonged to the martyrs. But after objects of worship had begun to multiply to an indefinite extent, it was found that the popular devotion, so much divided, was in danger of languishing, for want of some one individual saint, who should surpass all the rest in dignity, and possess some peculiarity to which no other could lay claim, and in whose favour all voices might be united. Exactly such a one was the Virgin Mary; and as the heathen had their Jupiter, father of gods and men, so the Papists adopted their Virgin, queen of heaven, who has been worshipped most devoutly during the dark ages, and who is declared at this very day, by the organ of our Glasgow Papists, to afford the most powerful intercession, in the sight of God, for obtaining his favour.

As early as the fourth century, it is related by Epiphanius, "that some Arabian women worshipped the Virgin Mary, by laying a cake before her for some days, and offering it up to her, and then eating it among themselves." This was evidently a relic of that idolatrous devotion to the queen of heaven, mentioned by Jeremiah, chap. xliv. 17. and the practice was strongly condemned by Epiphanius, in the following terms:—"Let us put on the spirits of men, and beat down the madness of these women. For who of the prophets ever allowed that a man should be worshipped, much less a woman? Though the Virgin be a chosen vessel, she is yet but a woman. The old error shall not reign among us, to leave the living God, and to worship things, that he has made: for if he will not suffer the angels to be adored, how much less the daughter of Joachim and Ann, who was born to them as other mortals are born, of a father and a mother?"—Preservative, &c. as above, p. 213.

The salutation, Ave Maria, which has been for ages reckoned as solemn a part of religious worship as the Lord's prayer, seems to have been quite unknown in the fourth century: and there is not in any genuine record the slightest hint of prayer being addressed to the Virgin till long after that period. There are indeed many forgeries in the names of certain fathers, as early as the second century, which speak of Mary in the most fulsome style of adulation; but these forgeries detect themselves, as I showed in my last Number. There is credible evidence, that about the end of the fifth, or beginning of the sixth century, the Virgin was prayed to; and the innovation is ascribed to one Peter Fullo, a Eutychian heretic, who, according to Nicephorus, a later writer, "found out four very profitable things, one of which was, that the holy name of the Virgin should be called upon in every prayer." From this time, all that is recorded on the subject tends to show the growing reputation of this idol. The minds of all men were turned towards her. She took precedence of all the martyrs, not excepting the apostles, who were now reckoned to be sufficiently honoured by being allowed to follow in her train. Thus, about the middle of the seventh century, Pope Martin ordained, that "whoever does not honour and adore the blessed Virgin, the Mother of God, let him be accursed." Soon thereafter she began to be addressed in such blasphemous titles as these: —The queen of the world,—The window of heaven,—The gate of paradise,—The tabernacle of God,—The star of the sea,—The heavenly ladder, &c. &c.—Preservative, &c. p. 214, 215.

It will reasonably be inquired, how it was possible to get the world, besotted as it was during the dark ages, to consent to such shocking impieties? There was, no doubt, much of judicial infatuation in it. Because they received not the love of the truth, God gave them up to strong delusion to believe a lie: and that the thing should happen in the dark ages is not so wonderful as that the infatuation should continue to this day, in the most enlightened country, and not the least enlightened city, in the world, even in our own city of Glasgow, where a congregation exists, with a priest at their head, out of which a committee was formed for the express purpose of recommending, and giving circulation to a work, which inculcates the worship of a mere creature, in such extravagant language as this:—"O Virgin, in all times Mother of God and Christ, offer up on high our prayer, with the elect of thy son, that our sins may be remitted. Rejoice, O Lady, who hast born to us the true light, Jesus Christ our Lord; pray for us to God, that he may have mercy on our souls; pray for us in the sight of the throne of thy son Jesus Christ. Rejoice, O immaculate queen, O true Mediatrix before our Lord Jesus Christ, we humbly beseech thee that thou be mindful of us, pray for us, that our iniquities may be blotted out."—Cath. Vind. col. 427.

The Virgin came to be distinguished above other saints by a system of sheer lying and imposition; and yet it was such lying as scarcely to have the merit of originality or invention; for there was not much original invention in it. It consisted chiefly in the application to her, or more properly speaking, the misapplication of what is prophesied, and of what is recorded concerning Christ. I have before me a long narrative of what was thus attributed to her,—such as her birth being foretold,—its being announced by angels,—her being presented in the temple, &c. &c. all which is borrowed, or rather stolen, from what is related of our Saviour himself. Without going into the details of each particular, I shall content myself with giving a summary of about twenty articles, by which the Virgin was said to be distinguished from all other saints: 1. She was not only elected by God, but pre-elected before all others, Cant. vi. 8, 9. 2. That she was promised by heaven to the fathers. 3. That she sprang by the kindness of God from barren parents, (of which a long and ludicrous history is given by monkish writers.) 4. That she only of all the children of Adam, that descended from him by the ordinary way of propagation, was free from original sin. 5. That in the very beginning of her immaculate conception, she was so confirmed in grace, that ever after she was without stain of actual, though but venial sin. 6. That the fomes peccati was extinct in her. 7. That in her very conception she had the use of reason, and made a vow of virginity to God; from which instant also she began to merit, and that the merit of her works was never interrupted, no not so much as in her sleep. 8. That in the same conception of hers she was adorned with all the theological virtues. 9. That at the age of three years she was in the temple, according to her parents' vow, consecrated to God, and there most holily educated. 10. That this blessed person among women escaped all that curse, to which mankind, by reason of Adam's sin, was obnoxious. 11. That she alone did not undergo the irksomeness to which other women with child are subject. 12. That by a Virgin birth she brought forth God without pain. 13. That the Lord's body exhibited in the eucharist, is formed of her blood. 14. That she, in a singular manner, did many ways cooperate to our salvation. 15. That the fruit of Christ's passion was, in a singular manner, communicated to her. 16. That she was the instructor and mistress of the apostles and teachers. 17. That her body did not see corruption, but was taken up into heaven. 18. That her presence brought a great deal of accidental joy to the blessed in heaven. 19. That she is queen of heaven, and lady of all the angels and saints. 20. That she is the common advocate of sinners, the mother of mercy, the mediatrix to intercede for them; and that she is also the mother of the living, and promotes the salvation of all men. 21. That she is so formidable and terrible to the devils, that they presently fly away at the mention of her name, and much more at her command; and that she hath powerfully broken their head. 22. That all the graces and privileges that are dispersed among their saints, are found united in her, after a far more perfect manner.—Maria Thronus Dei, chap. xx. p. 252, 253, as quoted from Spinellus by Bishop Patrick, in his discourse on "the Virgin Mary misrepresented." I have used the freedom of abridging some of the articles which are indecently minute. The bishop tells us that one Paul Comitolus reckons up one hundred and thirty privileges peculiar to the Virgin.

The virgin Mary is associated with Christ in man's supposed salvation, as in the following:—"Grievously, my beloved, were we hurt by one man and one woman; but thanks be to God, not less by one man and one woman are all things restored," &c. See the Trent Catechism.

In the bull of pope Sixtus, adopted by the council of Trent, she is styled "queen of the heavens," and her son is spoken of as "king." In the Breviary, she is also called "queen of heaven," and "domina omnium creaturarum." In the Devout Communicant, she is addressed as "daughter of the eternal father! mother of the eternal son! and spouse of the holy ghost."

In regard to worship of the virgin, the Trent catechism further says—"With good reason the holy church of God has added to this giving of thanks, prayers also, and imploration addressed to the most holy mother of God." The style of these thanks, prayers, and imploration, clearly shows, that if the virgin be addressed as a mediatrix, her intercession is yet deemed as powerful as if she granted every thing by her own power. Thus;—"Vouchsafe to allow me to praise thee, O sacred virgin! give me strength against thy enemies." "To thy protection we fly, O holy mother of God! Despise not our prayers in the time of our necessities, but from all dangers always deliver us, O virgin glorious and blessed!"

SATURDAY, AUGUST 18TH, 1821.

IF I were to insert all that has been written upon the privileges of the Virgin Mary, enumerated in my last, it would occupy a large portion of this volume, though I were not to mention the remaining hundred and eight. The reader will find the substance of these legends in the Discourse of Bishop Patrick, in the Preservative, &c. Vol. III. Tit. xii. As a specimen, I shall here give an account of the Virgin's death and funeral. It is taken by the Bishop from Pelbart, who was alive in 1471, and who dedicated his book to Pope Sixtus IV.

"The Blessed Virgin lived upon the earth after her son till she was fifty-eight years old, as some say; sixty-three as others; and others, more by a great deal. At last she prayed very earnestly to her son, that she might depart from this place of pilgrimage on earth, and be gathered unto him; who thereupon sent an angel to her, promising that within three days he would take her to himself. Together with this news, the angel delivered her a branch of palm which he had brought from paradise, and told her that she must have it carried before her bier to her interment; he gave her also a suit of mourning which her son had sent her. Of this angel she demanded two things; first, that she might be buried by all the apostles; secondly, that when her soul departed from her body, it might meet with none of the devils or malign spirits. Upon which last demand, the angel said unto her, Madam, why are you afraid to meet the devil, whose head it is that you have bruised? However, what you ask, you shall have. You shall meet with no devils, and the noble apostles shall inter you.

"The Virgin, full of joy at this good news, assembled all the virgins and saints together, and gave them to understand her death was now at hand, comforting them thereupon. At the same time was St John the apostle preaching at Ephesus, and in the middle of his sermon, came a clap of thunder, and a white cloud, that whisked him through the air, and set him down at the door of the Virgin Mary's house; where, being entered, he and the Virgin embraced each other with abundance of tears, and Mary recommended to his care her burial. At which words the good apostle threw himself down upon the earth, and with a great deal of passion, cried out and said, Alas! my God, my God! why dost thou lay this sore affliction upon us, to take away this holy mistress of our religion, the mirror of sanctity, and our only consolation? As he was thus lamenting, the blessed Virgin showed him the shining palm and mourning suit her son had sent her, and ordered him to take great care this branch were carried before her bier. St John desired, with all his heart, that all the apostles might accompany him at this solemn action; and immediately the apostles that were scattered in all the corners of the earth, were carried through the air on white clouds, and set down before the house, where, entering in, and meeting with St John, they were marvellously astonished," &c. &c. And well they might be astonished; but as I am tired with copying such diffuse nonsense, I shall give the sequel in my own way, which may be in the proportion of a word for a line. The apostles said their Ave Maria, and became composed. They did homage, and paid their adorations to the Virgin. Christ himself arrived with the nine orders of angels, &c. &c., and after they had sung admirable hymns, the Virgin rendered up her soul, with these words of the fortieth Psalm, "Lo, I come, in the volume of thy book," &c. Her funeral was conducted by the apostles; John going before, carrying the palm. The Jews thought this a good time to rid themselves of all the apostles at once; and, accordingly, with the high priest at their head, they made an attack on the funeral procession; but the high priest, on putting forth his hands to lay hold on the bier, found both his arms fall off by the elbows, on which he made a lamentable howling; and Peter told him honestly, that there was no way to save himself but by kissing the bier, and professing the Christian faith, which he accordingly did, and his arms were immediately fastened on again. The body was consigned to the tomb, but after three days, angels came and took it up to heaven; and the Church of Rome, solemnly believing all this, or professing to believe it, annually celebrates her assumption by a great festival. The above particulars are related by Pelbart with such an air of gravity, that no doubt he believed them all; and he was an author of such note in his day, that he is often cited by Father Crasset, a Jesuit, in his book of true devotion to the Virgin, printed as lately as 1679.

The story of the assumption of the blessed Virgin is related in different ways by different authors, and these are not very consistent with one another, which is of no great importance, seeing the thing is a fable throughout; and it could never have gained credit in the world but by means of forgery and imposition. Eusebius, and Austin, and Jerome have all been pressed into the service of the Church, or rather into the cause of the Virgin; but men of understanding, even in the Church of Rome, now admit that the passages ascribed to these writers, which favour the idea of the assumption, are false and spurious. During the dark ages, however, they served the purpose of promoting the adoration of the great idol which the Church of Rome was pleased to set up. This idol is reported to have done more miracles since her death than Christ and his apostles ever did. Many great volumes are filled with accounts of them; and the tendency of all is to excite men, women, and children to worship her.

There always has been, and ever will be, a correspondence between the character of men and that of the object of their worship. Those who worship God in spirit and in truth are reconciled to him, and made in some measure like him. But when persons not reconciled to God, and not conformed to his image, attempt any thing of the nature of religious worship, it will always be found to be directed to a being of a character like their own. The divine Being may be professedly the object; but if the nature of the worship of such persons be analyzed, it will be found that it is not addressed to God, in those characters of holiness and righteousness in which he makes himself known in the bible; but to him under certain characters which have a counterpart or resemblance in the vain imagination and corrupt affection of the worshipper. Thus there is much idolatry practised under the pretext of worshipping the true God; and under a mistaken idea that he is the object of devotion, when the mind of the worshipper rises no higher than to a creature of his own fancy.

This is the idolatry of carnal men in an enlightened state of society—enlightened, I mean, with regard to the things of this life, for here there is light enough to convince men of the folly of worshipping creatures like themselves: but in a state of gross darkness, like that which prevailed in Europe from the fourth to the fifteenth century, it was found convenient to have objects of worship more carnal; that is, more like depraved human nature, than it was possible to conceive the Deity to be. Men given up to vile affections, as all are who resist the truth, must have objects of worship corresponding with the state of their minds. Thus the gods of the heathen were monsters of impurity; and their worship consisted in unbounded licentiousness. Popery has improved on this in appearance, but not in reality. The Church of Rome holds up her great idol, the Virgin Mary, as a pattern of purity; and, therefore, she claims not to be compared with the votaries of impure deities; but she does not deny that the Virgin is a person still possessed of, and still under the influence of human passions. She possesses an extraordinary degree of ambition and self-love; for almost all her miracles are wrought for the purpose of advancing her own glory, and engaging men to admire and worship her. Every man possesses less or more of the same self-love and ambition, and if he could work miracles it would be to advance his own glory. While he continues under the influence of this carnal mind, and while he can persuade himself that the Virgin Mary possesses the power which Papists ascribe to her, she is just such a goddess as he wishes to have. He will flatter her, and offer her abundance of incense, in the hope that she will favour and advance him. Thus the Popish idol is used for the purpose of cherishing one of the vilest affections.

All modern Papists will disavow, on behalf of the Virgin, the grosser impurity of the heathen idols to which I have alluded; but some of their writers five hundred years ago, were not so scrupulous on this point. If I were to publish the familiarities which are said to have been practised between her and St Dominick, and other great saints, I should not be able to show my face in the company of virtuous persons. I shall not even refer to any English book in which these things are recorded, lest the world should be set on inquiring after it, and lest some profligate bookseller should republish it; but the learned will bear me witness that I am not writing without book, or bringing a false accusation against the Church of Rome, when I refer them to Alanus Redivivus, p. 2. c. 3, and 4. Hautin Angelus Custos, c. 4. No. 3, and Cæsarius, 1. 7. c. 13, &c. The state of morals among Papists must have been depraved beyond all expression, when such stories were currently reported and believed of the principal object of their worship, and her most favourite worshippers; and in point of fact, it appears from unquestionable authority, that the devout worshippers of the Virgin looked upon her as too tender and kind a mother, to be offended with them on account of any vice in which they might choose to indulge themselves, provided they were punctual in saying their Aves and counting their beads.

I shall here indulge the reader with one of the least offensive of the stories which are recorded of the Virgin Mary, in order to impress the people with an idea of the miraculous power which she possessed, and to encourage all to put their trust in her. The famous convent of Montserrat owes its origin to the following miraculous incident:—the first Count of Barcelona had an exceedingly handsome daughter, but she had the misfortune to be possessed with a devil. The Count one day carried her to a holy man in the neighbourhood, called Friar John Guerin, who was understood to have the power of casting out devils, in order that he might cast this one out of his daughter. The holy man soon did the job; but for fear the devil should return, he advised the Count to leave his daughter for some time in his keeping, which, like a fool as he was, he agreed to. Friar John, thus left alone with the young lady, fell in love with her, seduced her, and afterwards murdered her, at the instigation, as was said, of a devil disguised like a hermit. Having been guilty of these horrible crimes, the holy man went right to Rome, and confessed himself to the Pope, who, instead of sending him to the gallows, as he deserved, merely ordered him for penance, to return to Montserrat upon all four, like a beast as he was, and not to speak a word, and not to offer to get upon his legs, till a child about three months old should bid him rise, and tell him God had pardoned his offence. Seven years after this the Count of Barcelona was a hunting, when some of his men found out this Friar in a den, all over hairy like a bear, whom they took and chained, and brought away with them to the castle of Barcelona, where he was tied up in the stable like a monster. The Count soon after made a great feast, and to divert his company, ordered the monster to be brought forth; whom as soon as the earl's child saw, that was there in its nurse's arms, it said distinctly these words:—"Rise upon thy feet, Friar John Guerin, for God hath pardoned thy offence." And immediately the friar came to himself, began to speak, and tell the whole story. Upon which the Count told him, that since God had pardoned him, he could do no less; but he desired to know where he had buried his daughter, that he might take up her bones, and bury them in his father's sepulchre. The good Friar conducted the Count's servants to the place where he had interred the lady, and opening the ground, they found her alive and well, as fresh and as handsome as ever, excepting a little kind of streak like a scarlet thread about her neck, where the mortal wound had been inflicted. The maid spoke, and told them she owed her life to the blessed Virgin, to whom she had been consecrated, and who had miraculously preserved her. There they built a convent, of which this young lady was the Abbess, and Friar John Guerin the Confessor. Near this place, in a certain grotto, was found an image of the blessed Virgin, exceeding bright and luminous, and perfumed with excellent sweets, which was discovered by angels' melody, that were worshipping it in a cave; this image, they that found it were for carrying away; but when they came as far as the place where the lady had been buried, it grew so heavy on their hands, that they were glad to leave it there with all their hearts. There they built a chapel over it, though it was a very desert place, and mighty inconvenient for the pilgrims resorting thither: and this is the rise of that famous chapel, where so many miracles and famous things have been done.—See an Account of the Life and Death of the blessed Virgin, by Bishop Fleetwood, in the Preservative, &c. Tit. xii. p. 18, 19.

After giving the names of a host of authors who have defended the practice of invoking the Virgin and other saints, the Vindicator proceeds:—"I shall add one witness more in favour of praying to the saints and angels, and this is the Protestant Church of England. In her book of common prayer is the following collect for the feast of St Michael and all angels, Sept. 29:—'O everlasting God, who hast ordained and constituted the services of angels and men, in a wonderful order, that as thy holy angels always do thee service in heaven, so by thy appointment, THEY MAY SUCCOUR AND DEFEND US ON EARTH,' &c." Col. 430. Much as Popish writers affect to despise and contemn Protestant churches, they are always happy to avail themselves of their authority, when they think it is in their favour; and if I found the Church of England teaching the worship of saints and angels, I would leave her to defend herself, as I have not undertaken to defend her any more than our own establishment; but, in point of fact, she does no such thing; and the words of the prayer which the Vindicator quotes in proof of his assertion, bear on the very front of them that they are an address to the "everlasting God," and to none else. Here, as in many other passages, Mr Andrews seems to write on the presumption that his readers will believe his word contrary to the evidence of their own eyes and ears. He gives a passage to prove that the Church of England prays to saints and angels; and there is not a syllable in the passage itself that can possibly be construed to imply such a thing. This is a fine specimen of Popish impudence; and it deserves to stand in the same sheet in which it is asserted that the apostles practised and taught the worship of the Virgin Mary; for the reader will find this in their writings, as soon as he will find the worship of angels and saints in the collect of the Church of England, which is cited to prove this church to agree with Rome on that point.

Christians know that angels are employed in the service of the church; that they are ministering spirits sent forth to minister to the heirs of salvation; and when a man prays to God that he may enjoy the benefit of this ministry, it is no more a prayer to angels, than a petition that our daily bread may nourish and support our bodies, is a prayer to that which we eat and drink. At the same time, I think it is enough that we commit ourselves to God, and pray that he may succour and defend us, whether by the ministry of angels, or any other ministry which in his infinite wisdom and goodness he may be pleased to employ.

In former numbers, I gave copious extracts from the Garden of the Soul, and other books of Popish devotion, which clearly prove the Church of Rome idolatrous, inasmuch as she addresses the Virgin and other saints, in such language as is proper only in addressing the divine Being. On this The Vindicator remarks:—"I have no dislike whatever that the subject under discussion should be decided by the language of our authorized books of devotion, provided we are allowed to give the sense of that language in our own meaning, and not in the perverted construction which our adversary puts upon it. He has given, he says, copious extracts from our devotional books, and he challenges any man to 'say if it be possible to use any language of more direct address, in the form of prayer, to the divine Being himself, than is addressed to the Virgin Mary.' What he means by 'direct address,' I am at a loss to understand. If he means, that when we pray to the Mother of God we direct our addresses to her, he is right; but if he means, that we invoke the holy Mother in the same direct language as we address her Son, he is under a most egregious error, and his assertion is totally false." Col. 435. The Vindicator then proceeds to give explanations, and make distinctions which I am sure he does not comprehend. It is enough for my purpose to have it acknowledged, that he and all the Papists in the world address their prayers directly to a creature like themselves. This creature they must invest with the perfections of deity, else she cannot hear the prayers which are addressed to her every hour, from all quarters of the earth. To pray to such a creature is downright idolatry, else there never was idolatry in the world. I use the word in its plain grammatical meaning; and I am not willing to allow Mr Andrews the privilege of putting "his own meaning" upon the words of his devotional books. I take the words as I find them; I allow them to have the same power that I would allow them in any other book; and I appeal to every unprejudiced person, who understands the meaning of the words, whether they do not make out the charge of idolatry against the Church of Rome as completely as ever it was made out against Pagan Rome, or Greece, or Babylon itself.

The principal distinction which the Vindicator makes between Mary and Christ, as objects of prayer, is, that the former is a mediator of intercession, while the latter is the mediator of salvation; but, as I showed in a late Number, this distinction is a mere invention of Popery; for the bible speaks of only one intercessor in heaven, as of one mediator. The work of making atonement, and the work of interceding for us, are invested in the same divine person, Jesus Christ, our only Saviour; and the Church of Rome would not show greater impiety were she to take the work of atoning also out of the hands of Christ, and ascribe it to her idol. The Vindicator adverts to Paul's request to the Christians at Rome to pray for him, and to the command of God to Job to pray for his three friends, as bearing him out in his statement about mediators of intercession; but if this proves any thing at all, it proves that every Christian in the world is a mediator for every other Christian, for they all pray for one another, which certainly cannot make out the specialty which he means to establish with regard to the mediatorship of the Virgin Mary.

The Vindicator does not know, with all his powers of quibbling, how to explain away certain words which I quoted from great Popish divines, in which the Virgin Mary is exalted above the heavens, and in fact, represented as greater than the Saviour himself. He, therefore, disposes of them in the following summary manner: "In looking over the extracts to which he refers, I find he has quoted the writings of St Germain, St Bonaventure, St Bernardine, &c. but as they are professed to be taken from the works of Archbishop Usher, and one M'Culloch, both of whom were as staunch Anti-papists as the Protestant himself, he will allow me to suspect the correctness of his authority, as I have not the least doubt upon my mind, that they were as capable of garbling and misrepresenting the words and sentiments of the authors cited, as I have proved our adversary to be with regard to mine." Col. 436, 437. Quite as capable, and, I believe, not more so; and as the Vindicator has not proved any thing of the kind on my part, it is fair to conclude that nothing of the kind was practised by Usher or M'Culloch, the latter of whom is alive, and abundantly able to answer for himself. That he has proved me guilty of garbling and misrepresenting his words and sentiments, is another assertion of The Vindicator's, without any more foundation, than that the apostles, and the Church of England teach and practise the worship of saints and angels. I defy him and his Glasgow constituents, with Mr Scott at their head, to point out a single instance in which I have garbled and misrepresented either his words or his meaning; and I believe Usher and M'Culloch are equally innocent with regard to the authors whom they quoted. But why did he not go to these authors themselves, and see whether their words were correctly given? If he cannot read Latin, he knows that his friend and patron, Bishop Milner, can. Why not then have recourse to him? and why not overwhelm me with the exposure of mis-quotation, had any imposition of the kind been practised? There can be no doubt, the bishop knows the works referred to better than I do; and Mr Andrews knows what share he had in the Vindicator better than I do; or whether he had any share in it at all, which I cannot aver from my own knowledge, as he can do. I have my suspicions on the subject; and I have what may be considered a moral certainty, that if I had garbled and misrepresented the above-named saints, or copied garbled extracts from their works, some learned Jesuit would long ago have exposed the imposition: and as Archbishop Usher published his work when the order of Jesuits was in its glory, he would soon have been detected had he misquoted or misrepresented a single sentence.

No. CLXIII.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 25TH, 1821.

THE Catholic Vindicator seems to be satisfied with his devotion to the Virgin Mary. He makes very little account of other saints, or even of their relics. He disposes of both in a very summary way. "I wish," says he, "the reader particularly to remark it: the Church of Rome approves and recommends the veneration of the saints and the honouring of their relics; but mark! she does not make it a law, nor does she consider it an essential part of Christianity. Neither does she encourage the superstitions and impositions which our adversary says she does. On the contrary, the guardians of her faith and doctrine are bound, upon the hazard of their eternal salvation, to exert themselves to destroy the abuses of superstition, and that cupidity which makes a shameful traffic of images and relics." Col. 565, 566. This is an admission, that in the holy and infallible Church of Rome, there have been abuses of superstition, and a shameful traffic in images and relics; and it is a very poor defence to say she does not make it a law,—she only approves and recommends the veneration of the saints, and the honouring of their relics, that is, the worshipping of both, for this is the practical inference which every true Papist will draw from the words; and I apprehend that approving and recommending creature worship is enough to convict a church of idolatry, whether such worship be established by law or not.

I have already shown that if creature worship be at all admitted, it matters not what be the rank of the creature. It may be the Virgin Mary, or it may be a fragment of her handkerchief; the worship of the one is as really idolatry as the worship of the other; and seeing the Vindicator declares that he does regard the Virgin as an object of devotion in a religious sense; (col. 443.) and seeing he admits that Papists address their prayers directly to her, (col. 435.) it is needless for me to spend more time in proving Papists to be idolaters. Our Glasgow ones, at least, are convicted by the pen of their own advocate, whose book cost them so much money, and which even the recommendation of Mr Scott could not enable them to sell.

This subject being set at rest, before proceeding to another, I shall notice a little more of the Vindicator's trifling. I had said, in one of my Numbers, that "the sinner who believed in Christ yesterday for the first time, is as really a saint as Paul, or Peter, or even the Virgin Mary." The Vindicator affects to understand me as saying, as great a saint, instead of as really one; and to his own perversion of my words he replies at length, quoting scripture against me, about one star differing from another star in glory, which is usually understood to prove that there are degrees of glory among the saints in heaven, which, whether it be so or not, is a thing that I never disputed. If I were to say that Mr Andrews is as really a sinner as Judas Iscariot, I suppose, he would not deny the charge; but I question if he would admit that he is as great a one, which I do not by any means assert; but I might do so with the utmost propriety, if I were to reason as he does.

By a sinner believing in Christ, I mean one who has forsaken his sins, and who has begun to live a holy life. This person is a saint in the bible sense of the word; he may, indeed, be one of the very lowest rank of those who are called babes in Christ; but as an infant of a day old is as really a human person as the man of a hundred years, so he who began yesterday to live a holy life is as really a saint as any of the apostles were. He shall receive the reward of a saint if he persevere in holiness to the end; but the greatness of the reward, or degree of glory that shall be conferred, is quite another matter, and a matter with which we have nothing to do. I admit that the word of God seems to countenance the idea, that there shall be a distinction among the saints in heaven; for there are special promises to apostles and others who have been honoured to turn many to righteousness; but as their reward, first and last, is all of grace, it must not be calculated according to human reckoning, or according to merit in one more than in another. For any thing we know, the thief who confessed Christ on the cross has a higher place in heaven than the Virgin Mary. I do not say it is so, or that I believe it to be so; but I do say, that we know nothing of the matter: and, therefore, supposing it were proved that saints in heaven were proper objects of worship, no one could tell whether the thief or the Virgin had the highest claim to our devotion. Perhaps there are delicate minds that will feel hurt by placing these two individuals in such close contact; but the fact, that both were sinners saved by grace, ought to do away all such squeamishness. Nay, we have greater certainty of the thief's being in heaven than of the Virgin's being there. By inference from certain premises, we come to a charitable conclusion with regard to the latter, though we have no evidence of her persevering to the end in faith and holiness; but for the former we have the express words of our Saviour, "To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise."

Speaking of the impossibility of the saints hearing and attending to all the prayers of their devout worshippers, I used a word or two, of which, perhaps, the Vindicator has cause to complain. My words were, "I suppose he very piously makes use of the prayers which he has composed for the worshippers of his favourite idol, St Wenefride; and he must know that a number of pilgrims are every day paying their devotions at her holy well; now, I ask him seriously, how she can attend to the prayers of all these pilgrims in Wales, and at the same time hear his prayers in Drake street, Red Lion Square, London? Or, supposing her to be in heaven, how she can attend to either the one or the other? If Mr Andrews shall make this intelligible and credible, he will show himself to be as great a man as the unanswerable Dr Milner himself." To this the Vindicator replies, apparently in great wrath, as follows:—"Such is the disgusting and contemptible stuff which my opponent compiles for the amusement of his readers; such his petty frivolous mode of conducting this important controversy. Would it not be more to his credit were he to employ himself in refuting my arguments, by cool reasoning, or justifying his own assertions by convincing truths, than in calling upon me to explain the mysteries of God?" col. 445. They happen, however, to be only the mysteries of Popery, for God has never told us that the saints in heaven do hear our prayers. If he had, we should have been bound to believe it, though he had not told us how. But a thing of human invention ought to be capable of human explanation; and seeing the adoration of St Wenefride is of no higher than human origin, the inventor, or the reommender of the invention, as Mr Andrews is, ought to be able to tell us all about it. "As well," says he, "might I call upon him to explain the mysteries of the Trinity, or the incarnation of the Second Person of the Trinity, as he, to inform him how the Almighty communicates his gifts to the blessed in heaven." Col. 445. But the question was not, how does the Almighty communicate his gifts to the saints? but, how does Mr Andrews communicate his prayers to them? This he ought to understand, and be able to explain, else the nature of his worship is unintelligible to himself, and must be unprofitable.

The following is the article in which he considers himself chiefly aggrieved:—"And here," says he, "I cannot help noticing the unfair and dishonest dealings of this scribbler towards me. In the passage I have last quoted from his work, he has attributed the composition of the prayer to St Wenefride to me, and he calls this saint my favourite idol. Now, I ask him in return, how he knows that St Wenefride is my favourite idol, or that she is an idol at all in my eyes? Can he tell what passes in my heart? Can he say that St Wenefride is a favourite of mine; or that I adore her and worship her as an idol, which, Johnson says, is an image worshipped as God; and which our accuser frontlessly charges Catholics with doing. But mark, reader, the blind ignorance or the wilful falsity of this abandoned writer. He accuses me of composing the prayers to St Wenefride which appear in her life, and yet the very first sentence in the book shows my edition is only a reprint from one which was published in the year 1712, and consequently I could not be the author. This being the plain fact, what reliance, I ask the reader, can be placed on the man who can thus sport with the sacredness of truth, in the hope of fixing a supposed odium on the shoulders of his antagonist? Oh! shame, where is thy blush!" Col. 446.

Many bad things the Vindicator lays to my charge; but this is the only one for which there is even an apparent foundation. I wrote as if the prayers which he gave in his edition of St Wenefride's life were composed by him, though it seems they were not. I knew perfectly well that it was a reprint of an old book; but it appeared to me to contain a good deal of new matter, composed by him, or some other modern author; particularly, a narrative of a miraculous cure, certified by his friend Dr Milner, to have been lately performed by the saint at her holy well. I naturally concluded that the prayers which followed, at least the one which contains the words, "Holy St Wenefride, even in this unbelieving generation, still miraculous, pray for us," was also his composition. This was a mistake, if he tells the truth; and it was nothing but a mistake. I defy the world to make more of it; and it was a mistake that could do him no harm, seeing it merely represented him as the author of what he approved, published, and recommended. He must have been much at a loss for matter of accusation against me, when he holds this forth as "blind ignorance," "wilful falsity," and "sporting with the sacredness of truth." My insinuation that Wenefride was his favourite idol, puts him into such a passion, that I suspect he was afraid of the jealousy of his other idol, the Virgin Mary, suspecting that she would be told by some of her Glasgow worshippers, what The Protestant had been saying about him and her Welsh rival. But he ought to pardon my mistake, seeing that when I wrote the offensive passage, he had not publicly declared his own devotion and attachment to the Virgin; for in his school book he only recommends her to others; and from the high encomiums which he had bestowed upon St Wenefride, it was impossible not to consider her as a very great favourite of his.

It is perhaps necessary to remind the reader once more, that nothing which I have here advanced is meant to derogate from the respect that is really due to the memory of Mary the Mother of Jesus. My remarks refer only to the idol to whom Papists have impiously given her name; though the Vindicator represents them as applicable to the Virgin herself. "It is impossible," says he, "not to be struck with horror and disgust at the irreligious and obscene manner in which The Protestant speaks of the holy Mother of God, of that admirable pattern of innocence and holiness, who was saluted by an angel of God as 'full of grace.' Were he to advance but a tithe of his filthy abuse against the memory of the mother of the regent, who, from her high station as queen of England, was an object of respect and reverence, he would soon feel the weight of the laws upon his guilty head; but, because the Catholic Church venerates with pious devotion the virtues and graces of the queen of heaven, the Mother of that God who came down from heaven, and died to redeem him, this impious scribbler indulges in a strain of invective and sarcasm against the character of the blessed Virgin, in the most base and contemptible language that can be used." Col. 517, 518. This is all downright falsehood and misrepresentation of my words. I never wrote a syllable disrespectful of the Virgin Mary. My invectives and sarcasms, as he calls them, were not against her, but against the absurd, impious, and idolatrous representations which Papists have made of her. When the idolatrous Israelites worshipped the sun under the image of Baal, the prophet Elijah spared neither invective nor sarcasm against both the idol and his worshippers; though there can be no doubt he admired the sun, and loved his light as much as any of them. No creature, animate or inanimate, is honoured by being put out of its proper place. It would be an insult to the greatest lady in the kingdom to be called queen of England, when England has no queen. Now, as there is no queen of heaven, so far as we know, it is a gross insult to the Virgin Mary to give her that title: and supposing her to be a glorified saint in heaven, which I am willing to take for granted, though it cannot be proved, there can be nothing more insulting to her than to give her those honours which do not belong to her, but which are due only to Him who redeemed her and other sinners by his own blood. Every glorified saint in heaven, as well as every saved sinner on earth, is willing to be nothing, that Christ may be all and in all; and to suppose that the Virgin Mary is an exception to this rule, is to do her the greatest dishonour, and to suppose that she does not reverence the Saviour so much as others do. The devotion of Papists to her proceeds upon the supposition that she had no inconsiderable hand in the work of our redemption, which must be to her unspeakably insulting, seeing she herself needed redemption as much as any other daughter of Adam; and, supposing she is one of the redeemed, she must desire, like all the rest of the blessed company, that the glory of her salvation, and of that of all who are saved, should be ascribed to the Saviour, and to Him alone.

Besides, I am not the inventor of the stories concerning her which I have related, or to which I have alluded. These stories are related by grave doctors of the Romish Church; and I have referred to them, not for the purpose of abusing her memory, but for vindicating it, and condemning those who have so prostituted her name for the vilest purposes of avarice and lust. I did not say that she was "a pander of lewdness," as the Vindicator falsely insinuates; (col. 519.) but that great authors of his own communion represented her as such, when she accepted, and was gratified by the devotions of lewd persons, and promised them favour and protection so long as they paid their due respects to her. I have referred to the works in which such things are recorded; and it is no apology for him to say that I have cited books which even he has not seen, though he be a bookseller; for there can be no doubt the learned Bishop Milner, under whose patronage he wrote, and whose learning is equal to that of any Jesuit of the age, must be perfectly familiar with the books to which I have referred, in this and every other part of the controversy. Mr Andrews ought therefore to have been ashamed of his own ignorance, and to have taken advantage of the learning which must have been at his service in so good a cause.

The Vindicator seems almost willing to abandon the defence of Popish morals, so far as relates to the worship of the Virgin and its consequences, as related by ancient authors, and to bring the question to the test of my own experience; and here certainly, I can have no objection to meet him. "Where is the man," says he, "who does not know that the rigid adherent to the system of the Church of Rome is the very opposite character to that which has been given of him by our calumniator? Does he not know the falsehood of these charges? Has he not ocular demonstration of the truth of my assertion in his own city? Let him look around him, and he will see that those of his neighbours in Glasgow, who are the most devoted to the Virgin Mary, are also the most faithful in keeping the commandments of God." Col. 520.

Without stopping to admire the consummate impudence of this assertion, I proceed to remark, that as the Virgin has not yet got images of her set up in our streets, it is not possible to ascertain who are her most devout worshippers. But I suppose the Vindicator wishes me to consider all our Glasgow Papists as such; and he wishes their moral character to be contrasted with that of our Protestant population. This is very fair, and I am willing to put the question to this issue as upon a matter of fact. I declare then from my own knowledge, and for the truth of it I appeal to every man whose official duties have led him to investigate the state and character of the inhabitants of Glasgow and its vicinity, that the moral character of the Papists in general is unspeakably below that of our Protestant population. I admit that there are a few individuals of the Romish communion in Glasgow, who maintain a fair character in the world, and I wish there were a hundred to one of them of this description; but suppose the immense majority of those called Protestant removed, and the parties reduced to equality in point of number, I do not hesitate to affirm that the morally decent, not to say truly religious, among the worshippers of the Virgin, would be few indeed, in comparison with the number of persons of this description; that is, morally decent, called Protestant. According to Mr Cleland's report of the population of the city and suburbs, in 1819, of 150,000 inhabitants, there were little more than 8200 Papists, which is nearly in the proportion of one Papist to seventeen Protestants and a half. Supposing, therefore, the moral character of the parties to be equal, our criminal calendar would afford a list of at least seventeen Protestants for one Papist. But every one knows that this is far from being the case. I am not prepared to say what is the exact proportion, because a particular record is not kept of the religious denomination of criminals. Most of them profess no religion at all; and it is not usually ascertained which of them are Papists till they are about to be hanged. Then, to be sure, the pastor claims his wandering sheep; or they, trusting in his pretended power over the world to come, send for him, and submit to his discipline. He gives them a Douay catechism, by which every one of them is taught to say, in answer to the first question,—"By the grace of God I am a Christian." Then he proceeds to treat them as Christians, to administer to them what he calls the Christian sacraments, and he tells them that he will not be answerable for their salvation, if they believe a single word of what any Protestant may say to them about the way of salvation. It is not many months since it was my lot to witness the leading out of four young men for execution, three of whom were Papists, who spent their last hour privately with Mr Scott, and were not suffered to join in public exercise with the other. I do not say that the proportion of Popish criminals is generally three to one; but all who take any charge of our jail know that it is sufficiently great to overwhelm with shame, if that were possible, the man who asserts that those who are "most devoted to the Virgin Mary, are also the most faithful in keeping the commandments of God."

The Vindicator will reply, perhaps, that these criminals were not piously devoted to the Virgin, and that it was from the neglect of her worship that they came to a miserable end. But for this he must give us more than his bare word. As I have already said, from the want of images, we have no criterion by which we can ascertain who are her most devoted worshippers. We can therefore take only those for her worshippers who are taught to be such; whose church approves and recommends the worship of mere creatures, and of this creature in particular. This is the Church of Rome; and I am willing the morals of her members be compared with those of Protestants all the world over; nay, I challenge the comparison; and I am sure the advantage will be found on the side of those who renounce all creature worship,—who acknowledge only one God and only one Mediator between God and man. This is so manifest all over Europe, that travellers are able to tell when they have passed out of a Popish province into a Protestant one, from the superior state of morals and comfort which they observe in the latter. As for Ireland, every person who has travelled the country knows, that all the decencies of life are to be found among the Protestant population in a tenfold degree more than among the Papists. I had lately an opportunity of hearing this proved in a rather extraordinary manner:—At a missionary meeting in the Bull Inn, a clergyman, a native of Ireland, drew a frightful picture of the state of religion and morals in that country, from which he had just come, having been there on a visit. When he had finished, another gentleman rose, and begged leave to address the meeting. He said he was an Irishman, and that he rose for the purpose of vindicating his country from what he considered an unjust representation of her character; for that he could declare, from his own observation, that the Irish were as religious and moral and loyal a people as any on the face of the earth. At first there seemed an unpleasant feeling in the meeting, from two gentlemen so flatly contradicting one another; but a moment's explanation set all right. It turned out that the first speaker referred to the south and west of Ireland, that is, the Popish part of it, where he had recently been; the second spoke of the north, or Protestant part, to which he belonged; and the witness of these two, who were unknown to each other, confirmed the fact of the vastly superior state of morals among the Protestants.

No. CLXIV.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 1st, 1821.

I HAVE done now with the Virgin Mary and her worship, as advocated by the CATHOLIC VINDICATOR, and I leave it to the reader to say, whether I have not shown that the Church of Rome is idolatrous, even according to the admissions of her own hired defender. The discussion of this subject brings me down to the Vindicator's twenty-ninth Number, in which he enters upon his favourite topic, that of the man in the Wynd, which had been his rallying point almost from the commencement of his work. At this stage, he enters upon it more systematically; and he keeps by it to the very conclusion, admitting little else in the way of reply to THE PROTESTANT, except a very feeble attempt to defend the doctrine of transubstantiation, which the reader may find in his forty-fifth Number, continued in a desultory manner to his fiftieth, to which I shall pay attention in due time.

For a full account of the man in the Wynd story, I refer to my fiftieth Number, and to my letter to Mr M'Hardy, published two years ago. The Vindicator labours through many a long page to make this story appear a forgery of mine. All his ingenuity, with that of his committee, here seems to have been directed to that single point. He and they have started difficulties about it, and invented inconsistencies, and put questions, and formed answers, which raise such a dust about it, that few persons will have patience to take a deliberate view of the subject. The fact is true notwithstanding, as any person may satisfy himself, by inquiring of the surviving party, who is sufficiently designated in the publications referred to; and the scurrilous abuse which Mr Andrews heaped upon this person, in almost every page of his work, indicated a conviction in his own mind, that I did not invent the story; for if he had really thought so, his invective would have been applied to me alone; and he has never so much as insinuated that the widow of his deceased brother invented it; for that would suppose her possessed of more intellect and literature than he will allow her.

There is not a fact recorded in history;—nay, there is not a fact which a hundred men shall swear that they witnessed with their own eyes, which could not be rendered doubtful, or which might not be made out to be a forgery, by such quibbling and casuistry as the Vindidator has applied to this plain and simple story. A work was published about two years ago, entitled, Historical Doubts relative to the Existence of Napoleon Bonaparte, in which the author labours with great ingenuity, though ironically, to prove that there never was such a man in the world; at least, that there is not such evidence of his existence as to command the belief of an impartial and philosophical inquirer after truth.

"Let it be allowed us," says the writer, "as is surely reasonable, just to inquire, with respect to the extraordinary story I have been speaking of, on what evidence we believe it. We shall be told that it is notorious; i. e. in plain English, it is very much talked about: but as the generality of those who talk about Bonaparte do not even pretend to speak from their own authority, bnt merely to speak what they have casually heard, we cannot reckon them as in any degree witnesses."—"What then are we to believe? if we are disposed to credit all that is told us, we must believe in the existence not only of one, but of two or three Bonapartes; if we admit of nothing but what is well authenticated, we shall be compelled to doubt of the existence of any. It appears then, that those on whose testimony the existence and actions of Bonaparte are generally believed, fail in all the most essential points on which the credibility of witnesses depends: first, we have no assurance that they have access to correct information; secondly, they have an apparent interest in propagating falsehood; and, thirdly, they palpably contradict each other in the most important points."

But what shall we say to the testimony of those many respectable persons who went to Plymouth on purpose, and saw Bonaparte with their own eyes? must they not trust their senses? "I would not disparage either the eyesight or the veracity of these gentlemen. I am ready to allow that they went to Plymouth for the purpose of seeing Bonaparte; nay more, that they actually rowed out into the harbour in a boat, and came alongside of a man of war, on whose deck they saw a man in a cocked hat, who, they were told, was Bonaparte; this is the utmost point to which their testimony goes; how they ascertained that this man in the cocked hat had gone through all the marvellous and romantic adventures with which we have so long been amused, we are not told: did they perceive in his physiognomy his true name and authentic history? Truly this evidence is such as country people give one for a story of apparitions; if you show any signs of incredulity, they triumphantly show the very house where the ghost haunted, the identical dark corner where it used to vanish, and perhaps even the tomb-stone of the person whose death it foretold."

"Bonaparte prevailed over all the hostile states in turn, except England; in the zenith of his power, his fleets were swept from the sea by England; his troops always defeated an equal, and frequently even a superior number of any other nation, except the English; and with them it is just the reverse; twice, and twice only, he is personally engaged against an English commander, and both times he is totally defeated, at Acre, and at Waterloo; and, to crown all, England finally crushes this tremendous power, which has so long kept the Continent in subjection or in alarm, and to the English he surrenders himself prisoner! Thoroughly national to be sure. It may be all very true, but I would only ask, if a story had been fabricated for the express purpose of amusing the English nation, could it have been contrived more ingeniously?"—See Eclectic Review for July, 1819. Thus the author shows that the glory of England being in a great measure connected with the fable of Bonaparte, we have reason to doubt every Englishman's testimony on the subject; the same thing is equally true of Scotchmen and Irishmen; and twenty arguments equally cogent are adduced to show that we may very reasonably conclude that the whole story is a fabrication, intended to flatter our national vanity, and make us cheerfully pay our taxes.

Now, to compare small things with great, this is precisely the way Mr Andrews endeavours to discredit a story as true as the existence of Bonaparte. The reader will suppose he must be a very ingenious man who can do this; and I cheerfully admit that there is a sort of coarse cleverness in his management of the subject, which is sometimes amusing enough, but more frequently disgusting, from the impudence with which truth is denied, and falsehood asserted. We ought not, however, to give Mr Andrews himself credit for all this; for having the whole college of Jesuits at his back, he would no doubt have all the advantage that was to be derived from their well known craft and cunning.

The manner in which the Vindicator treats this subject, especially his bold attempts to make that appear false which I and fifty others know to be true, reminds me of a passage in a letter of a reverend correspondent in Ireland, to the following effect:—"Under the system that admits the lying casuistry of intention, and the principle that you may do evil that good may come, it is impossible to elicit truth from persons, whose object it is to hide truth, and who are too much every day under the power of their spiritual superiors, to dare to do any thing that might either offend them, or bring them into disrepute. I have seen enough of this. I have witnessed the most decided breach of oaths under this influence. I have had the most decided denial of facts of which I was as certain as that the sun shines, and of expressions which I heard with my own ears, when they referred to any thing connected with priests and the church, or the cause of emancipation, &c. &c. Men unacquainted with those people cannot conceive this. It is long before an honest ingenuous Protestant mind can suppose it is possible; and nothing but the very clearest conviction can persuade some persons that it is so, and that a conviction from their own experience."

This conviction has been deeply impressed upon my mind from my experience of the manner in which The Vindicator and his Glasgow committee have treated this part of the controversy. It is not, however, my intention to resume that subject. It would be a work of supererogatiou to demonstrate again what I have proved in the publications above referred to, especially in my letter to Mr M'Hardy, which remains to this day without a reply, for the few nibbling sentences which occur here and there in the Vindicator, do not deserve that name. If that letter, however, shall receive a respectful answer, I shall be as ready to return to the subject as ever. In the meantime, as some parts of my letter were understood to reflect rather severely on that gentleman, it is but just that I insert his defence, as it appeared in the 34th Number of the Vindicator, professedly written by one who knows him well. And the Vindicator himself expresses thanks to his correspondent for giving him an opportunity of doing justice to a gentleman totally unknown to him, "but who has by his spirited and upright conduct in assisting to detect a foul fabrication, invented to calumniate his Catholic neighbours, raised himself in the esteem of all who admire probity and liberality, whether the possessor be a Protestant or a Catholic." Col. 543. If Mr M'Hardy had Mr Andrews against him instead of for him, it would be rather unfortunate that the certificate of his character is anonymous; for the certifier subscribes himself under the very general designation of "a Highlander and Catholic;" but I am more liberal than the Vindicator would be in similar circumstances. I give as full credit to every part of the testimony as if it had been subscribed by Mr Scott himself; and if I have not such profound admiration of "the high and important office which he now fills in the city of Glasgow," it is perhaps because I do not look up to it from such a "deep profound" as his Popish admirers do. The certificate is as follows:—

"As to the respectability of Mr M'Hardy, who was one of the deputation that waited on Mr M'Gavin, I can, from my own personal knowledge, bear testimony. Born in a remote corner of the Highland as well myself, in the same parish, I have had an opportunity of knowing his merits and demerits for a series of years. And from the high and important office which he now fills in the city of Glasgow with unimpeachable character, his bitterest enemies, not even 'THE PROTESTANT,' if he is one, dare avow that his honour, integrity, and high respectability, derogates in any one iota from that office. It would be much to the honour of 'THE PROTESTANT,' were he such a liberal minded and upright gentleman."—Cath. Vind. col. 544. I have no wish to derogate from either the character or the dignity of this gentleman; and he should never have been honoured by a stroke of my pen if he had not thrust himself forward in aid of our Glasgow Papists, and as a contributor to the CATHOLIC VINDICATOR; who, to use the language of the Vindicator, "so honourably, and so spiritedly, volunteered his services to detect the gross imposition of our accuser." Col. 487. Here I take leave of him and of the man in the Wynd, unless he or some friend of his shall revive the controversy; and with this short notice, I get over at once a large proportion of my opponent's volume; containing, indeed, a great deal of matter, but quite irrelevant; and, but for the incessant recurrence to the man in the Wynd, could scarcely be known to have any relation to THE PROTESTANT.

Amidst the mighty mass of irrevelant matter above referred to, we have one passage that merits a little notice in passing. In my fifty-first Number, I laid down what I believe to be the bible doctrine in relation to the method of salvation;—that it is through Christ alone, without any merit of ours. On this the Vindicator remarks as follows:—"Such are the principles laid down by 'THE PROTESTANT' in his controversy with the Papists, and principles of a more diabolical and impious nature it is impossible to invent or propagate. If a man is taught not to expect that he can contribute in the slightest degree towards his salvation, by obeying the commandments, what motive or what interest can he have in keeping them? If his own merits are not to avail him in the least, in obtaining the rewards of eternal life, what inducement can he have to pursue a life of virtue here on earth, to reap a life of glory hereafter? If the attempt to seek a justification by the performance of good works is to renounce the Son of God as a Saviour, will any man endeavour to quell the irregular motions of his nature? On the contrary, will he not rather give way to the evil inclinations of the flesh, relying on the atonement of the Saviour by faith alone? Talk of Popery being a system of wickedness, or permitting its adherents to live in a habitual state of iniquity, why what is the sum and substance of the doctrine here stated by the adversary of Popery? Does he not maintain, that to do good with a motive of securing salvation, is a horrible supposition,—that by faith alone can man be saved,—and that all other means is a derogation from the merits of the Redeemer? And is not this an encouragement to live in habitual wickedness, provided you have faith to believe yourself a saved sinner?" col. 582. Against the doctrine which I laid down, the Vindicator here cites the authority of WILLIAM COBBETT, which, in his opinion, is, no doubt, sufficiently high and conclusive; and he seems not a little pleased to find such a great man on his side, and avowedly preferring the Popish practice of confessing to the methodistical doctrine of salvation by faith alone; but as I have never heard that Cobbett is acknowledged as an authority by any Protestant church; and as I certainly do not bow to his authority in matters of religion, or any other matters, I may be permitted to pass this over, allowing my opponent and his work all the credit which they can derive from such a name, though it will be alleged by some ill-natured readers, that in the matter relics and rotten bones, Cobbett is more than half a Papist.

Any man who understands the bible will perceive at once that the Vindicator is entirely ignorant of what he is writing about, though the subject is the most interesting that can be imagined. The doctrine which I laid down was, that Christ must be acknowledged by a sinner as a whole Saviour, else he is not his Saviour at all; in support of which I adduced certain passages of scripture. The Vindicator makes no account of these; but he rejects the doctrine, because he cannot understand how good works are good and necessary, unless we are to merit salvation by them. He knows no inducement which a man can have to do good works, if they are not to avail him in obtaining the rewards of eternal life; and he can perceive no interest that he can have in keeping God's commandments upon any other principle than as contributing to his salvation. Thus he sets his own doings beside the merits of Christ, as possessing the same quality, and having the same influence, at least, in a certain degree; and thus he enters his protest against the doctrine of the apostle, "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he hath saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost;" Tit. iii. 5. It is at least in part by his own works that the Vindicator expects to be saved. It is a melancholy reflection that even one individual sinner on the face of the earth is living under such a fatal delusion, and proceeding to the grave with a lie in his heart; but when we reflect that this is a fundamental article of Popery, and that by teaching this doctrine the Church of Rome seduces and ruins all that confide in her teaching, we cannot help considering her as emphatically the Antichrist; that is, the mighty agent in the hand of the devil, raised up for the purpose of opposing the glory of Christ and the salvation of men.

Those who have read my papers with any degree of attention, must have seen that I do not undervalue good works; though the Vindicator always writes as if I did; and if he could make his readers believe this, they would very naturally look upon me as an enemy of both God and man; for whether men embrace one form of religion or another, or whether they embrace any religion at all, they will unanimously admit and maintain, that good is better than evil; and that if a man's conduct be bad, or if he teach men to be bad, he cannot be under the influence of a good religion. Now, I have not only insisted upon the necessity of good works, from the very commencement of my labours, but it has actually been my principal object, in writing against Popery, to expose the evil works which arise out of it; to show that it is the great enemy of all righteousness; and to persuade my readers to avoid it, to renounce it, and to embrace and hold fast the doctrine of Christ, which is really according to godliness, and which effectually teaches all who embrace it to abound in the fruits of righteousness, that is, in good works, to the praise and glory of God. The good works of a Christian are obedience to the commands of God, springing from love and gratitude for the blessings of the gospel; as such they are approved and accepted, and shall be crowned with a gracious reward, even with the crown of righteousness which Christ has prepared for them that love him. But the fancied good works of a Papist are not an expression of gratitude for blessings received, but proffered as the price of blessings expected; that is, in part at least, as the price of salvation; as such they must be abhorred and rejected, as if they were the greatest crimes, not because they are necessarily such in the matter of them, but because they are put in the place of Christ's merits, and deprive him of the honour which is due to him alone as the Saviour of sinners. It is the glory of Christ to be the Saviour of the guilty, and his glory he will not give to another; but Papists do what they can to wrest it from him, when they trust for salvation in whole or in part to their own merits. Every priest who teaches men to do this is an Antichrist; and let his cruelties and extortions, which affect only the bodies of men, be what they may, they are not to be compared to the fiend-like wickedness of deceiving and leading to perdition, millions of immortal souls. I call this fiend-like wickedness, for it is the very work of the devil, which he began in paradise when he seduced our first parents to sin against God; and which he continues by the agency of his ministers, preventing men from returning to God in the way which he has appointed; that is, confessing their sins,—accepting the salvation of the gospel, through the righteousness of Christ, without merit of their own, and then living to the glory of God by obeying his commandments.

Works may be good in the matter of them, as it is a good thing to feed the hungry and clothe the naked. In this way substantial good is imparted to fellow-creatures, to whom such works will be always pleasing and acceptable; and they are pleasing to God also, if they proceed from principles and motives which he approves, but not otherwise. Professions of loyalty are good, and pleasing to a sovereign prince, provided they proceed from sincere affection for his person, and approbation of his government; but supposing the prince to see into the heart of a professedly loyal individual, and to perceive that his motive was to ingratiate himself with men in power, to subvert the government, and set aside the succession of the heir apparent, would not the loyalty of such a man, and all his professions of it, be more offensive to the prince than avowed treason? Now God knows the heart of every man and the motive of every action; and works materially good must be abhorred by him, when he knows that the motive and design of them is, to subvert the established order of his kingdom, and dishonour his beloved Son, by putting the merit of these works upon a footing with his merit, and refusing to submit to his righteousness which is alone sufficient for the salvation of the guilty. I hope my readers are aware that there is an established order in the kingdom of heaven. The fundamental principle of it is, that by sin, all men are ruined and lost. The gospel of Christ takes this for granted; and it comes to them as a proclamation of peace and reconciliation, inviting sinners to repent of their sins, to accept the mercy revealed to them, and be reconciled to God. It is expressly declared that there is salvation in no name but that of Christ,—that no merit or righteousness but his will be acknowledged, as of the least avail, in reference to the salvation of sinners. For men, then, to come on the footing of their own merit, is a direct insult to the God of heaven. It is to tell him to his face that they do not approve the way of salvation which his wisdom and mercy have provided: it is in short, to declare that they neither care for him nor his salvation. This the Church of Rome does every day, by teaching her members to merit salvation for themselves; and though she were to renounce all her other fooleries and impieties, this alone would fix the seal of perdition upon her.

No. CLXV.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 8TH, 1821.

IN my fifty-third Number I wrote as follws:—"Papists themselves know that I do them no injustice by accusing them of lying; and they would only laugh at my simplicity if I were to affect to think otherwise of them. I speak of the system of Popery which is built upon falsehood, is supported by falsehood, and is in fact nothing but fraud and falsehood throughout; and, while admitting that there might be individuals in the Church of Rome who had a regard to truth in their dealings, I maintained that it was impossible for any man to be an active promoter or defender of Popery, without having recourse to lying and imposition." The Vindicator quotes these words, and more to the same purpose, col. 706, as if for refutation; but let the reader proceed, and he will find that there is not so much as an attempt to refute the heavy accusation. Indeed the Vindicator is perfectly aware that the thing is true; and he shuffles it off as usual by a great parade of words about the multitude and the dignity of Papists in all parts of the world, and by repeating, for the hundredth time, his pretended detection of falsehood on my part, in reference to the man in the Wynd, as if this were a complete set off against the universal system of fraud and falsehood practised by his church. But let us have his own words:—

"My principal object, however, in making these citations from his work is, to show the want of feeling and delicacy in this arrogant deacon of the tabernacle, in asserting, that the most numerous portion of mankind in the civilized globe, are educated and instructed in the detestable sin of lying. Thus emperors and kings, statesmen and prelates, from the first establishment of the Church of Rome to the present time, embracing an era of 1800 years, with the whole mass of people, are represented as a body of habitual liars, with here and there an exception. And who is the man that has made so base an assertion? Why, an individual who stands convicted by me with dealing out falsehoods and calumnies by wholesale, without the least shame or remorse: who has been detected in fabricating and forging a charge against a dead man (who, of course, cannot face his calumniator, and call upon him for justice) to blacken the religious principles of his Catholic neighbours: who stands suspected of conspiracy with persons of the meanest and vilest class in society, to assist him in bearing out his impositions: and who still insists upon the accuracy of his statements, in spite of his own contradictions, and the clearest testimony of his guilt. This is the man who hesitates not to affirm that it is impossible for any man to be an active promoter or defender of Popery without having recourse to lying and imposition! And yet, reader, this man, who writes under the title of The Protestant; this same man, I say, for the last ten months, has cowardly borne my taunts and my detections of his lies; has meanly and dastardly submitted to my goadings, without having ventured to point out one single lie,—one solitary imposition on my part, in my vindication of that system which he loads with such unfounded denunciations. Surely, he will not as impudently affirm that I am not an active promoter or defender of Popery, after having styled me the champion of the system! —And yet he might, with as little violation of truth, say the one as the other. If it is impossible for any man to be an active promoter of Popery without having recourse to lying and imposition, it must be very easy for the antagonist of such a liar and impostor to detect and expose his falsehoods and impositions. If the promoters and defenders of Popery are systematic liars; if the system of Popery is built upon falsehood; how can the former escape detection, and the latter be free from exposure? This is a point far more mysterious to me than the doctrine of transubstantiation; and when The Protestant hazarded the assertion, he acted much more contrary to common sense, than Catholics do in believing that the body and blood of Christ is truly and really present in the sacrament of the eucharist, under the form of bread and wine." Col. 708.

Not a word more have we in the way of reply to the weighty charge which I brought against the Church of Rome on account of her falsehood and imposition. He shows indeed some wisdom in not formally professing to refute the charge, seeing he knows that it cannot be refuted. His principal object was, as he says, to show my want of feeling and delicacy in bearing so hard upon his Church, who, it seems, has practised fraud and falsehood so long, as to claim a sort of prescriptive right to these arts; and had I been a man of feeling and delicacy I would have spared her the reproaches which he is grieved to the heart to hear, but which he cannot ward off. He seems very angry because I would not let his Church alone, and commence an attack against him personally, which is, indeed, the most generous and knightly like thing that has yet come under my view in the course of this long protracted warfare. He affects to be very indignant, because I have not abandoned my avowed course of procedure against his holy mother, in order to expose his own lies, which he continued to throw out from week to week, in great abundance; many of which, I believe, were made for the very purpose of diverting my attention from the bloated system, for the sake of which he was willing to become a sort of scape-goat. The more plainly I told him that I had other matters to dispose of before I could make a particular reply to him, the more loudly he boasted of his mighty achievements, and of my not entering the lists with him. He wonders how I could bear his taunts so long, and what he calls his detections of my lies; but I felt no difficulty in bearing what I knew did not apply to me, and what I am sure he himself knew did not apply to me, from any thing of mine which he had read, but which was the mere invention of his own brain, and intended for no other purpose than to engage me in a controversy about my own character, which all who knew me were persuaded did not stand in need of any defence. Had I been silly enough to suppose that it did, I should have gratified him and his committee, and have long ago lost sight of the errors of Popery, my exposure of which has so highly provoked their wrath.

Having allowed him to exhaust his own passion, and his reader's patience; and having gone through the course which I had prescribed to myself in conducting the controversy, I came at last to the Vindicator, and agreeably to the promise which I made two years ago, I have replied to some of his calumnies, for I cannot call them arguments; and though I have not used the Billingsgate style of calling every thing a lie that deserved the name, I have exposed not a little which confirms what I said, that it is impossible to be an active promoter or defender of Popery without having recourse to lying and imposition. But, as I heartily dislike private and personal matters, I shall leave these things, for the present, with assuring my readers, that what the Vindicator calls my contradictions, are without an exception that I recollect, formed by his misquotation or misrepresentation of my words; nay, in numerous instances, he has given as my words, what are not mine, and which express sentiments that I never held. See particularly, the bottom of col. 765; about the middle of col. 778; towards the bottom of col. 779; twice in col. 781, viz. at the top, and about the middle; about the middle of 789; near the bottom of 792; near the top of 798, &c. In all these passages, I am represented as saying, and admitting, and laying down a rule about the power of the clergy to prevent, and put down the teaching of any new doctrine, nothing of which ever came into my head, and nothing of the kind did I ever write; but with the most hardened effrontery does the Vindicator lay those things at my door, and charge upon me by name. Thus the incessant efforts of the Church of Rome to prevent free inquiry, he says were "agreeable to the statement made by Mr Wm. M'Gavin that men were given (to the church) to prevent new doctrines from arising." And I do not know how often he speaks of heresies being "condemned and proscribed, agreeably to Mr M'Gavin's rule." Now the Vindicator must have been perfectly aware that he was inventing these things out of his own head; for there is not a word of my writing that can bear any such construction. Yet the invention, or fabrication, has no great merit in it, seeing it is made out by the perversion of a very harmless assertion, that the ordinary pastors of the Church were given, not to teach any new doctrine, but merely to make known what is contained in the bible. Again, I had expressed in my letter to Mr M'Hardy, a doubt how a "woman living in Ireland, could be the lawful wife of a man who died last year;" on which Mr Andrews writes thus:—"Reader, is the man in his senses? Is he a rational creature, or is he an idiot? He will not inquire how a woman in Ireland can be the lawful wife of a man in Glasgow!" Col. 808. From which he would make it appear, that a man in Glasgow is precisely the same thing as a man who died last year; and most heartily do I wish he could make this belief prevalent in Ireland, as it would save us from shoals of begging Papists who are incessantly coming over to annoy us.

Thus I have shown in few words, that the Vindicator himself furnishes abundant evidence of the truth of the statement at the commencement of this Number. No doubt he thinks he took the best mode of defending Popery; and he knows that he did it by lies and imposition. I could have pointed out this two years ago as easily as now; but the thing has lost nothing by keeping; and I can expose it now with the advantage of identifying our Glasgow Papists with it, with more certainty than I could then have done. Indeed though I have it on proven record, that Mr Scott advised his people to buy the book, I have it equally proven, that he disapproved of it, and did not like it at all, perhaps from its furnishing too much evidence of what I meant to establish.

In charging lying and imposition so directly against the promoters and defenders of Popery, I had a particular reference to transubstantiation, which makes every priest tell a lie, every time he celebrates the eucharist, and thus thousands of lies are told every morning before breakfast; for, according to a law of the church, the eucharist must be taken fasting from midnight; it must be for the day, the first thing which the stomach receives, though, when Christ gave it to his disciples, we have reason to think it was the last. The priest declares the bread and wine on the altar before him, after pronouncing four Latin words, to be no longer bread and wine, but the real body and blood, soul and divinity of Jesus Christ. A more barefaced lie was never told; and a great part of Popish worship consists in the incessant repetition of it. What is more, the priests themselves must know it to be a lie, at least such of them as live in England and Scotland; and Mr Fletcher tells us somewhere in his Lectures, that this is a principal article in their confession to one another. That is, they confess, perhaps once a year, the sin of deceiving the people by this abominable lie; they receive absolution, and go on telling lies as before. I have also been informed, by a reverend and learned correspondent in England, that the priests, finding it impossible to persuade the more enlightened of their people to believe transubstantiation, kindly allow them to disbelieve it, provided they keep their unbelief a secret, and not disturb the implicit faith of the common people: for if this were subverted, the whole system would be blown up, and the ghostly fathers might go a pilgrimaging whenever they pleased.

Mr Andrews, however, professes to believe this lie; but if he were a priest he would be conscious that he possessed no such power as that which transubstantiation supposes. It is admitted that the words hoc est corpus meum, have no power when pronounced by a layman; and every priest must be conscious, that when he received orders, he underwent no physical or moral change, by means of which the same sounds should have such power when pronounced by his lips. And yet he tells the people every day, that by the uttering of these words, he turns a piece of gross matter into the Saviour of the world. As such he worships it, and holds it up to be adored by the whole congregation.* Now I ask every man who possesses common sense, whether the priest must not be conscious that he is deceiving the people and telling them a lie? If it is not so, his mind must be differently constituted from that of other men.

At the beginning of his 45th Number, the Vindicator enters upon this subject in the following terms: "I shall now proceed to notice the monstrous absurdity which he accuses Papists of believing, namely, 'that their priest can make the God that made himself.' Were Papists, indeed, such dolts as The Protestant represents them; were they to believe their priest to do what Mr M'Gavin says he does; then must I acknowledge that they are more stupid than asses, and the doctrine they profess a gross and monstrous absurdity. But the fact is, Papists admit no such power in the priest; they look upon him only as the instrument, while God himself performs the change which takes place in the elements of bread and wine in the sacrament of the eucharist." Col. 705. Yes, indeed, the priest is only the instrument; but is he not a voluntary and a necessary instrument, without whose agency the thing would not be done? He has power to pronounce the mysterious words when he pleases; or when he pleases, not to pronounce them; and upon his doing this the whole work depends; so it is as really his doing as the formation of the bread is the work of the baker. Every loaf that we eat is the product of divine power; and yet, in common language, it is proper to say, a baker made it: so if we were to admit that transubstantiation is the work of God, still the doing of it depends upon a priest, as he must pronounce the words by which it is effected,

* By a late letter from Ireland, I am informed, that on the 23d of June last, there was a procession of the host, in the city of Derry, for the first time in the memory of man. That is, the consecrated bread was carried about to be worshipped as the Saviour of the world; and such Protestants as were present, and would not pay respect to it, were insulted in such a way as to teach them to be more submissive in future. This is the liberality of modern Papists; and this is the toleration that Protestants are to expect whenever they shall obtain power.

just as the making of a loaf depends upon human labour, in sowing, reaping, and every other necessary process. Those who believe in transubstantiation, therefore, must and do believe it to be the work of the priest and what none but a priest can do; and this is well known to be the chief ground on which priests claim to be exalted above all other men, and on account of which the people regard them as deities; for surely they must regard as gods those who can make God, or not make him, at their pleasure. It is one of the many disadvantages which attend this controversy, that one cannot expose such blasphemies without making use of language bordering upon blasphemy.

But suppose we admit transubstantiation to be the work of God as exclusively as the creation of the world, it does not diminish the impiety of the error; for it is not the conversion of bread and wine into a mere creature, as the body, and blood, and soul, but also into the divinity of Jesus Christ. Now divinity is not a subject of conversion or creation. It is blasphemy to ascribe the creation of divinity even to God; or to call that divinity which was not so from all eternity. But the Church of Rome, according to the solemn decision of her last general council, declares accursed all who do not believe that the bread and wine in the eucharist, are truly and substantially converted into the divinity, as well as into the real body, and blood, and soul of Jesus Christ. The Vindicator affects to revolt at my representation of his belief, "that a priest can make the God that made himself;" and his correction of it amounts only to this, that God is employed every day in making the God that made him; that is, converting the bread and wine into deity every time the eucharist is celebrated. It is impossible to conceive any thing more blasphemous and revolting; and there is no exaggeration here. It is the softened down and qualified representation of that dogma by which the Church of Rome is chiefly distinguished.

By the use of an indefinite expression the Vindicator is enabled to involve the subject in some obscurity, and even to make it appear that he has high authority on his side. "Catholics," says he, "know also that this doctrine of the real presence was held by the apostles themselves, which I shall hereafter prove." Col. 709. Then he refers to the Greek church, the Nestorians, the Eutychians, the Jacobites, &c. &c. But the real presence of Christ in the sacrament is not the point in question. It is certain the apostles believed in this, in the sense in which Christ promised his presence to be with them; but he is as really present in the preaching of the gospel as in the eucharist; nay, it is with the preaching that his promised presence is more immediately connected:— "Go, preach the gospel to every creature;— and, lo, I am with you always, to the end of the world;" but there can be no doubt the promise extends to the Lord's supper, which is indeed a most significant way of preaching the gospel; for showing forth Christ's death, is really to exhibit his gospel to all who witness the ordinance, as it is to enjoy the benefit of his death by all who in faith partake of it.

Now, I suppose, every Protestant church holds the doctrine of the real presence, while it is expressed in this general form. Luther taught the real presence of the body and blood of Christ, in the eucharist, in some such way as water is present in a moistened sponge, or fire in red-hot iron, without supposing one substance converted into another. This was called consubstantiation, which, though not so impious as the Popish dogma, is as little countenanced by scripture. Protestants in general believe in the real presence of Christ in the eucharist, not as corporeal in any sense whatever, but entirely in a spiritual manner; not only in his essence, which is present every where alike; but in those gracious manifestations of himself as the Saviour of sinners, which he makes to them who believe in him, and who understand what is meant by the ordinance; who, when they eat bread and drink wine in remembrance of him, think of the breaking of his body, and the shedding of his blood, as an atonement for their sins, which is significantly represented by these elements, and the use which they make of them. To them he is really present in the most substantial manner; and Christians of every age and country will be found professing their belief in the real presence of Christ in the eucharist, for I like this word better than sacrament; and Popish authors having assumed almost the exclusive use of the expression real presence, and having it generally conceded to them, as peculiarly their own, like the word catholic, have taken advantage of it, so as to make appear on their side, ancient fathers and churches, whose principles were as far removed from the transubstantiation of the Church of Rome, as east is from west: for the thing, as defined by the council of Trent, is not that Christ is really present with the bread and wine, but that these are truly and substantially converted into the whole substance of Christ's humanity and divinity, insomuch that not a particle of the bread and wine remains in existence, while the astonished worshipper sees before him nothing but bread and wine, and these just as they were before the wonderful conversion was effected.

In discussing this subject in my 58th No. I laid it down as a rule, that we must have a perfect understanding of a thing before we can pronounce it contrary to reason. This I take to be an axiom that does not require to be proved. It is one of those things to which the mind of one who understands the terms must intuitively assent. I mentioned this in reference to the doctrine of the Trinity, which, I said, we could not pronounce contrary to reason, seeing we had not a perfect understanding of it; and as it was plainly revealed in Scripture, we were bound to believe, though we could not understand it; but as transubstantiation was not revealed in Scripture; and as it was a matter quite level to our understanding, we were entitled to pronounce it absurd and impossible. On this the Vindicator makes the following sage remarks:—"What a profundity of logic have we here displayed; or, in other words, and more strictly applicable to his language, what nonsense and rant has Mr M'Gavin exhibited in this passage! His meaning, if he really had any when writing the above, is far more unintelligible to me than the doctrine of transubstantiation. So then, according to Mr M'Gavin's logic, we must have a perfect understanding of a thing before we can pronounce it contrary to sense and reason. Now I always thought it more rational to pronounce a thing contrary to sense and reason when it was out of our power to form a perfect understanding of it." Col. 723. Well, I suppose this is genuine Popish philosophy. Every man is entitled to pronounce what he does not, and cannot understand, contrary to reason! I leave it to scientific men to say what havoc this principle would make in subjects of natural science; and seeing Mr Andrews does not, I suppose, understand how an immortal spirit, and a reasoning faculty, can be united with a lump of clay, it must be contrary to reason to suppose that he is a rational creature, or any thing more than a mere clod. I request him to remember that this is not an inference of mine, as I seldom stoop so low for my metaphors; it must be his estimate of himself according to his own doctrine.

I spoke of the doctrine of the Trinity as plainly revealed in Scripture, and, at the same time, admitted that we could not understand it; and to this the Vindicator gives a conspicuous place among what he calls my contradictions, col. 723; not knowing, or not choosing to appear to know, that a thing may be plainly revealed as to the reality of its existence, while we cannot understand the mode of its existence, which is not revealed. If Mr Andrews make out this to be a contradiction, he will land himself in atheism; for either he must say that he understands the existence of Deity, or that the truth of it is not plainly revealed; and as the former is impossible, he must necessarily fall into the latter.

No. CLXVI.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 15TH, 1821.

I AM informed by several of my readers, that they are heartily tired of my controversy with the Catholic Vindicator; that they wish I would have done with him; for passages of his which I, find it necessary to quote are so full of absurdity, impiety, and scurrility, as to excite disgust and abhorrence; and my readers think that I am doing him too much honour, and raising his work into too much importance, by the extent and particularity of my replies. I am aware that there is truth, and nothing but truth in these remarks; but they have not convinced me that I ought to have been less particular. It is argued, I know, that few persons read the Vindicator after the first two or three Numbers; that therefore his blasphemies could do little injury to the public, as his abuse could do no harm to me. But the limited circulation of the work is one principal reason why I think it necessary to take so much notice of it. Had it been read by all the readers of my Numbers, I might have spared myself the trouble of answering it, for they themselves would have seen its gross absurdity and impiety. The design of my writing is not to counteract the pernicious influence of blasphemies which have been read by few, and for which only an obscure individual is responsible; for if this were all I had in view, it were much better to let the work alone, that it might remain in the well-merited oblivion, into which it had sunk even before it expired.

I should think it not worth an hour of my time to continue a contest about mere private matters and personalities. But my controversy is well known to be a public one. My design is to expose the errors and the wickedness of Popery as a system, and the false pretences of those who give themselves out as of the holy and only true church, and, of course, as the only Christians in the kingdom; and who, if they shall acquire the ascendency to which they aspire, would not, if we may judge from past experience, suffer a Protestant to live. Now I think I cannot more effectually expose this abominable system of error and blasphemy, than by quoting and refuting the very words and sentiments of a living author, who was, only three years ago, selected by our Glasgow Papists, to be the advocate of the system which I was endeavouring to expose. According to his own affidavit, which the world will see by and by, he was engaged by a company of Glasgow Papists, for the express purpose of writing against "THE PROTESTANT," with the view, no doubt, of writing him down, as he commenced by declaring this to be his determination. His sentiments, therefore, must be considered those of the whole body, at this very day, in this enlightened city. The more revolting and disgusting they are, therefore, the better they serve my purpose. I know there are many Protestants who make light of my ancient authorities, from the mistaken notion that Popery is improved, and that Papists are more enlightened now. Such persons must be convinced of their mistake when they read the passages which I have extracted from the Vindicator. They tell me they did not know that any man alive could seriously write such absurd and impious nonsense; then it was the more necessary that I should undeceive them, and let them know the real truth of the matter; and, seeing they now find that I have proved, by the writings of a living Papist, that Popery is a much worse thing than they supposed, I hope they will join me in desiring its speedy extirpation, not by means of violence, but by the diffusion of the truth.

The limited circulation of the Vindicator is no reason why his calumnies should pass without notice. The worst thing that can happen to an innocent person is to be calumniated within a small circle, for there the calumnies may lie unnoticed and gather strength, till the injured person be dead, and till all who were able to repel them be dead also, and then they may be revived and propagated as incontrovertible truths; whereas, if they are propagated at first upon a large scale, they are sure to meet with contradiction and refutation; and such testimonies will be left on record, as will enable the writers of a future age to do justice to the injured individual. These considerations have determined me to bring the Vindicator's calumnies against myself out of their obscurity, and to insert the very worst of them in my own pages, that all the world may know and examine them if they please. I cannot make room for them all; but the reader will find a pretty fair sample, and a good assortment of them, in No 156; some have been since introduced; and I shall probably introduce a few more before I have done.

There is still another reason for my extended notice of the Vindicator's work. It furnishes an excellent specimen of the manner in which Papists defend their religion; and it is such as to indicate a conviction in their own minds that it cannot be defended by fair means. One who is conscious that he has truth on his side, has no objection to the strictest examination of his principles. He will rather court free discussion, than be offended by it; and he is under no temptation to abuse and calumniate persons who differ from him; for, though he believes them to be in error, he knows that they are not accountable to him, and that every man must answer for himself to Him who has given a revelation of his will, which is, or ought to be, equally accessible to all. But Papists deprecate free discussion. Their peculiar dogmata must not be examined into, but implicitly embraced under pain of anathema; and he who shall dare to express a doubt, or call in question any thing which they profess to believe, becomes instantly the object of their hatred and wrath. If they are possessedof civil power, or if not under restraint of law, they will murder him; and when this is not safe and convenient, they will attempt to murder his character by every slanderous imputation which malice can invent. Of this the Vindicator furnishes abundant evidence; and he has merely followed the track of his predecessors, who wrote against the Reformation, who, instead of refuting what they called the new doctrines, though they were as old as the gospel, expressed their wrath against the Reformers, by the invention and propagation of lies and slanders, which Papists continue to repeat to this day. Though my work is published, and extensively circulated, in each of the three kingdoms, none but the Vindicator has attempted any thing in the way of reply. Whence can this proceed, but from a consciousness on the part of Papists themselves, that they cannot answer me by fair argument, or otherwise than by abuse, as Mr Andrews has done, which they know is not reputable in the present state of literature and taste? That they do not despise my work, or reckon The Protestant a contemptible adversary, is certain; seeing they denounced him from the pulpit; and engaged, at a vast expense, a champion to write him down; and have endeavoured by every means in their power to procure his silence. Whence is all this? and why is it that they have not recourse to the only honourable and lawful means of putting him down, if he be in error,—that of exposing his errors, and maintaining the truth, by means of the press, by fair argument? There are many able men among them, who have more learning and more leisure than The Protestant;—many, who know how, if necessary, to make "the worse appear the better reason." Why do not some of them step forward for the defence of their holy mother? They know perfectly well that they cannot defend her by arguments; and as nothing else will do, in the present state of British society, as they have learned by the failure of the Vindicator, it is their wisdom to be silent.

I am afraid this long apology for a very dull part of my work will be considered an addition to the grievance of which my readers complain; but for their comfort, I shall inform them, that it is not my intention to write more about the Vindicator than I consider necessary to fulfil my promise, that I would answer him when I had done with other matter; and I think a Number or two more will enable me to do this, and also to silence the boasting of such as thought it impossible for me to answer their champion.

In my last Number, I entered upon the Vindicator's defence of transubstantiation. His remaining Numbers are taken up chiefly with this subject; and in the 45th, he breaks through all order and rule; and though a mere layman, he treats us with a long commentary of his own, on the sixth chapter of John's Gospel; in which he labours at great length to show, that our Saviour inculcated the doctrine of transubstantiation; and that the language which he used on that occasion, means nothing less than eating his flesh and drinking his blood, as literally as any cannibal would do the enemy that he had taken in battle. It is not necessary that I should reply to this long article, seeing our Lord himself replied to it, in the very same discourse, in answer to certain Jews, who affected to understand his words literally, as Papists do :—"It is the spirit that quickeneth ; the flesh profiteth nothing ; the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life," verse 63. This is a pretty plain intimation, that Christ spoke of eating and drinking his flesh and blood in a figurative and spiritual manner ; and that the eating of his flesh, as the carnal Jews understood, and as modern Papists understand it, would profit nothing. More on this branch of the subject, I need not say.

In the 46th Number of the Vindicator, we have one of the finest pieces of eloquence that was ever written on the subject, at least that ever came in my way. It is by the Rev. Mr Gandolphy, a Popish priest in London, a writer in Mr Andrews' Orthodox Journal, and, for any thing I know, an assistant of the Vindicator. This priest made a conspicuous figure, a few years go, by affected zeal for distributing English bibles, if any Society would put it in the power of him and his brethren to distribute copies of the Douay version. Several gentlemen in London were simple enough to believe that he was in earnest, and proposed to form a society for the sole purpose of supplying English and Irish Papists with copies of their approved English version of the Scriptures. They very naturally applied to this priest for his concurrence ; but after a great deal of shuffling, he declared off, having found out that it was not a principle of his church to grant the use of the bible in their own language, to the people in general.—See PROT. page 157. This same priest printed a collection of discourses, a very expensive work, I think in four volumes; but, owing to some secret influence in Rome, the Pope would neither give his consent to their publication, nor tell the author why he would not; so the work lay on his hands, and I suppose contributed to his ruin ; such is the blessed state of freedom enjoyed by the clergy in the Church of Rome! I suppose the following is taken from one of these proscribed discourses, which Mr Andrews had somehow got possession of in spite of the Pope:—"The Rev. Mr Gandolphy, in his excellent sermon on transubstantiation, observes, 'Were I allowed to instruct you on questions of philosophy, much might be said to diminish the difficulty in admitting this stupendous miracle. It is an undoubted fact, for instance, that even in nature one substance is frequently changed into another; and it is well known, that objects often appear to us under an appearance different from their real form ; and that they often seem to exist where we prove they do not, which is the case with all objects we look at through the medium of water. We observe the juices of a plant converted into the hardest wood ; we see the grass of the field changed into the horns, bones, hair, and flesh of animals ;—we behold wood and other substances converted into stone by petrifaction ;—we observe the same grain of seed multiply to infinity ;—walls of brass are not impenetrable to the forked lightning ; and through the crystal, which appears a solid body, the light passes in every direction, as if it met with no resistance. The whole hemisphere of the heavens, with all its varieties, is regularly depicted upon the small pupil of the eye, where millions of rays cross each other without interruption. The sun, moon, and stars are immense bodies, yet they all find a place in that wonderful organ. Nay, philosophers have declared, that the whole expanse of matter may be compressed within a less space than a cubic inch. Again, let ten thousand look at one man, does he cease to be present to you, who is equally present to all ? Here is, therefore, a multiplication of appearances, though the object continues one, which may be considered a lively, although imperfect illustration of the ubiquity of the presence of Jesus Christ in this sacrament of the altar. These wonders may astonish us, and yet we believe them ; and can we say, it is more wonderful that we should taste and feel bread and wine, when we receive the substance of the body and blood of Christ ? When we say that we can see an object—feel a substance— or that we taste a thing, we only affirm, that at that moment there is that impression upon the soul. It is only by continual observation and experience, however, that we learn to understand these expressions of the senses, and refer them to their proper object. The language of the senses is the first that the soul of man has to study. Destroy those faculties, and every object will cease to exist in his regard. Change the operation of one of those faculties, in any single instance for example, and the object will appear changed to us, though unaltered in itself. Change the substance of the object, as in the case of the eucharist, leaving its operation on the senses, the same as before, and what had been bread and wine will still appear to us bread and wine, through all their respective relations, though they are essentially become and exist a different object. Much of what I have said is exemplified in those who have been deprived of one or more of their faculties, or who attend to the impression of one sense only. Remember, therefore, that in the holy eucharist, the change is not in the blessed body of Jesus Christ, which always exists as he rose illustrious from the dead, and ascended glorious into heaven,—the error is to be attributed to those senses, which, prevented from discerning his glorious and spiritualized body, would discover nothing at all, if he did not make himself sensible to us, under some material sign. For it must be observed that it was only when he chose to work a miracle on these senses, that the apostles could see him, with their material eyes, after his resurrection. Thus Magdalene mistook him for a gardener. Thus, as the disciples passed to Emmaus, in his company, the scripture tells us, their eyes were held that they should not know him, and that afterwards, at supper, their eyes were opened, and they knew him, and he vanished out of their sight. (Luke xxiv. 16—31.) It is always (concludes the learned preacher) through not distinguishing between the mortal and the glorified—the passible and the impassible—body of Jesus Christ, or between his sacramental and his natural presence—that men experience difficulties in assenting to this great mystery of faith.'" Col. 726—728.

"Here," says Mr Andrews, "we have philosophy as well as scripture in favour of the doctrine of transubstantiation." He supposes notwithstanding that Mr Wm. M'Gavin will not believe, in which he happens to be right for once; and I suppose every intelligent reader will agree with me, that this brilliant piece of eloquence is more calculated to dazzle and bewilder than to convince. The orator uses a great number and variety of figures, but unhappily for his cause there is not one of them that bears any analogy to the thing that was to be proved. Transubstantiation is a miraculous change of one substance into another, of matter into divinity, while yet no change appears. When the juices of a plant are converted into the hardest wood, does he still continue to see nothing but the said juices? When the grass of the field is converted into the horns of an ox, or the hoofs of a horse, does he still see nothing but grass? Unless he shall answer in the affirmative, he must acknowledge that these operations of divine power in the world of nature, have no resemblance to transubstantiation; and that he was merely amusing, or rather deceiving his hearers by a show of argument without a particle of substance. His other figures are equally inapplicable: and it would require a miracle like transubstantiation to convert them into sense. To say that the whole mass of matter may be compressed within a cubic inch, is to say no more than that He who made all matter out of nothing, could reduce it to nothing again if he pleased. This has nothing to do with transubstantiation. But if Mr Gandolphy shall say, that this globe of earth, with the sun and all the stars, are actually compressed within the space of a cubic inch, while they appear to our senses as big as ever, I shall admit that it would be something like transubstantiation, though it would not quite come up to the absurdity of the thing; for this doctrine supposes matter converted into divinity, and still continuing to appear nothing but matter, without the least change of form.

I have heard of a preacher, who, after delivering an excellent sermon, had a trick of undoing all he had said by an injudicious application. Mr Gandolphy appears guilty of something of this kind; for in the last sentence of the above extract, he oversets all the fine fabric he had been endeavouring to rear, by making an admission that subverts the doctrine at once. "It is always through not distinguishing between the mortal and glorified—the passible and the impassible—body of Jesus Christ,—or between his sacramental and his natural presence,—that men experience difficulties in assenting to this great mystery of faith." Now this is the very distinction that Protestants always make. They admit that Christ is present in the one sense, and not in the other;—that he is present sacramentally, or by a figurative representation; but not naturally, in his real body and blood. Mr Gandolphy admits the same thing, else he will be convicted of admitting something worse. He cannot mean that Christ is present both naturally and sacramentally, for if so, there is no need of the distinction which he lays down as of so much importance. He cannot mean that Christ is present naturally, and not sacramentally; for then there would be no sacrament. He is reduced therefore to the alternative of admitting that he is present sacramentally, and not naturally; which is the true Protestant doctrine.

This, perhaps, is the reason why the Pope will not permit him to sell his work, after he has been at the expense of printing it; and, if so, it proves two things; namely, that his holiness has all his eyes about him; and that they are clearer ones than those of Mr Andrews. And I can easily suppose, that this being the reason, the Pope should not choose to assign it as such, lest he should set the people a thinking and talking upon the subject, which might lead to such consequences as no Pope would like to hear of.

When showing that transubstantiation was not always believed by the Church of Rome, I professedly took Tillotson's discourse as my guide. He had travelled through the literature of many a century; and quoted passages from saints and fathers from the second century down to the thirteenth, showing clearly that the doctrine was unknown during the earlier ages, how it arose, and was "licked into form," as it now stands. See PROTESTANT, No. 57. I thought it perfectly lawful to avail myself of what was thus prepared to my hand, seeing it was done with due acknowledgment. But here the Vindicator affects to catch me napping, and confessing myself in need of a director, while I professed to allow no other guide in the choice of religion but the word of God; and thus I am convicted of inconsistency and contradiction. But I need not tell my protestant readers, that to choose a religion is something different from tracing a historical fact, or a historical falsehood through a succession of ages: but those who do not believe their own senses, may not perceive the difference. In discussing this part of the subject, the Vindicator repeatedly accuses me of forging pasages in Tillotson's work, of which the eighth edition (the one in my possession) was printed in 1720, more than half a century before I was born, which must have been rather a miraculous operation; and, I suppose, if I were to embrace Popery, I might get canonized for it, a hundred years after my death.

No. CLXVII.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22ND, 1821.

I STATED in my last Number that the Vindicator accused me of forging several passages in Tillotson's Discourse on Transubstantiation. I shall now devote a few pages to this subject, in order to show on what sort of ground this defender of Popery founds the odious charge of forgery; and also to show how he fails in his attempt to make some of the ancient fathers appear teachers of transubstantiation.

At page 256, I gave the following, with marks of quotation, exactly as it stands in Tillotson's discourse, as the doctrine of Justin Martyr, with the title of the work, the edition, and the page, in which it is to be found,—"Our blood and flesh are nourished by the conversion of that food which we receive in the eucharist." From this I endeavoured to show, that this father did not believe that the bread and wine were converted into the body and blood of Christ, for it is not pretended that these are food by which our bodies are nourished. Instead of denying, or even attempting a reply to this very obvious inference, the Vindicator treats us with a whole column about Amicus Veritatis and Luther, endeavouring to defend the former from the charge of garbling the words of the latter, of which I convicted him, in the second Number of The Protestant. Then he turns round, and affects to find me guilty of the thing of which I convicted Amicus. He does not profess to have looked into Tillotson's work, which may be had in almost every library, to see whether or not I had quoted the words fairly. Perhaps he was afraid that he would not then have been able to fix the charge of forgery upon The Protestant with so good a grace, and to have charged it upon Tillotson would not have served his purpose, seeing he died a hundred years ago, and could not be injured by it; and seeing that had he been guilty of any such imposition, he would not have escaped being detected by some of the acute Jesuits of his own time:—

"But," says the Vindicator, "let us see if Mr M'Gavin has not made St Justin 'say what he did not mean to say,' and has thus by his own rule, committed another real forgery, in addition to the many which I have already detected. In a work which is now before me, called The Annals of the Church from the death of Christ, printed for T. Meigham, London, 1738, I find the following extract from the apology of this great Christian philosopher:—speaking of the eucharist he says, 'We do not receive it as common bread and wine. But as we know that our Saviour Jesus Christ by the word of God was made flesh, and took our flesh and blood upon him for our salvation, so we likewise know that this bread and wine, which nourish our flesh and blood, being consecrated by the prayers which the same word has taught us, BECOME the FLESH and BLOOD of the incarnate Jesus.' What shall we now say of Mr Wm. M'Gavin? Is it not clear that he has garbled the words of St Justin, and made him 'say what he did not mean to say?' Does he not stand clearly convicted, upon his own words, with having committed a real forgery? Whatever he may say of the unfairness of his former opponent, in placing a full point for a comma, and omitting part of the sentence, it is evident that in the case of St Justin, THE PROTESTANT has shamefully misquoted the words of the ancient father, by leaving out the context, and putting a sense upon them which is utterly unjustifiable. Taking the whole sentence of the learned philosopher and Christian martyr, it is demonstrably clear that he believed and taught the real presence of our Saviour in the blessed eucharist, and that it was the received opinion of the primitive Christians in his days." Col. 740, 741.

Then follows an account of St Justin and of his work, which was meant as an answer to those heathens who accused the Christians of being cannibals for eating the flesh of Christ. "In this work," says Mr Andrews, "he enters into a justification of the different doctrines and principles of the Christians, and, as I have before remarked, defines, in the plainest terms, the blessed eucharist to be the real body and blood of Christ, truly and substantially changed by the prayers taught by the same Word which took flesh of the blessed Virgin Mary. Had Mr Wm. M'Gavin given the whole context, instead of a detached part of the sentence, the conclusion which he has drawn would have been much more ridiculous and false than it now appears; but this would not answer his purpose. What, reader, I again ask, are we to think of Mr Wm. M'Gavin's veracity as a writer? He has been labouring hard to make it appear that Papists are not worthy to be trusted, even on their oaths, if they really believe in the doctrine of transubstantiation, because, he says, they must know it to be a lie, or they discredit their own senses. But who will henceforth give credit to his word, which has so often been found incorrect, but, I must add, intentionally so, and contrary to the evidence of truth and reason." Col. 742.

If my object were merely to vindicate myself, it would be enough to refer the reader to Tillotson's discourse on transubstantiation, in his volume of sermons, London, 1720, folio, page 266, where the passage will be found verbatim as I gave it. Upon the supposition that the words were unfairly given, this will satisfy the reader that there was no garbling or forgery on the part of Mr Wm. M'Gavin, on whom the Vindicator is so anxions to fix the odious calumny; but in point of fact there is no unfairness in the matter; and I am not reduced to the necessity of exculpating myself at the expense of the deceased, who was distinguished for probity, and amiable simplicity of manners, as much as by profound learning and transcendent ability. I have not at present access to St Justin's Apology; and neither, I suppose, had the Vindicator. I gave his words on the authority of Tillotson, a name well known, and universally esteemed; the Vindicator professes to give them from an anonymous book, and without a reference to any known author who could have vouched for the integrity of the writer, or the accuracy of his work. There is therefore strong reason to suspect that the author, whoever he was, made his quotation from an edition of Justin's work that had been interpolated according to the rules of the Index Expurgatorius. Or, perhaps, he made an addition of his own to the passage, as Mr Andrews himself has done; for Justin is made to say, that the bread and wine being consecrated become the flesh and blood, &c. and Mr Andrews adds, truly and substantially changed, not a word of which is in Justin's work as quoted by himself. This is a barefaced interpolation of his own, and it expresses a sentiment not so much as implied in the saint's words. This is a piece of imposition really amounting to a forgery on the part of the Vindicator; and seeing he could, without shame, add the words "truly and substantially changed," we may reasonably presume that the anonymous writer from whom he quotes, also added such words as were agreeable to himself.

Besides, the anonymous author gives us neither the Number, nor the edition, nor the page of the Apology, as Tillotson does, and therefore supposing the words to be fairly given, they may be from another passage of the work; and even supposing they expressed a sentiment somewhat different from the other passage, it need not be thought surprising, seeing the saints are not always consistent with themselves any more than with one another.

But after all, the passages are consistent with each other. Justin does say, in the Vindicator's own quotation, that this bread and wine nourish our flesh and blood. This is substantially the same as his doctrine given by Tillotson; and it is in itself a distinct proposition, unaffected by the other words in the sentence; so that by asserting it there is no misrepresentation of the author's meaning, and no foundation whatever for the Vindicator's bluster about garbling, forgery, and so on. Allowing that Justin did say that the bread and wine, being consecrated, became the flesh and blood of the incarnate Jesus, he must have meant it only figuratively and spiritually, or, if you please, sacramentally, and not naturally, or in the sense of transubstantiation. This is evident from his asserting that the bread and wine nourish our bodies, which supposes them to be in their natural state of nutritious matter, which they cannot be after they are transubstantiated. No Popish writer that I know of ever supposed that our bodies were nourished by the eucharist; and to say that they are so, is to deny transubstantiation. Bellarmine complained of the audacious curiosity of some Protestants, who presumed to ask what became of Christ when the Pope had swallowed him? and then he gives this reply:—"The body of Christ passes through the mouth of the communicant, and yet does not pass off into the draught, but the appearances of bread and wine (speciebus) being corrupted in the stomach, without any injury of itself, it ceases to be there, as, before consecration, without any detriment, it was not there." See Lib. I. cap. 14. vol. 2d. de sac. Euch. Antijacobin Rev. for July, 1821, p. 463. If any thing like sense can be made of this, it must be, that in taking the eucharist nothing but an appearance goes into the stomach; it is only an appearance that corrupts there; and when the appearance "ceases to be there," it leaves nothing. Tillotson was therefore perfectly correct in citing St Justin against transubstantiation, and that upon the simple ground of his asserting that our bodies are nourished by the bread and wine in the eucharist.

I next cited Irenæus, who writes as follows:—"When therefore the cup that is mixed and the bread that is broken, receives the word of God, it becomes the eucharist of the body and blood of Christ, of which the substance of our flesh is increased and consists." I gave another short extract from the same author, which the Vindicator inserts, together with the above sentence, col. 742; and not being able to find any thing in these two passages, that he could pervert into an example of forgery or garbling on my part, he takes care to make one of his own. Irenæus says, the bread and wine become the eucharist of the body and blood of Christ; but Mr Andrews in repeating the passage leaves out the three words which I have given in italics; and represents the "holy father" as saying "the bread and wine BECOME the body and blood of Christ;" and then he tells us that the words of Irenæus are "as clearly in favour of the real presence as any words can possibly be." Col. 743. If he had found any such example of garbling and misrepresenting in my writings, he would have made a tremendous noise about it, and we should have had it reiterated in every page of his work; from which it would appear that he claims for himself and brethren an exclusive right to garble, and forge, and falsify, without being liable to challenge or censure for so doing. After all, he finds nothing but the real presence, even by garbling the words of these fathers, which is not the question in dispute; for as I showed in the last Number but one, Protestants admit the real presence, in the sense understood by themselves; and most Protestants are agreed with Irenæus, that the bread and wine become the eucharist,—that is, the commemoration, or commemorative symbols, of the body and blood of Christ. Irenæus does indeed say, that the bread in the eucharist, receiving the divine invocation, is no longer common bread, from which the Vindicator is sure that it must be transubstantiated or changed into something extraordinary or uncommon. He does not know, I suppose, that a thing may be changed, or become uncommon, as to its use, while it remains unchanged as to its nature, which is all that the words of this father will bear. The show bread in the tabernacle, or bread of proposition, as the Popish translators call it, was not common bread, the use of it being restricted to the priests; but it was bread and nothing else; and it served to allay the hunger of David and his followers, just as other bread would have done.

The next passage which I extracted from Tillotson's discourse is a quotation from Tertullian. The Vindicator boldly represents me as the author of this; and he has no hesitation, he says, in charging me with another act of forgery, col. 744; and why? Because in his opinion, Tertullian was too profound a scholar and reasoner to make use of such language; and yet it is language which as great men as he make use of every day; namely, that when Christ said, This is my body, he meant the figure or image of his body. The Vindicator seems never to have seen the passage before. He did not think it worth while to inquire whether it was genuine or not; but simply because it is like the language of Protestants, I must have forged it! It is in this way that he PROVES me guilty of forgery, as he often asserts, in great capitals.

Next comes Origen, whose language is so decidedly against transubstantiation, that the Vindicator can find no way of evading it, but by finding me guilty of another contradiction. I admitted that one expression of this father, (eating the Lord,) was fanciful and incorrect, while it appeared plain from the context that he meant eating in a figurative sense; which was so evident to Cardinal Perron, that he rejected his testimony, because he was accused of heresy, and talked like a heretic in this place; on which Mr Andrews writes:—"Ah! Mr Wm. M'Gavin, why did you not follow Cardinal Perron's example, and reject the testimony of Origen too? If you acted thus wisely you would not have made so gross a contradiction as I shall now point out. You say that this father's words are so plainly against any thing but a figure of our Lord being in the eucharist, that Cardinal Perron rejected his testimony. But, Mr M'Gavin, if these words are so plainly expressed, how came you to find it necessary to explain them, and to declare one expression at least fanciful and incorrect? Do, sir, explicate this if you can. Pray, sir, clear up this mystery, which is far more incomprehensible to me than transubstantiation. How that can be plain which is incorrect; how words, which expressly say the Lord is eaten relate only to a figure, is truly puzzling, and reminds me of a similar contradiction in Church of England Protestants, who deny the real presence, yet say, in their catechism, that the body and blood of Christ are verily and indeed taken in the Lord's supper." Col. 746.

Thus, it seems, a passage cannot be plain and intelligible as to the general scope and meaning of it, if there be a single word introduced that is fanciful and incorrect, and which requires explanation to make it consistent with the context; and that a thing can be both plain and incorrect, is a greater mystery to Mr Andrews than transubstantiation. That two and three make six, I take to be an assertion sufficiently plain, and that it is incorrect, I suppose no one will deny; yet this is a greater mystery to him than the conversion of a wafer into the body and blood, soul and divinity of Jesus Christ. Those who can believe that he is speaking truth, may believe it; and if they can do so, they are no doubt prepared to swallow transubstantiation also.

He has nothing more to oppose to the passage adduced from Origen, but another passage which, he says, makes it manifest, "that Origen understood the real presence in the eucharist in a literal and not in a figurative sense." It is this:—"If we do not eat the bread of life, if we do not nourish ourselves with the flesh of Jesus Christ, if we drink not his blood, if we slight our Redeemer's heavenly banquet, we ought to reflect that, though God is all bounteous, he is equally just, and will punish our neglect." Col. 747. These are the strongest words which he can find in the writings of this father, in support of transubstantiation; and they are not stronger than what may be heard on every sacramental occasion, in the Church of Scotland, by pious ministers, who use the figurative language of scripture, under a full conviction that their hearers know the meaning of it, and that by eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ, no more is understood than believing in him as he is exhibited in the Lord's supper. I am not sure but worthy men on such occasions make too liberal a use of the figurative style, when language free from metaphor would suit their hearers better; but it would be unjust to accuse them of favouring transubstantiation; and yet upon no stronger ground does the Vindicator claim Origen as a teacher of that monstrous absurdity.

The reader is requested to turn to my 57th Number, in which he will find the words of St Augustine, one of the greatest of the ancient fathers, who speaks more like a Protestant on this subject than Luther himself. I gave several other great names, including a Pope, and even the incomparable Duns Scotus, as witnesses of the fact, that transubstantiation was not always believed in the Church of Rome; to all which the Vindicator opposes nothing but his own word. "I see," says he, "he (The Protestant) has further committed himself with St Augustine, Pope Gelasius, &c. To enter into a refutation of these fabrications is useless; I have clearly convicted him in my last of having recourse to his old tricks of forgery, and as he stands a guilty fabricator, no credit can henceforth be given to his assertions." Col. 758. The reader is able to judge what his convictions of fabrication are like; and will no doubt perceive the trick which the Vindicator here plays off; that is, to make it appear that the reader had nothing before him but assertions of mine; whereas I gave the testimony of Augustine and others in their own words. He calls these words fabrications, and he says to enter into a refutation of them is useless; but he takes care not to give the words themselves; for as Augustine's works are well known, he would have been in danger of having his own falsehood detected.

I have given all the particular exceptions which the Vindicator makes against the testimonies which I adduced as to the matter of fact, that the ancient fathers were ignorant of transubstantiation: and it is only as witnesses to a matter of fact that I adduce their testimony. In their opinions the ancient fathers were as liable to err as any modern teacher can be, and they were often mistaken. I would not therefore receive any doctrine that they taught, unless I found it in the word of God, and then I would believe it independently of their teaching or testimony. As transubstantiation is not taught in the bible, I would reject it though it had been taught by all the saints and fathers since the days of the apostles; but it is satisfactory to be able to show that authorities which Papists themselves acknowledge, are against them.

The Vindicator proceeds to give, from a work by one Dr Thomas Bailey, what he calls a chain of evidence, conclusive in favour of transubstantiation. This consists in a great number of scraps of sentences, and parts of sentences, from a host of writers in different ages, most of them nonsensical enough, but whether genuine or not, he does not know; as he takes them on the word of the said Dr Bailey, who, it seems, had been a Protestant, but became a convert to Popery, during the civil wars, in the time of Charles I. By this time, every Popish writer was bound to read and copy the fathers, according to the rules of the Index Expurgatorius, so that there can be no dependence on the genuineness of a single sentence. Though the Vindicator cannot but know this, he does not acknowledge it; and his concealment of it from his readers, most of whom know nothing of the matter, gives us reason to suspect, that he is not very careful whether or not the thing asserted be true, if he can only make it be believed. I pass over all his chain of evidence, as he calls it, as of no value whatever; and thus I get to the conclusion of my answer to the Vindicator, which has been by far the most irksome part of my work, not from any difficulty in it, but from a consciousness of degradation in being obliged to contend with an adversary who despises equally truth in his statements, and decency in his language.

I think I have fully replied to every thing in the Vindicator that relates to Christian doctrine and worship. Of his cavils and calumnies of a private and personal nature, I have given only a few specimens, sufficient, I think, to show the character of his work, and the manner in which Popery is defended; and I do not choose to load my pages with any more of such matter.

No. CLXVIII.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 29TH, 1827.

HAVING finished my reply to the Catholic Vindicator, I allude to him now merely for the purpose of introducing another topic. He finds me guilty of asserting that I had not made one real contradiction, or written a sentence which I would wish to alter, were it to be written again; in which, as usual, he misquotes my words, and misrepresents my meaning; for what I said was, that he had not detected one real contradiction, or pointed out a sentence which I would wish to alter. In order to try whether he knew what a contradiction was, I made one on purpose, and told him the very page on which it stood; but, so far as appears, he was never able to find it out: and I certainly did write some sentences, which I would wish to alter, though he did not point them out. These will be found on page 30; in which I admitted that the civil disabilities, under which Papists lie, are persecution on account of religion. This notion prevails very generally among persons who have not closely studied the subject, as was the case with me when I wrote the above passage; but it was not long till I perceived my mistake; and I know I am not the only individual who, upon a careful study of the subject, has seen cause to change his mind.

Persecution on account of religion, is to prevent men from worshipping God according to the light of their own consciences, or to punish them for so doing; it being understood that such worship is harmless in the sight of men; for if it were in any manner hurtful to fellow-creatures, the restraining of it would not be persecution, but a lawful exercise of magisterial authority. Now, I do not find that there is any law extant, or practice authorised in this empire, either for preventing Popish worship, or punishing Papists on account of their worship, however absurd and idolatrous it may be. There are, indeed, certain places of power and trust, to which Papists are declared inadmissible; but this is not on account of their religion, or their worship; but solely on account of their sworn subjection to a foreign power, namely, the Pope of Rome, who is the declared enemy of all Protestant churches, and, of course, of all kingdoms in which the Protestant religion is established. His determined hostility against all such as maintain the Protestant religion, has often been published to the world, and has never been disavowed by him; it remains, therefore, to this day in full force; and those in Britain and Ireland who are his subjects, have no more right to complain of exclusion from political power, than the subjects of the Grand Turk have. Nay, supposing a colony of sober Turks to settle among us, I would contemplate less danger from them, than from Papists; I would rather see them admitted into Parliament, than Papists; for their Prophet never claimed sovereignty over this country, which the Pope did claim, and exercise too, in the most rigorous manner. He has never yet relinquished that claim; and his sworn subjects will feel themselves bound to urge it, and to bring the kingdom again under his galling yoke, whenever they are able. The exclusion, therefore, of Papists from political power, is not persecution on account of their religion, but a necessary precaution occasioned by their own obstinate adherence to a foreign and a hostile power.

I grant, that, from the revolution in 1688, down to the reign of King George III. Papists did suffer many privations and hardships, that had very much the appearance of persecution on account of their religion, though really occasioned by their known hostility to the established government. As Papists, I acknowledge, they were proscribed, and many severe laws were made to prevent the growth of Popery; but this was not because Popery, in a religious view, was erroneous; but because it was inseparably connected with hostility to the established government, and because Papists identified themselves with the enemies of the reigning family. At this very day Papists suffer some disqualifications, from which they might be relieved, if they would make the declaration against transubstantiation, and the worship of saints and images; not that saint-worship and transubstantiation are crimes in the eye of the law; they are merely the tests by which the administrators of the law distinguish the subjects of the Pope, from the subjects of King George. It was not because the Ephraimites could not say Shibboleth, that the men of Gilead slew them at the fords of Jordan, (Judges xii. 6.) but because their sibilant infirmity ascertained them to be the people with whom Gilead was at war: and so it is, that adherence to transubstantiation and saint-worship, ascertains Papists to be the subjects of the Pope, and the enemies of Protestants. Absurd and impious as transubstantiation is, there is no civil penalty attached to the belief of it, nor do I say there ought to be. Idolatrous as is the worship of the Virgin Mary and other saints, there is no civil penalty attached to it; and I do not say there ought to be, unless it occasion a breach of the peace, by setting up images in the streets; but when the believers and practisers of these impieties declare themselves, as they do by the fact, to be under the spiritual dominion of the Pope of Rome, the determined enemy of every Protestant government, it is doing them no injustice to say, "You shall not bear rule in our Protestant state, in which you are more than half alien. You are bound by the most solemn ties, even as you regard the salvation of your souls, to promote the interests of the See of Rome. We know that See to be the enemy of this state. You cannot serve both. You have made your choice of Rome. You must have no power over us."

I know perfectly well that there is no way of evading this argument, but by denying that the Pope has any temporal jurisdiction over Papists in this kingdom. Now, this is what no man has a right to deny; for Papists admit his spiritual jurisdiction in all its possible extent; and this necessarily implies the temporal, whenever the good of the soul shall demand the submission of the body. Besides, the Pope has, oftener than once, in the face of the whole world, claimed a temporal jurisdiction over this kingdom, and every soul in it. He has never withdrawn this claim; nor was he ever known to relinquish a claim which he had once made. His claim, therefore, of temporal, as well as spiritual jurisdiction, over Britain and Ireland, is not extinct, but merely dormant. It will revive on the first favourable opportunity; and whenever he hears of a few of his dear children being in Parliament, he will bestir himself, and set all his machinery in motion, in order to effect the repeal of every remaining statute that was enacted to maintain the Protestant ascendency; and he will leave no stone unturned, to procure the re-establishment of Popery in all its strength, along with the restoration of the church and abbey lands, and the estates forfeited in successive Popish rebellions, to the descendants of their former owners. I know this will be scouted at as chimerical. But why so? Every argument that is supposed to prove that a Papist may be safely in Parliament, will equally prove that a Papist may safely be on the throne; and no man can consistently vote for an alteration of the law in the one case, who would not vote for an alteration in the other case; and supposing such a change to happen, all the rest would follow as a thing of course. I have no fear of such a change happening in my time, because the mystery of iniquity, powerful as it is, cannot work upon a great scale, but by slow degrees: but let Papists into Parliament, and the Council, and the Cabinet, and the operation of the system will soon be manifest.

Without further arguing upon the subject, I shall proceed to show what concessions were made to the Papists in Ireland during the late reign; and how such concessions were found not to satisfy or conciliate them, but only to increase their discontent, and make them rise in their demands. For a concise view of this subject, I am indebted to a book printed at Cork, in 1816, entitled, "The true state of the question; Whether admissibility of Romanists to the higher offices of the State, by themselves termed 'Catholic Emancipation,' be compatible with the principles of the British Constitution? By Joseph Spearing, Jun." I would strongly recommend this work to all who wish for information on a subject of vital importance to the whole empire. Mr Spearing is a man of facts, rather than of theory; and I am the more particular in recommending his volume, because it is little known, at least in this part of the empire. It is sold by Archer in Dublin, and in London, by Longman & Co.

In the reign of King William it was found necessary to restrain the Papists by several Acts, which would now be reckoned extremely severe, but which were evidently called for by the exigencies of the times. "All grants of forfeited estates were made subject to the condition, that they should be planted with Protestants; and all those concerned in the rebellion were attainted, except those who were included in any articles of agreement, or had been pardoned. An Act to restrain foreign education was also passed. By a clause in this Act, no Papist was allowed to teach a school publicly, or in private houses, except children of the family. Penalty £20, and three months imprisonment."

"In 1697, the three following Acts were passed: 'An Act to prevent Protestants from intermarrying with Papists:' 'An Act for banishing all Papists exercising any ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and all regulars of the Popish clergy out of the kingdom:' And 'An Act for the confirmation of articles made at the surrender of the city of Limerick.'" See True State of the Question, &c. pp. 197, 198. The same year another Act was passed against the authority of the Bishop of Rome, in which it was enacted, That whoever should ascribe any manner of jurisdiction, authority, or pre-eminence, to the See of Rome, within this kingdom, should incur the pains of a premunire. "In 1690, an Act was passed to prevent Papists from being solicitors." And in 1703, in the reign of Queen Anne, an Act was passed to prevent the farther growth of Popery, which contained some very severe clauses: for instance, the Papist who should pervert a Protestant, and the Protestant so perverted, both incurred a premunire. Papists were disabled from purchasing lands, &c. &c. In short, for more than half a century after the revolution, Papists were held as a sort of outlaws; and their conduct during this period was the very reverse of that of persons wishing to stand upon good terms with their superiors. They were incessantly plotting against the peace of the kingdom, and the authority of the reigning prince; and the Pope, as usual, was blowing the coal, by sending bulls from Rome, promising indulgences, and the pardon of all their sins, to those who should be in any way instrumental in dethroning King George, and bring in the Pretender. Their disaffection for the reigning family was visibly connected with their being Papists; and therefore, it was not surprising that they should have been held as a proscribed race, who would keep no terms with the existing authorities, and who, of course, could not be treated as good subjects.

Some time after the accession of George the Third, it was found that the cause of the Pretender was so extremely low and desperate, that the most sanguine Romanist could have no hope of his being able to supplant the house of Hanover; and as the plotting on his behalf began to cease, the jealousy of men in power against Papists began to decline. In 1778, an Act was passed, by which, on certain conditions, they were empowered to take leases for 999 years, or five lives; and lands were made devisable, transferable, and descendable, to, or from them. The penal Acts were repealed, respecting the hearing and celebrating mass, and several other restrictions removed. In 1782, Romanists were, by another Act, relieved from all restrictions respecting property, and most of the restraints on them were removed. True State, &c. pp. 220, 221.

In the year 1792, "An Act was passed granting Romanists, that after the 24th of June, 1792, they may practise as barristers and attorneys; that they and Protestants may intermarry; that Popish schoolmasters need not obtain licenses from the ordinary to keep school, and all restrictions as to foreign education were removed." Ibid. 222. It was now that Papists had received in part, and were about to receive more fully, the privileges of British subjects, that they began to manifest their dissatisfaction with any concession that did not go the length of surrendering the kingdom itself to them. This appears by the speech of their own advocate, in the House of Commons, Sir Hercules Langrishe, who made the following very remarkable disclosure :— "Notwithstanding my prepossessions in favour of the Roman Catholics, I was checked for some time in my ardour to serve them, by reading, of late, a multitude of publications, and paragraphs in the newspapers, and other public prints, circulated gratis, with the utmost industry, purporting to convey the sentiments of the Catholics. What was their import ? They were exhortations to the people never to be satisfied with any concession, until the state itself was conceded !—they were precautions against public tranquillity ;—they were invitations to disorder, and covenants of discontent ; —they were ostentations of strength, rather than solicitations for favour,—rather appeals to the power of the people, than applications to the authority of the state ;—they involved the relief of the Catholic, with the revolution of the government ;—and were dissertations for democracy, rather than arguments for toleration." Ibid. 223.

In 1793, the Romanists were granted the elective franchise ; eligibility to be justices of the peace, grand jurors, and officers in the army and navy ; liberty to endow a college and schools; liberty to carry arms, to those possessing a certain degree of property ; and the right of challenge against a Romanist was taken away, in causes where a Protestant and Romanist are the parties. These, with the former grants, leave them now under no exclusions but the following : "the Parliament, the Privy Council, and the Offices of Viceroy, Lord Chancellor, Master of the Rolls, Judges, Judges of the Court of Admiralty, Secretary of State, Lord Privy Seal, Vice Treasurer, Deputy Vice Treasurer, Teller and Cashier of the Exchequer, Auditor General, Lieutenant, or Governor, or Custos Rotulorum of Counties, Secretary to the Viceroy, Sergeants at Law, Attorney General, Solicitor General, King's Council, Masters in Chancery, Provost or Fellow of Trinity College, Postmaster General, Master or Lieutenant General of the Ordnance, Commander in Chief of the Forces, General on the Staff, Sheriff or Sub-Sheriff of any County ; and from holding any office of trust that can be established by the Lord Lieutenant and Council, under the seventeenth and eighteenth of Charles the Second. They are also excluded from the office of Mayors, Sheriffs, Recorders, Aldermen, Common Council Men., &c. in Cities ; and from the office of High and Sub-Sheriffs of Counties." Ibid.

Here there seems a vast number of offices from which Papists are excluded ; but so are also dissenters of every name, especially in England, unless they shall qualify themselves according to law ; and they have much more reason to complain than Papists, seeing they are not in subjection to any foreign power, as Papists are ; yet we seldom hear of dissenters complaining of their exclusion ; at least they do not, like Papists, annoy the country, and embarrass the government with their clamour and their threats. We do not hear them magnifying their numbers and importance, and making the peace of the kingdom depend on their being unconditionally admissible to places of power. This is what Papists are always doing ; and yet there are few of the places from which they are excluded, which, as Papists, they could fill in a Protestant country, without annoying Protestants, or violating their allegiance to the Pope. Some of the places are connected with extensive patronage in the Established Church, and the Universities. They will not allow the king a negative in the nomination of their bishops ; and yet they claim a right to such places and offices about the king as would give them the nomination of all the Protestant bishops, and perhaps one-tenth of the inferior clergy in England, and one-fifth of the ministers in the Church of Scotland. The king cannot be personally acquainted with one in a thousand of those whom he appoints to the most important offices in the church ; he must therefore of necessity be guided by the recommendation of his confidential servants ; and as their personal knowledge of individuals must be very limited, within the range of a great empire, they must be guided by the recommendation of inferior functionaries, such as lieutenants, and vice-lieutenants, sheriffs and sub-sheriffs of counties, mayors and magistrates of cities, &c., many of whom are also patrons of parishes, in virtue of their offices. Now, what would a Papist do, if it fell to be his duty to recommend or appoint a successor to Cranmer in the see of Canterbury, or to John Knox in the church of Edinburgh ? He could not recommend a heretic, to teach and defend heresy, for this is absolutely inconsistent with the obligation which he is under, to do every thing in his power to extirpate heresy, and promote the interest of his mother church. What then would he do ? He would consult his confessor, who would have a list of Jesuits duly assorted, and fit for all places in both church and state ; both able and willing to conform to reformed episcopacy, or more heritical presbytery, for the laudable purpose of insinuating doctrines that would gradually overturn both, and establish Popery in their stead.

In short, Popish functionaries in a Protestant country, with church patronage, would incur the damnation of their souls, according to their avowed principles, if they were not to do something like what I have supposed, in order to put down the great schism, which they call the reformation, and restore the Church of Rome to her former power and glory. Every Papist most firmly believes that the Church of Rome is the only true church; that she is destined to recover her lost dominion, wherever it has been lost; and that she shall stand till the end of time; and, besides the obligation which he feels upon his conscience, he believes that it is so highly meritorious to promote Popery, and suppress heresy, that he will receive an eternal reward for what he may be able to do in so good a cause. These things are undeniable; and to admit persons professing such principles, and actuated by such motives, into places of power in a Protestant kingdom, with an established Protestant religion, would indicate such a degree of infatuation, that I should think it could not be seriously proposed by any man who had been at due pains to make himself acquainted with the system.

But I shall be told, that it is unjust to deprive men of their natural rights; and that they ought to enjoy these, whatever may be the consequence. But what are our natural rights? Liberty of worshipping God in such a way as we conscientiously believe to be pleasing to him, is a natural right, of which no power on earth can justly deprive us, while we do not injure, or disturb the peace of our neighbours: but nothing can be the natural right of one man, which is not as much the natural right of every man. Now it is not the natural right of every man to be a member of parliament, or a minister of state; and therefore it is not the natural right of any man. Neither is it the natural right of every man, or of any man to be eligible to such places, for that must depend upon certain qualifications which every man does not possess, and of which, men who do possess them, may deprive themselves, as every Papist does by his acknowledged allegiance to a foreign, and, to Protestants, a hostile power. Rights of this kind are entirely conventional. They are to be enjoyed and exercised for the good of the community; and every community has a right to exclude from places of power those who are incapable, either from want of talents, or from holding principles incompatible with the public good.

The privileges which the Act of 1793 extended to Papists, seem to have been all which they themselves, at that time, contemplated; and while they were yet the subject of petition and expectation, it was confidently maintained, that if these things were conceded, the concession would be considered as complete emancipation; it would produce perfect contentment, and ensure the most flourishing state of peace, happiness, and prosperity in Ireland. Father O'Leary, their most popular writer at that time, thus expresses himself:—"This happy system of toleration could be introduced, by excluding in this kingdom, the Catholics from any high offices under the crown; secondly, from the privilege of sitting in the senate; thirdly, if the use of arms gives any umbrage, from the privilege of carrying them, except to such as have a mind to serve their country in the army, or such persons as are possessed of real or personal estate, amounting to whatever value the legislature may think fit; all other laws heretofore enacted to be null and void. The kingdom would soon flourish; and the brilliant example set to such princes as have not yet thrown open the gates of toleration, would rescue mankind from the heavy yoke which misconstrued religion has laid on their necks." "Thus," says Mr Spearing, "one of their own priests, previous to the grant of these privileges, held them out as the most desirable boon, and viewed them as complete emancipation," p. 224.

Yes: but after these privileges were granted to them, and after they had the most complete toleration, they found out, and they complained to their holy father the Pope, that they were still suffering the most sanguinary and unrelenting persecution that ever aggrieved a Christian people. See PROT. page 352. This they declare to be their present condition; which verifies what Mr Leslie Foster said in the House of Commons, when the question was discussed in 1811: "Hardly were the political concessions granted, until Ireland was in a flame from end to end, and one continued month of peace and security it has never known from that hour to the present." And those of Lord Redesdale in the House of Lords the same year: "The tone of the Catholics now was very different from what it had been at the commencement of the concessions to them, which were received in the spirit of amity and good will; but the moment they gained a standing place, they assumed the language of menace and intimidation." Ibid. pp. 292, 297.

CLXIX.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 6TH, 1821.

IN my last Number, I gave an account of the relief granted at different times, during the late reign, to the Papists in Ireland, and of the disabilities to which they are still subject. I showed that the privileges which they obtained by the Act of 1793, were considered by themselves at the time as complete emancipation, seeing that, by that and former Acts, every restriction with regard to liberty of worship, and the education of their children, was removed; and that their present disability is only exclusion from certain offices of power and trust, which they could not possibly hold consistently with their allegiance to the Pope, without doing every thing in their power to subvert our Protestant establishment. Nay, by the Act of 1793, political power was actually conferred upon them; for it gave them the right of voting for members of parliament; and, to use the language of Lord Redesdale, "the moment they gained this standing place, they assumed the language of menace and intimidation." Having obtained from a Protestant legislature more than they at first expected, they began to aspire to still greater things; and now they regard all that has been conceded to them as nothing; they are still demanding "emancipation," which implies that they are still in bondage; and nothing less will satisfy them now, than the surrender of the kingdom to them. According to their known principles, they must be in bondage while heretics, or a single heretic, shall bear rule over them; and they will never consider themselves "emancipated," till they get the government into their own hands, and till they have accomplished the reconciliation of the kingdom to the See of Rome. This is their object; and I challenge them to deny it, if they can.

And upon the supposition that they really believe their own doctrine, it must appear to them a very proper and laudable object. I suppose if I were a Papist, I would think it so; and all Papists must think it so, else their minds are differently constituted from those of other men. They believe that Jesus Christ gave to St Peter, and through him, to his successor the Pope of Rome, sovereignty over the whole Christian world, including Great Britain and Ireland; and that for supporting Romish Christianity with becoming splendour, their pious ancestors appropriated immense wealth, including thousands of acres of the best land in the kingdom: and built a great number of magnificent edifices, which remain to this day in the hands of heretics. They believe that by an act, or series of acts, of unparalleled wickedness, the king of England threw off his allegiance to the Pope, abandoned the true church, and drew away most of the people with him, as Satan in his apostacy drew away many of the angels from heaven; that, in the most sacrilegious manner, he plundered the holy church of all her wealth, which he bestowed, partly on his courtiers, and partly on a church of his own creation, of which he declared himself the head. I do not say that this is in all respects a correct view of the matter, but it is the view which Papists have of it. A Papist plumes himself on his having remained unshaken in his allegiance to the holy See. On this account he feels himself superior to Protestants, whom he looks upon as heretics and schismatics, and, what is perhaps worst of all, vicious intromitters with the property of his church; in short, as unjustly holding possession of that which belongs not to them, but to his holy mother. He naturally, and, according to his own principles, justly desires the restoration of this property to the right owner, which implies the restoration of the Church of Rome to all her former splendour and power: and he feels himself imperiously called upon to use every means to bring about this happy restoration.

Besides, there was a great deal of property forfeited by Papists in successive rebellions, especially in Ireland, from the time of Queen Elizabeth, down to that of King William. These rebellions were encouraged by the Pope, with a view to the restoration of Popery; and property that was forfeited in consequence of obedience to the Pope, in defence of the true religion, must be considered by Papists as having been unjustly wrested out of the hands of the lawful proprietors. I suppose one-half of the land in Ireland is in this predicament. The present possessors hold it in virtue of purchase, or of inheritance from those to whom Queen Elizabeth, and subsequent sovereigns, gave it, on the attainder of the ancient proprietors; but upon the principles which every Papist holds to be infallible, all these forfeitures were unjust. The property belongs to the lawful heirs and lineal descendants of the ancient proprietors. When Popery shall be re-established, every man will get his own; and it is as a step towards this, that Papists are so anxious to get into Parliament, where they will occupy a higher standing ground; and where, by combination and perseverance, they will ultimately carry their point. There are many poor persons in Ireland, who have the record of their lineage distinctly preserved, who publicly claim to be the heirs of certain estates, who have never relinquished the hope that the property will be restored to them or to their descendants. In order to preserve the knowledge of it, it has been the practice of fathers from age to age, as I have been informed, to lead their children round the boundaries of the lands which they claim as theirs. All this is done in the hope, that one day these lands will revert to the right owners.

Nay, Lord Viscount Carleton, in a speech quoted by Mr Spearing, page 265, tells us, that, "Not many years ago, maps of the Irish forfeited estates were industriously circulated on the continent, an indication that some important object was looked at for attainment; and that it was desirable to conciliate foreign Catholic potentates, with a view to the success of that project. Since the Union, it has been openly avowed, that the Revolution was an usurpation; the exclusion of Roman Catholics from seats in Parliament, an excess of the power of the legislature; that the old Roman Catholic proprietors had never offended; that the confiscations were unjust; and that the present possessors hold by usurpation, and ought to be dispossessed."

What is thus distinctly avowed, is no more than what is naturally to be expected. Papists must desire the restoration of the ancient order and state of things; believing as they do in the divinity of their religion, they confidently expect such restoration; and what men desire and expect, they will most certainly endeavour to accomplish. Give them the power of doing it, and it shall be done. I say, Papists would do this, because it is natural and reasonable; it is what every man feels he would do, if he were in their circumstances, and believing as they believe.

Nothing can be more natural than that Papists should desire the re-establishment of their religion, and the restoration of what they consider their property; and that they should aspire to places of power, in order to enable them to effect these objects; but that Protestants should labour to help them to it, is beyond measure astonishing. But such is the fact. There is scarcely a company of half a dozen individuals, into which one can enter, in which advocates of what is called "Catholic emancipation," will not be found. Nay, there are Protestants, and Presbyterians too, who go the length of maintaining, that if it be proper to have an established religion, that of Ireland ought to be Popery, seeing Papists are the majority. Upon the same principle it is proper that Mahometanism should be the established religion in Turkey, Arabia, and Persia. And, by all means, be it so, if the government and people in those countries choose to have it so. The powers of Christendom have no right to hinder them, or to force Christianity upon them: but for Christians to argue that it is proper and right to establish error, delusion, and idolatry, because the majority of the people are deluded idolaters, would be somewhat strange. Not more strange, however, than for Protestants to argue for the establishment of Popery, where the subjects of that delusion happen to be the majority. Putting the question in the above hypothetic form, I would say, if it be proper to have an established religion in any country, it ought to be the true religion; in which, I am sure, all Papists will agree with me, whether all Protestants will or not. As Christians and Protestants, we have nothing to do with Popery, or any other false religion, but to endeavour to win men from it by instruction and persuasion. To establish error of any kind, is to throw an obstruction in the way of those who would perform this Christian duty. It is to put a weapon into the hands of the enemies of the truth, with which they will destroy its friends; and to establish Popery in Ireland, would be at once to extinguish the light that has begun to rise upon it; for it is a fact, confirmed by the experience of ages, that where Papists have power, they will persecute to death those who presume to teach genuine Christianity.

There are, however, few Protestants who contemplate the possibility of Popery becoming again the established religion in any part of the British Isles; and, perhaps, fewer who think it ought to be so. Most of the advocates of "emancipation" mean by the term, no more than admissibility into places of power; and judging from their own indifference about the ascendancy of one church more than another, or their consciousness that they would not make use of power, if they had it, to enforce conformity to the principles of their own sect, they charitably conclude that Papists would be equally indulgent to those who did not choose to conform to Popery, and equally indifferent about the re-establishment of it. But all this is contradicted by the avowed principles of Papists, and by every historical fact, for a thousand years, that bears any relation to the subject. Suppose a Papist in Parliament, or in the Privy Council, and disposed to act as liberally as a Protestant, and to refuse to lend himself to promote the designs of his sect, his priest would soon teach him better manners. The salvation of his soul depends upon his keeping on good terms with his confessor, who has power, as he believes, to absolve, or not absolve him, from his sins; and this absolution is usually granted upon condition that the penitent shall undergo some penance, or perform some good work; and of all the good works that can be thought of by a Papist, there is none more meritorious than the extirpation of heresy, that is, the Protestant religion, and the establishment of Popery in its place. If a Papist has really imbibed the spirit of his religion, the work will appear to himself in this meritorious light, and he will feel it to be his most imperious duty; and if he has not this as the result of his own conviction, his confessor will soon make him both feel and act as he ought to do for the sake of his holy church. No wise man would take into his confidential service, or intrust the charge of his affairs with a known dependent, and sworn vassal of an enemy and a rival; but every Papist, living in a Protestant state, is a vassal and a dependent of a rival and a hostile master, and of course cannot be safely intrusted with power over Protestants, or with the confidential management of their affairs.

I have laid it down as a thing most certain, that by "emancipation," which Papists demand with so much clamour, they mean, ultimately, nothing less than the restoration of the church, and other forfeited property, as well as the establishment of their religion. Well, I suppose there are Protestants so remarkably, and so romantically generous, that they would concede even this to them. I do not recollect having ever heard, or read of this being proposed in so many words; but I have heard doctrines advanced that would naturally lead to it. It is admitted that the tithes and church lands did once belong to Papists; and that many great estates, now in the hands of Protestants, were transferred from Papists, in consequence of what we call their rebellion, but what they call their loyalty and their religion : and if the Church of Rome, and her adherents, were unjustly deprived of this property, why ought it not to be restored ? Is not restitution a Christian duty ? Yes ; but there is an if in the matter ; and if they were not unjustly deprived of that property, it would be great injustice now to take it from those whose ancestors paid a price for it, or who received it as the reward of meritorious services.

I am not going to enter upon the subject of forfeitures and attainders, which are matters merely civil and political. My business is with Popery as a system of false religion, which incapacitates those who believe it from holding places of power and trust, among those who believe and profess the true religion, because it imperiously binds them to use whatever power they may possess to extirpate this. But I suppose all civilians are agreed, that rebellion against the sovereign power, as established by law, infers the forfeiture of the property, and even the life of the rebel. The property reverts to the sovereign, who may give it away, or sell it, as he pleases. There is no injustice in this ; for no subject ever held his property upon any other condition ; and the man who holds property without the condition of allegiance, is not a subject, but a sovereign. But I shall be told, perhaps, that Papists do not admit that the conduct of their ancestors was rebellion ; and I reply by asking, what rebel ever made such an admission ? If the opinion of rebels themselves, and of their approvers, be the rule by which we are to judge, there never was rebellion in the world, and never will be. If modern Papists shall seriously maintain that the conduct of their ancestors, by which they forfeited their estates, was not rebellion ; I shall think it fair to retort, that they hold it lawful to do as their ancestors did ; and that, if Protestants be wise, they will beware of them.

What was called church property, was equally subject to civil allegiance ; for those who gave it to the church, could not convey it more unconditionally than they themselves received it. The Church of Rome, as such, never owned allegiance to the Protestant sovereign of Britain ; and, of course, cannot lawfully hold property ; and if she had done so, it would long ago have been forfeited by the rebellions excited by her head, which must be understood to have had the consent of the members. In point of fact, however, the church property was not in general confiscated, except in Scotland, where, perhaps, plundered would be the better word. In England and Ireland it was appropriated for the support of the purer system of the Reformation, and so it continues to this day. I have made these few remarks, in order to show, that in a religious and moral point of view, there is no injustice done to Papists by their exclusion from places of power, or in refusing to restore to them the property which their ancestors forfeited ; for if it could be shown that there was injustice in the case, I would abandon the defence of it, being convinced that what is morally wrong, cannot be politically right.

It will perhaps be said that I have assumed a great deal about the devotion of Papists to the See of Rome, and their hostility to our Protestant government. I have done so, because evidence upon the point is so abundant and so accessible, that any man who chooses may satisfy himself on the subject. Till of late, indeed, this evidence had to be sought for in books which were not in every library ; but the Reverend Mr Graham in his Annals of Ireland, commencing in 1535, and coming down to the period of the Revolution, and Mr Spearing in his Work, which comes down to the present day, furnish such a compendium, with reference to such unquestionable authorities, that any man may, in a few hours, obtain such a view of the subject, as will make him dread the admission into places of power over him, persons who really are not their own masters, but the bond slaves of a spiritual power that is bent on the overthrow of the Protestant religion, and the destruction of its active defenders.

With a few extracts from the last mentioned work, I shall conclude the present Number. I have selected a few facts of recent occurrence, not of ancient date, in order to show that the hostility of Papists against Protestants is as determined and bloody as ever it was. The following are given on the authority of Sir Richard Musgrave, who wrote a history of the last Irish rebellion :—

" James Beagham, executed on Vinegar Hill, the 24th of June, 1799, for various murders, which, he said, he was instigated by Popish priests to commit, confessed, that every man that was a Protestant was called an Orangeman, and every one was to be killed, from the poorest man in the country. They thought it no more sin to kill a Protestant than a dog." " It appears, on the evidence of different persons, that one hundred and eighty-four Protestants were burnt in the barn of Scullabogne, where they had been collected for the purpose, and that thirty-seven were shot at the front of it." " Ninety-seven Protestants were put to death on the bridge of Wexford in the following manner :—Two rebels pushed their pikes into the breast of the victim, and two into his back ; and, in that state, writhing with torture, they held him suspended, until dead, and then threw him over the bridge into the water." " One of the favourite toasts at the convivial meetings of the rebels, was, 'A total extirpation of the Protestants.' " " It was often asserted in the committees, that a person would ensure salvation by killing a certain number of Protestants :"—" That a Roman Catholic would certainly go to heaven, if he killed three Protestants." p. 238, 239.

I expect to be censured by some of our very liberal Protestants for bringing these horrible facts to their view; and yet they are only a specimen of what Sir Richard Musgrave has given upon authority, to which it is impossible to refuse to give credence, and which, so far as I know, has never been contradicted. The following is from Jackson's narrative:—

"The extinction of the Protestant religion was the favourite idea of the great mass of the rebels, and their strongest motive to action. In the town of Wexford, Protestant men and women were obliged to recant; and, with their children, were required to be baptized in the Catholic chapel, after the Roman Catholic manner, and to attend mass. Even the protection granted by the priests to the Protestant men and women, after they had been thus baptized, was, 'Protect, in the name of Jesus Christ, A. B. he or she having been made a Christian, and a member of the Catholic church.' (Signed by the priest.)"

At the battle of Three Rocks, before the town of Wexford was taken by the rebels, a priest, of the name of Murphy, marched at their head, telling them to follow him, and not to fear; for if they took up the dust from the roads, and threw it at the king's troops, they would fall dead before them. The rebel camps were constantly attended by numbers of priests, saying mass every day, and pretending to give charms which would prevent the balls of the soldiers from injuring them." "That no compunction might arise in their breasts, on account of the murders they were daily committing, their priests assured them it was ordained by God, and that it had been prophesied there should be but one religion, and that was to be the Roman Catholic; so that in destroying the Protestants, they were performing a duty to heaven." p. 240.

In the Report of the Secret Committee of the House of Lords, we have the following singular disclosure:—From the information, on oath before four magistrates, of Richard Granby, farmer, 23d of June, 1798, who had escaped from the rebels;—"Saith, that he attended mass, celebrated by Edward Murphy, parish priest of Bannow; that, after mass, he heard said Murphy preach a sermon, in which he said, 'Brethren, you see you are victorious every where,—that the balls of the heretics fly about you, without hurting you,—that few of you have fallen, whilst thousands of the heretics are dead; and that the few who have fallen, was from deviating from our cause, and from want of faith; that this visibly is the work of God, who is now determined, that the heretics, who have reigned upwards of a hundred years, should be now extirpated, and the true Catholic religion established.' And deponent saith, that this sermon was preached after the battle of Ross; and saith, that he has heard several sermons preached by the priest to the same effect; and farther saith, that he has heard several of the rebels, who had been at the battle of Enniscorthy, and elsewhere, declare, that Edward Roche, the priest, did constantly catch the bullets that came from his Majesty's army in his hand, and give them to the rebels to load their guns with. Deponent farther saith, that any Protestant who was admitted into the rebel army, was first baptized by a Roman Catholic priest: and that every Protestant who refused to be baptized, was put to death; and that many, to save their lives, suffered themselves to be baptized." p. 249.

The reader is requested to remember, that this is not a narrative of what took place hundreds of years since. It happened little more than twenty years ago, soon after Papists had obtained what they had formerly considered complete emancipation; and, if I am not misinformed, there are Papists at this day in Glasgow, who know the truth of these things, not from mere report, but from their own personal acquaintance with them. Surely these facts ought to convince every one of the bloody hostility which still exists with Papists, not only against the Protestant religion, but also against the persons of Protestants; and they assure us of what we may expect, whenever such enemies shall obtain power over us.

No. CLXX.

SATURDAY, October 13th, 1821.

A few days ago I had a call from a venerable old man, who addressed me to the following effect:—"You ought to tell the Papists, that, seeing they are the only Christians, and are sure of going to heaven; and that, as we are heretics and must go to hell, they ought to be content with the kingdom of heaven; and leave us unmolested to manage the affairs of this world, which, they say, is all our portion." Having "dropt this word," my visitor immediately took leave, and left me to ruminate on what I had heard. His words have often recurred to my mind, and the more I think of them, the more force I perceive in the sentiment which they express.

Papists are incessantly boasting that they hold the very religion which the apostles taught; that their doctrines are in every iota the very same that were held by the Christians in Rome, when Paul wrote to them, that he thanked God on their behalf, and that their faith was spoken of throughout the whole world. I have just been reading Bishop Milner's great work, "The End of Religious Controversy;" the Alpha and Omega of which seems to be what I have here stated; namely, that the Church of Rome is in every respect such a church as the apostles planted; that Papists are just such Christians as were addressed by Paul in Rome, Ephesus, and Corinth; and that this would have been the case though the apostles and evangelists had not taken the trouble of writing a word about a Christian church, or Christianity itself. I must, however, do the Bishop the justice to say, that he does not in so many words deny the truth of what the apostles wrote, though he adduces many things from what he calls the "unwritten word of God," (tradition) not very consistent with that which has been written. But, in reference to the point in hand, I have not found, even in his work, a scripture, or even a traditionary example, of the primitive Christians demanding to be admitted into high offices in the state. We do not hear a clamour, or even a whisper of discontent among them because they were excluded from such offices; or because the heathen Romans kept the good things of this world to themselves, and managed the business of this world without calling Christians into their council. The fact is, the primitive Christians were satisfied with their heavenly inheritance, as my visitor says Papists ought to be, and which they would be, if they were like them. They were not desirous of great things in this world. If the civil government afforded them protection, and freedom of worship, it was all they desired; and whether they were favoured with these or not, they were taught to pray for kings and all in authority over them, that they might live quiet and peaceable lives, in all godliness and honesty.

We know that there were Christians even in the court of Nero, when Paul was a prisoner in Rome; (Phil. i. 13.) and seeing the providence of God had brought them there, or his grace had found them there, they would no doubt study to behave in every respect as became Christians; but we hear nothing of Christians aspiring to places at court, or in the senate, or clamouring about exclusion from the senate, being an infringement of their natural rights. If they had, we may be sure Paul would have addressed them in some such language as Jeremiah did his companion, Baruch, "Seekest thou great things for thyself? seek them not." After all, we have no evidence that Nero's Christian courtiers were men in power, like modern ministers of state, else they would surely have found means to release Paul from bondage, which would have been a very laudable "emancipation." I believe these courtiers were slaves themselves—men and women whose personal emancipation would have been a desirable boon; yet Christians, even in these circumstances, were instructed by this apostle so to prize and rejoice in their heavenly inheritance, as to make little account of their personal slavery. "Art thou called, being a servant, (the word is a slave,) care not for it; but if thou mayest be free, choose it rather."

The question is not about the lawfulness of masters having slaves; but since the state of society was such that servants were generally in that condition, it was the duty of Christian servants or slaves, to serve their masters faithfully and without repining. In like manner, the question is not, whether the Roman emperors acted wisely or lawfully in not taking Christians into the senate but seeing they were not admitted, at least for many ages, it was their duty as Christians to be content without civil power; and to be in subjection to lawful authority as much as if they had held places of authority themselves. And such was the case in point of fact. The inspired apostles enjoined subjection in the strongest manner; and it does not appear that they were disobeyed. Seditions were classed with other immoralities which rendered those who did them unfit for the kingdom of heaven; and had Paul heard of a seditious person in any church, or of one who disturbed the public peace by claiming to have a share in the government of the empire, he would have reproved that church as severely as he did that in Corinth for suffering an incestuous person among them.

Now, if our modern Papists were precisely of the same faith and character as the primitive Christians were, they would be equally peaceable, and contented with their religious privileges, especially as they enjoy protection and toleration, which the primitive Christians did not, and as they have the happiness of living under a government a thousand times more worthy of respect and obedience than was that of Rome in the time of Nero. If it shall be replied that the Romans were heathens, and that Christians could have little comfort in being associated with them in the government of the empire, I shall admit that it is true; though this is not the reason given for the duty of obedience; nor does it appear that it would have been the duty of Christians to decline being associated with heathens when they were lawfully called to serve their country along with them, though, having their inheritance and their hearts in heaven, they would not be desirous of honour or power in this world, much less would they be clamorous for it, or disposed to disturb the public peace if they did not obtain it.

But if the Romans were heathens, Protestants are heretics, which in the view of a Papist is much worse. The Pope does not excommunicate heathens, but heretics he does excommunicate every year, on holy Thursday. It must, therefore, not only be very uncomfortable for Papists to be associated with them in Parliament, or in the government of the kingdom, but it must be absolutely unlawful; for to have any voluntary, unnecessary communication with heretics, is to partake of their heresy. It is known, and ought not to be forgotten, that a dreadful sentence of excommunication and damnation lies particularly upon the throne of Britain, and upon all the states of Parliament. It was first pronounced against the throne in the person of Henry VIII. and repeated in those of Elizabeth and James I. As this sentence was never revoked, it remains to this day in as much force as ever. Now, I ask Papists, how could they hold places in a government that lies under such a curse? It is possible to be associated with heathens in any sort of public business, especially such liberal and tolerant heathens as most of the Romans were, without suffering inconvenience, or being conscious of contamination; but with heretics, who lie under the solemn curse of the most holy head of the Catholic Church, it is impossible to be so associated, without danger of incurring a part at least of the dreadful malediction; and, therefore, to return to the point from which I set out, Papists ought to be content with the kingdom of heaven, which, they say, is exclusively theirs, and leave the government of this worldly kingdom to those who have no portion or part in their inheritance. If they cannot be persuaded to act thus from choice, as the primitive Christians did, they should feel themselves compelled from necessity to do it. And, indeed, I am persuaded this would be their feeling on the subject, were it not that they expect, by getting into power, to supplant the heretics altogether; and they know well how to submit to a little inconvenience, or even do a little evil, for the sake of effecting a great good.

This, I know, is the very point they would be at; and they are not now at much pains to conceal it. They have now got such a broad "standing ground" in their legal privileges, and in the favour of nominal Protestants, that they can venture to speak plainly out, and tell what they want. Thus, on a late occasion, when it was proposed to lay open Parliament to them, and all places of power, with two or three exceptions, the proposers of the measure, in the childlike simplicity of their hearts, proposed something that they called securities; and they had not a doubt but that Papists would become bound not to do any thing that should tend, directly or indirectly, to injure, or affect the interests of the established church. Some leading laymen among them were, I believe, willing to come under this obligation; but the clergy instantly took the alarm. Meetings were held both in England and Ireland, and resolutions were published, in which it was explicitly declared that the securities were inadmissible; and one document in particular, which was signed by Vicar Apostolic Milner, plainly stated, that they could not become bound not to do any thing that should tend to the overthrow of the established religion, seeing that was the very end and tendency of all their preaching and writing. This was honest and honourable. It contained nothing new; for every person acquainted with Papists and their system, knew it before. But persons ignorant of these, did not know it, and would not believe it, till they had it from such high and unexceptionable authority; and there are some on whom my writing could make no impression, who were convinced in a moment, when they saw it under the hand of JOHN MILNER, D. D. F. A. S. V. A. M. D.

That Doctor Milner speaks the sentiments of Papists in general, is very evident, from the applause with which a speech by Dr Dromgoole was received by a great public meeting in Dublin, which speech the doctor afterwards published and defended. Speaking of the "oath for Catholic members of Parliament," he says, "it is nearly similar to the ordinary oath of allegiance; it is drawn up in the same cautious and suspicious manner—the clauses and observations are of the same insulting and calumnious kind. But both go to a solemn pledge to support, not the succession, but the PROTESTANT succession of the crown." This is what Papists cannot swear to; and it is considered "insulting" to propose it to them. "How gross," says he, "the ignorance that would propose such an oath unless it was meant to insult! and how absurd and persumptuous to suppose that it would be accepted! Are these the securities that are sought for the protection of the Protestant Church? If so, she cannot obtain them. She might, according to the penalties of that bill, see, indeed, the Catholic pastors driven from their flocks—she might see them subjected to obloquy, privation, and insult—she might see them transported as felons, and suffering as murderers;—but she would never see them so lost, so abandoned, as to take the oath which was proposed—an oath not to seek, directly or indirectly, the subversion of the Protestant church! Why, this would be to abuse the divine command, which says, 'Go, teach all nations.'" After describing what he considers the danger of the established church from dissenters, he adds, "the columns of catholicity are collecting, WHO CHALLENGE THE POSSESSION OF THE ARK, and unfurling the oriflamme, display its glorious motto—Εν τουτῳ νικα."

Yes: the possession of the ark is what they challenge;—that is, the established church and its immense property; for this purpose "the columns of catholicity are collecting;" that is, Papists are collecting their strength, and preparing to take by storm what they are not yet sure of getting by capitulation. This is pretty plainly intimated by the allusion to the fiery cross with its Greek motto. In his published defence of the speech, the orator tells us how much it was applauded by the meeting:—"It met," he says, "with the most complete concurrence. The speaker was frequently interrupted by applause; and the resolution was passed with marks of enthusiastic approbation. The whole assembly, the galleries and all the members of the board, with the exception of two or three individuals, rose up together; and with clapping of hands, waving of hats, and long continued cheering, gave the most unequivocal proofs of their entire satisfaction."

In another speech, the same orator addressed the board as follows: "My opinions, as I have given them, I would declare before the privy council or the bench of bishops. I desire no man to adopt them; and, in their rejection, for myself I shall feel nothing, but I shall feel a great deal for the character of the board. Recollect, gentlemen, that those are the opinions of a Catholic—that they are yours, if you be Catholic—and that they are notoriously the opinions of every well-informed Catholic on the face of the earth. I have ventured, in order to prevent an oath from being enacted, which could not, in its present form, be taken, to state one of the religious objections which we have to the Protestant Church. And because a few hired paupers have made a noise in the city, and a few ragged Orangemen, in Derry or Belfast, have come together in consequence, if such be the case, are you to make a solemn disavowal of your principles? And if you do, will you be believed? Is there a Protestant of any description, in any of these kingdoms, that does not know that you have objections to the religion of the state? And if you say the contrary, how can they believe you? Are you prepared, like slaves before their offended masters, to get upon your knees, and say, that indeed you meant no offence—that the Protestant Church is not in danger—that you have no objections to the tenets it holds—that you, for your part, do not think that it is novel, or that it will have an end? If you do this, you will be disgraced and laughed at—your fellow-catholics will be ashamed of you, and Protestants will hold you in contempt."

The doctor, in his vindication, says, "Let no man deceive himself. As long as the Catholic is oppressed, and conceives that his political degradation is to be referred to the Church of England—that it must co-exist with the duration of that church—so long he can have no alternative—he must unavoidably, and in spite of himself, desire to see that system changed or destroyed." Again—"This is not the only crime of which the writer has been guilty. He has dared to say, with an appearance of satisfaction, that the Church of England will fall; and that nothing but the memory of the mischiefs she has created will survive. Well, this is his belief, and the belief of every Catholic in the world." See Mr Spearing's work, pp. 383—388, where will be found much more to the same purpose.

In my last Number, I endeavoured to show, that in the very nature of the thing, it was to be supposed that Papists would desire the overthrow of the established religion. This is fully confirmed by the publications and the speeches of their leading men, as I think will appear from the preceding extracts. Surely our ultra liberal Protestants will believe them, if they should not believe The Protestant, who is supposed to be prejudiced on this subject. Dr Milner tells us, that all the preaching and writing of himself and brethren, tend to this very object,—the overthrow of the established church; and Dr Dromgoole, and the "Catholic board" that applauded his speech, tell us as plainly, that they intend to establish Popery in its stead. This is what is meant by chal lenging possession of the ark, for taking which the columns of catholicity are collecting. Their bishops are looking at the cathedrals as theirs in point of right, as they hope they shall soon be in reality; and all the inferior stalls have their anxious expectants. They demand political power for the very purpose of bringing this about. Along with this, as a thing of course, the kingdom will be reconciled to the holy See, that is, brought under the dominion of the Pope; and Protestants of every name will be extirpated. I must do the Papists the justice to say, that they have honestly and plainly given us warning; and if Protestants will be so silly as put it in their power to subvert the Protestant religion, and establish Popery, they deserve to suffer the consequence of their own folly; but for the sake of their innocent children, on whom chiefly the evil would fall, I hope they will pause, and see it to be their duty to transmit to posterity those privileges which our fathers procured for us at the expense of their blood.

I quoted parts of Dr Dromgoole's speech, not for the purpose of replying to it, but to show how boldly he proclaims the views of his party. There is one thing, however, which I must not pass without notice. He represents the "Catholic" as "oppressed," and conceiving "that his political degradation is to be referred to the Church of England." And certain public meetings, held by Papists in Ireland, in 1813, published the following, among other resolutions:—"That if there be a God in heaven, our cause cannot be indifferent to his providence! and if there be justice on earth, our slavery must be near its termination." Spearing's True State, &c. p. 380. What the one calls slavery, and the other oppression and political degradation, is nothing more than exclusion from certain offices of power and trust, which their allegiance to a foreign power renders them incapable of holding, as I showed at length in the Number before last. Nothing, therefore, but the spirit of falsehood that prevails in the Church of Rome, would represent their condition as that of slavery, oppression, and degradation; and even if it were so, it is sufficiently absurd to ascribe it to the Church of England, seeing the law as it stands was the act of King, Lords, and Commons; and, I suppose, the church was never consulted in the matter. It is a political arrangement intended to maintain the security of the established government in church and state; and the same restrictions would attach to members of the Church of England itself, if they held principles which prevented them from maintaining undivided allegiance to king George. I can prove this by a historical fact, known to all the world. There are thousands of Episcopalians in Scotland who are in full communion with the Church of England. These lay for a whole century under similar restrictions with those which still attach to Papists, and for the same reason,—they held principles (conscientiously I believe) which did not admit of undivided allegiance to the reigning family. It was impossible, in the very nature of the thing, consistently with public security, that they should have been eligible to seats in Parliament, while the obstacle continued; and so far as appears, they did not expect or desire it. They were exposed to the penalty of some very severe laws, in which they were designated simply, "those of the Episcopal communion in Scotland." Certainly it was not meant by these laws to persecute episcopacy, or to enslave, oppress, and persecute Episcopalians on account of their religion, for those who made the laws were Episcopalians. Unfortunately, those of that religion in Scotland, were known to be attached to King James; and it was on this account, not because they were Episcopalians, that they suffered such disabilities. When prince Charles died, the obstacle was removed. They were then willing to take the oaths to king George; in 1792, an act was passed for their relief; and they are now under less restriction than the members of the Church of Scotland, seeing they are not required, in order to admission to places, to take the sacrament in a communion different from their own.

In one sense, the obstacle was a religious one. It regarded the obligation of an oath, which is undoubtedly a religious matter. The Scotch bishops had, in their official capacity, sworn allegiance to king James and his heirs; and this was considered as not only binding them personally to James, but also as binding their successors in office to his natural heirs, as his successors. The question is not, whether, by fair construction, the oath of allegiance did so bind them; or whether they were not relieved from the obligation of their oath by the king's breach of his? But seeing, in point of fact, that body did consider themselves bound by oath to James and his heirs, they were necessarily incapable of holding places under king George. This incapacity arose from a conscientious, religious, though, I think, mistaken principle; but it would be absurd to call it persecution on account of religion; for they are still of the same religion in every point, and hold the same opinion, with regard to the obligation of the oath, which, since the death of the Pretender, is merely a matter of speculation, and does not interfere with practical subjection to the house of Hanover.

Let Papists "emancipate" themselves from a foreign yoke, and place themselves in circumstances capable of maintaining undivided allegiance to their lawful sovereign; in other words, let them renounce the Pope, and the arbitrary and slavish principles connected with their owning him, and they will then be prepared for the same privileges which the Scotch Episcopalians have enjoyed for thirty years.

CLXXI.

SATURDAY, October 20th, 1821.

My object, in some of my late Numbers, was to show, that the exclusion of Papists from places of power in a Protestant government is a necessary measure of self-defence, occasioned by their well-known principles of attachment to a foreign power, and hostility to the Protestant religion; that such exclusion is not unjust in a moral point of view; and that it is not persecution on account of religion. This last article was illustrated, at the conclusion of my last Number, by an allusion to the well-known fact, that persons in Scotland, of the very same religion with the King and Parliament of Great Britain, suffered the same disabilities as Papists do, for a whole century after the revolution; and they would have been suffering them still, had the cause of them not ceased to exist, on the extinction of the Stuart line, when the adherents of that family conformed in every respect to the established order in church and state, by subscribing the thirty-nine Articles, and taking the oaths which recognised the title of the house of Hanover.

If the Pope of Rome, and Rome itself, with the whole conclave, were as extinct as the race of king James; and if it were as impossible to raise up successors to the Pope and Cardinals, as it is to create heirs of that king's body; I would not see so much danger in conceding the "Catholic claims." Indeed there would be no occasion to concede them, for then there would be no political barrier to divide the allegiance of Papists, or to prevent them from taking the oaths to king George. There would be nothing then to unite them in one body, as a kingdom within the kingdom, threatening the overthrow of the established government. In order to the enjoyment of constitutional rights, it would not be asked what nonsense they believed, or did not believe. Their entire political conformity would throw their religious errors as much into the shade as those of other sects, or of individuals who have no fixed principles of religion at all. It is most desirable that all men in power were free from religious errors; that they held the Christian doctrine pure and entire as it is taught in the bible; and that they lived and acted under its influence; but as the kingdoms of this world are constituted, that is not to be expected. There may be men in power, and high power too, whose religious principles are as inimical to the salvation of their own souls as the most impious dogmas of Popery, without being disqualified for managing the affairs of the nation, or unworthy of our confidence with regard to loyalty and patriotism. Indeed some of the fundamental errors of Popery are entertained by every man who does not cordially embrace the Christianity of the Bible. They are the errors of our fallen nature; such as inadequate views of the holiness and justice of God, of the evil of sin, and of our own estrangement from God on account of it. Right apprehensions of these things are necessary to the salvation of a man's soul; but they are not necessary to his being a politician and a statesman; and therefore I would not insist on entire orthodoxy of religious belief as a qualification for places of power.

Yet there are things of a religious nature, which ought not to be forgotten, in reference to political matters. An atheist, for instance, could not safely be intrusted with power over the persons and property of others, because there is no moral tie by which he can be bound to do justly. The same remark will apply to some of the errors of Popery, such as transubstantiation, and that it is lawful to put heretics to death; and therefore it is that I said merely that I would not see so much danger in conceding the "Catholic claims," if the Pope were disowned and his power destroyed; for there would still be danger to the peace and happiness of the community, if men were raised to power over us, who thought it right to punish men with death for their religious opinions; and men who did not believe their own senses of seeing, feeling, tasting, and smelling; for persons who will not receive the testimony of these in evidence of a fact, would be very incompetent to judge of any other evidence, and, therefore, incapable of presiding in courts of justice.

It is needless, however, to speak of Popery as separated from the Pope. We must take it as it is and has been for ages; and, in order to show farther the danger that is to be apprehended from admitting Papists to places of power, I shall proceed to give a summary of the statutes by which Papists are bound to extirpate heresy and heretics, and a recent example of the manner in which power is exercised by them among themselves, even by priests over men of their own order, from which we may guess how rigorously they would deal with heretics, if they had but their faces at the grindstone. I allude to the case of a Popish priest in Ireland, who, a few months ago, published a statement under the following title: "A Developement of the Cruel and Dangerous Inquisitorial System of the Church of Rome in Ireland, and of its particular operations in the case of the Author, the Rev. L. Morrissy, Parish Priest of Oning and Templeorum, in the Diocese of Ossory and County of Kilkenny, and Roman Catholic Chaplain to his Majesty's Prisons in Dublin"—1821. I received a copy, at the time of its publication, from a clergyman of the established church, who is intimately acquainted with the author, of whose character he speaks in terms of high commendation. The following is extracted from his Preliminary Observations:—

"When I attempt to treat of the detestable tribunal of the Inquisition, which, at different times, overwhelmed the Catholic countries of Europe with distress and dismay, and corrupted the principles of morality and the integrity of the human mind, wherever its progress was permitted and its direful effects felt with impunity; my principal object is to discover how far this diabolical system extends its baneful influence over the minds, the morals, and the inclinations of the inhabitants of poor distracted Ireland; and also how far a revolutionary spirit of disloyalty and subversion of what is deemed heretical monarchy is engendered and hatched among a certain portion of his Majesty's subjects, for the horrid purposes prescribed by the legislators of this holy tribunal, yet undiscovered and uncontrolled in our native soil to the present time. For the better understanding of the mortal hatred entertained by Roman Catholics against all other sects, I shall make use of the same appellations given them by their declared enemies and sworn opponents."

"I had always a natural repugnancy to all revolutionary systems and disloyal principles. These, my opinions, provoked the obloquy and indignation of my spiritual superiors and clerical brethren, and brought on me such a flood of persecutions, as induced me to make diligent search into the different modes of ecclesiastical government at different periods, and I found, by woful experience, that the inquisitorial system entirely differs from the true discipline practised in the early ages of the church. From the practical knowledge I have acquired for the long period of upwards of twenty years on the Irish mission, and intimate information I have received for a considerable time in Rome, both by theory and practice, in the inquisitorial courts of that capital, wherein my case was in agitation for the space of four years, I consider myself bound in conscience, for the sake of religion, the good of my country, and preservation of the state, to disclose and make public those detestable measures and treasonable plots, (now in contemplation,) that will ultimately terminate in the destruction of——, if not timely prevented by legal interference and necessary precaution. For this laudable purpose I brought with me from Rome the best and most recent documents, which I can produce on proper application being made."

Before giving a statement of his own case, he gives a summary of the law, as it stands in the Church of Rome, with regard to heretics, which is as follows:—

"The first constitution of Pope Innocent IV. beginning Cum adversus. This constitution was enacted the 31st October, 1242, which contains the following laws:—

"1. Ut Heretici—That heretics, condemned by the Roman Catholic Church, &c. are to be handed over to the secular power for punishment, (where the secular power supports this tribunal.)

"2. That heretics, although penitent, are to be perpetually imprisoned.

"3. That heretics are to be taken up every where, and consigned to the Inquisitors.

"4. That the favourers and abettors of heretics are to be punished, as well as heretics themselves, &c.

"5. That they are, by virtue of the same law, to be punished in like manner, even in case they would make their escape and fly to another country.

"6. That the repentance of heretics, who relapse, is not to be received.

"7. That their appeals are not to be listened to, or received.

"8. That their descendants, to the second generation, are to be deprived of their temporal benefices and public offices.

"9. That the Inquisitors are to be favoured every where.

"10. That heretics are to be carefully kept in custody until they are condemned.

"11. That heresy is to be accounted among public crimes, and adjudged greater than the crime of high treason.

"12. That impenitent heretics are to be burned alive.

"13. That the favourers of heretics are to be perpetually banished, and their properties confiscated.

"14. That the children of the favourers and abettors of heretics, are deprived and expelled from all dignities and honours, except they would discover of some heretic.

"15. That heretics are to be always looked upon and considered as infamous people, and not to be confided in; that their goods are to be confiscated, and that their children cannot inherit their property.

"16. That those who are suspected of heresy, unless they satisfactorily clear themselves from that suspicion, are considered as infamous people, and as banditti; and if they persevere for twelve months under this suspicion, they are to be condemned as heretics, &c.

"17. That those invested with the civil power, and rectors in their respective places, are to be bound down by an oath to prosecute heretics publicly.

"18. That many more punishments, to be mentioned hereafter, are to be inflicted on those who favour heretics, and also on those who believe them.

"19. That these laws are universal, and are to be observed and put in execution every where, &c.

"20. That heresy is never to be tolerated; but, on the contrary, is always to be punished. (HERESIS NUNQUAM TOLERANDA, SED SEMPER PUNIENDA.)

"Pope Boniface VIII. afterwards confirmed the above laws in the year 1294.

"Pope Clement V. (A. D. 1305) made a similar constitution against repealing the punishments prescribed by his predecessors against heretics.

"The first constitution of Pope John XXII. Incipiens, (ex parte) 1410. This Pope described heretics and their crimes in the following manner:—

"1. The crime of heresy, by its own impiety, exceeds all other impiety; it is more execrable than all other crimes, and therefore calls aloud for more severe punishments than all other crimes do.

"2. Heretics are the receptacles of all wickedness, as they are described in the 23d chapter of St Matthew, Duces Cæci, &c. viz. the leaders of the blind, serpents, the generation of vipers, full of rapine and impurity, of baseness, hypocrisy, and iniquity. Therefore, the Son of the Most High wished to have his immaculate and spotless church armed with a two-edged sword, in order to bring these nefarious and wicked sects to the paths of truth, or inflict perpetual punishments.

"3. It is forbidden to receive heretics, though allied by affinity and consanguinity.

"4. Heresy, though ever so trivial, entirely subverts faith.

"5. The Popes never repealed or abrogated the constitutions established by their predecessors against heretical pravity, but, on the contrary, generally confirmed, and renewed them occasionally, viz. Paul IV. in const. 19. an. 1555, and Pius V. in const. 22. an. 1566, beginning Inter Multiplices.

"In his 4th const. Pope John XXII. did not monopolize what did not belong to himself, alluding to this country, whereas it is clearly evident, that the kingdom of Ireland was not only tributary, but also feudal to the holy See. To prove that Ireland belongs to St Peter, it suffices to adduce the authority of Adrian IV. When Henry II. desired the possession of this kingdom, he obtained the investiture of it from the same Pope in this manner: "Truly, Ireland, and all other islands which the Son of Justice, Jesus Christ, enlightened, and which received the doctrine of Christianity, are the undoubted right of St Peter, and the holy Roman church,

(as your own majesty hath recognised :) for you have, my dear child, signified to us, that you wish to enter the kingdom of Ireland for the sake of civilizing the people by wholesome laws, and to extirpate the reigning vices practised among them ; and also to pay the tribute of one piece of silver out of every house to St Peter, and to preserve the ecclesiastical rights and jurisdictions inviolate. We, therefore, highly approve of your laudable desire, and give our full assent to your benevolent petition, &c. You may enter that island, and may the inhabitants receive you with due honour, and venerate you as their lord ! The authority of the church is always to be free and kept inviolate, and the tribute of one piece of silver, as aforesaid, to be annually paid to St Peter and to the holy Roman Church." This also the people of Ireland testified, says Polydorus, lib. 13. Histor. Anglic. ibi. de Hen. II. Angliæ rege, qui Hiberniam occuparat. The king went to Dublin, and there convened the bishops and regulars, and treated with them concerning the realm, which he obtained for himself and his posterity : that measure the Irish opposed, and denied him to be their king, unless by the authority of the Pope, because from the time that Christianity was received in the island they gave themselves and their all up to him ; and they constantly affirmed (as they do now assert) that they will have no other lord or king but the Pope. The king having heard these declarations, shortly after implored, by legates, Alex. III. Adrian's successor, to join Ireland, which he lately civilized, to the kingdom of England, by his authority, and the same Pope, by the apostolic authority, confirmed to him and his heirs the aforesaid kingdom of Ireland.

" Constitution 9. John XXII. beginning Exigit, &c. The Popes allow the Inquisitors to have armed people about them, for the suppression of heretical pravity, and self-defence, &c.

" Const. 12. of Pope John also, (Cum nonnulli.) Roman Catholics are forbidden to associate with heretics, &c. ; if they do, they are liable to be suspected of heresy, and to be punished by the Inquisitors, &c.

" Const. 10. of Pope Martin V. (A. D. 1428.)

" 1. In this constitution he enacted many punishments both against laics and clergymen who would indite an ecclesiastic before a civil tribunal, and commence an action either real, personal, mixed, civil, or criminal. The punishments fulminated against them are, 1st, An excommunication with respect to all opponents. 2nd, An interdict with respect to the community ; and 3dly, A clergyman concerned in citing another clergyman, loses his cause, ipso jure, without any privilege of evading such censures or punishments.

" A lay judge incurs the same punishments by bringing clergymen to an account, or to trial before his own tribunal.

A. D. 1555, Pope Paul IV. said, that the benefices of heretics become vacant the very instant they fall into heresy, ipso jure.

" Pope Pius IV. also declared the same, A. D. 1559, and several others.

" 19th March, 1587, Sixtus V. decreed, that letters should be sent free to the general Inquisitors all over the world.

" Pope Paul V. A. D. 1605, declared it a violation of faith to abjure the deposing and absolving powers in cases of heresy, viz. Powers to depose heretical kings, and in their realms to create Catholic kings—Powers to absolve subjects from their oaths of allegiance to heretical monarchs.

" A. D. 1642, Urban VIII. and after him, in the year 1663, Alexander VII. granted the same privileges—and Pius V. on all occasions to Ireland.

" Benedict XIV. in the last century, made several constitutions against heretics, at the head of his cardinals, in his palace at Monte Cavallo. In one of these he says, that a man who incurs a censure on account of heresy, cannot be absolved by an ordinary confessor, but by a clergyman who hath an express faculty for that purpose ; therefore I recollect my bishop, Dr Marum of Kilkenny, wanted me some time back to go to his Diocesan Penitentiary for absolution ; I refused to comply with such an absurdity ; this, of course, increased his indignation. I could mention several other decrees and bulls of this same century.

" There are many other constitutions and decretals made and established for the horrid purposes of murdering heretics, confiscating their properties, and disinheriting their children ; for degrading, dispossessing, and burning clergymen who would befriend, receive, abet, or defend heretics ; also for the sacrilegious purposes of remitting the sins—granting indulgences—and imposing sacramental penances productive of grace and remission of crimes to those who should imbrue their hands in the blood of heretics, particularly proscribed heretics, excommunicated (ipso jure) by the holy Apostolic See, as the Protestants of these countries are, &c. &c.

" I shall not at present enter into a full discussion and minute detail of the laws affecting the lives, properties, and vital happiness of my countrymen, as I intend, without much delay, and as soon as time will permit, to develope the intrigues of foreign power and ecclesiastical influence, and expose the projects of domestic enemies, in their full extent, for the good of my country.

" After quoting (to the present age, from century to century) so many indisputable authorities to prove the real existence of the above laws, can any intelligent and rational man say, or even insinuate, that they are antiquated and now repealed? However, if any should entertain a doubt, or maintain the contrary, I shall remove all ambiguity and imprint a thorough conviction on the minds of all liberal and well disposed men, by adducing a living example. Behold our present Pope Pius VII. together with the congregation of the Universal Inquisition, announcing themselves by insertion in the Rom. Register of 1819, as the authors and abettors of the inquisitorial system!"

In my next Number I shall introduce Mr Morrissy to the more intimate acquaintance of my readers, by inserting part of his personal history, as related by himself. His case is not unlike that of Mr Bourke, which had a conspicuous place in former Numbers. The persecutions which he suffered show, in the most striking manner, that every tender and humane feeling is banished from the minds of persons who administer the law in the Church of Rome; and that nothing whatever can influence them to depart from the course of establishing their own absolute power over those who choose to submit to their ghostly authority. The summary, which is given above, of the existing law with regard to heretics, which Mr Morrissy brought from Rome, will be found to confirm what I have written about the danger to be apprehended from the admission of Papists to places of power in a Protestant kingdom; for heresy, that is, the gospel as believed and professed by Protestants, is declared to be worse than high treason. Every Papist, therefore, who shall possess political power, will feel it to be his indispensable duty to persecute and extirpate heretics to the uttermost; and let them talk as they will about charity and liberality, while they have not the power of the state in their hands, these will be found to be mere empty sounds, when the existing statutes of the holy and infallible church demand their prompt obedience.

My readers are very naturally inquiring, what has become of the Jury Trial, which I promised them long ago?—and the only answer which I can make, is, that there are above a hundred closely printed pages of it lying with my printers, and that I am waiting for more copy from the shorthand writer, who either cannot or will not be induced, by any consideration that I can think of, to make more haste than is agreeable to himself. Nearly four months have elapsed, and he has not yet been prevailed upon to execute what ought to have been done in four days, which has been a grievous disappointment to me and to many others.

No. CLXXII.

SATURDAY, October 27th, 1821.

My last Number contained a summary of the existing laws in the Church of Rome, making it the imperious duty of every Romanist to persecute heretics to the uttermost, even to their complete extirpation. These are given on the authority of a priest of that Church, a man of good moral character, who publishes his statement to the world, and promises to publish more to the same purpose. This is a fair challenge to his brethren of that communion, to defend their church, and refute his statements, if they can; but though six months have elapsed, I have heard of no attempt to answer him, and have seen no advertisement of any such attempt. The silence of the bishop, and of the inferior clergy who are implicated, amounts to an admission that the principles and the facts which Mr Morrissy has brought to view, are incontrovertible; and I do hope that this exposure will tend to open the eyes of some, to the danger of admitting men who hold such principles, and are capable of such practices, into places of power and authority over Protestants—the very persons whom they engage by oath to persecute and destroy. I proceed with my extracts from Mr Morrissy:—

"All Catholics are bound, especially if required, to bring and accuse all heretics, and those suspected of heresy, before the tribunal of the Inquisition. There is a living example of this requisition and immediate compliance in real existence:—when, in the year 1815, the prelate of the diocese of Ossory ordered the clergy and laity to collect and bring their accusations to the inquisitorial tribunal, held in Kilkenny that year in the bishop's house against me."

"Our Irish prelates, Roman Catholic bishops, on the day of their consecration take an oath of allegiance to the reigning Pope and his successors: let not the substance be mutilated or the form deranged, for the original can be produced. I have been lately present at a consecration where such an oath was solemnly taken. The following extracts are selected from it.

"'Ego, electus ecclesiæ N. ab hac hora in antea, fidelis et obediens ero beato,' &c. 'I, N. elect of such a church, from henceforth will be faithful and obedient to St Peter the apostle, and to the holy Roman Church, and to our lord Pope N. and to his successors. I shall never, to their prejudice or detriment, reveal to any man the council they shall intrust me with, either by themselves, their nuncios, or letters. The Roman Papacy, and the regalities of St Peter, I will help them to keep and maintain against all men. I shall take care to conserve, defend, increase, and promote the rights, honours, privileges, and authorities of the holy Roman Church, for our lord the Pope and his successors. I will observe, with all my power, and shall make others do the same, the rules of the holy fathers, the apostolic (Papal) decrees, ordinations, dispositions, reservations, provisions, and mandates. I will persecute and fight against all heretics, schismatics, and rebels to our lord the Pope and his successors. I shall visit personally the shrine of the apostles every third year, and render an account of all my pastoral office to the Pope and his successors, and of all the affairs of my church, and discipline of my clergy and people; and will receive the apostolical or Papal mandates, and shall put them most diligently into execution; and, if justly prevented, I shall make the necessary communication through some other proper clergyman," &c. &c.

"Abbots take the same oath of allegiance and fidelity in their benedictions.

"'Ego, electus monasterii N. ab hac hora in antea, fidelis et obediens ero beato.' &c. 'I, N. elect of such a monastery, from henceforth will be faithful,' &c.

"The Council of Trent decreed that canons, dignitaries, parish priests, and all ecclesiastics who would have the care of souls, and direction of the people, should make a public profession of faith, and take an oath of obedience and fidelity to the Pope and his successors. Sess. xxiv. cap. 12. (tantamount to the above, &c.)

"Pope Pius IV. made a similar decree, and issued a Bull in confirmation of these oaths in the year 1564. 'Pius Episcopus servus servorum Dei, ad perpetuam rei memoriam. Nos volentes,' &c. 'We also wishing that, besides the above specified dignitaries and those who preside over the flock, the superiors of monasteries, convents, and all other religious houses of every religious order, should be uniformly bound by the same ties of public obedience to the Roman Church, and solemn oath to the existing Pope and his successors, do order and decree that the following form of the profession of faith and oath of fidelity must be publicly and every where taken, (ubique gentium,) received, and observed, by virtue of these presents, and our apostolic authority, under the same punishments prescribed by the Council of Trent.'

"I shall quote a few passages contained in this form of profession of faith, and oath of allegiance, and liege fidelity, &c.

"'Ego, N. firma fide credo et profiteor omnia et singula, &c. 'I, N. with a firm faith believe and profess all and each, &c. I most firmly admit and embrace the apostolic and ecclesiastical traditions, and all the other observations and constitutions of the same church. I without doubt or hesitation receive and profess all other things defined and declared by the sacred, canonical, and ecumenical councils, especially by the Council of Trent. And, at the same time, I do in like manner condemn, reject, and anathematize all things contrary thereto, and all heresies of all kind condemned, rejected, and anathematized by the Roman Catholic Church. And truly this catholic faith and profession I, at this moment, spontaneously profess and sincerely hold, and the same I shall hold and acknowledge entire and inviolate to the end of my life; and the same I will, to the utmost of my power, make my subjects and those committed to my charge hold, teach, and preach. I promise, vow, and swear: so help me God, and these holy gospels of God. We ordain that no person shall infringe or contradict this declaration of our will and mandate: if any will presume to do so, he shall incur the indignation of the Almighty God, and of the holy apostles St Peter and St Paul. Given in Rome, at St Peter's in the year of the incarnation of our Lord 1564, the ides of November, and fifth year of our pontificate.

"'FREDERIC CARD. CESSIUS,
"'Cæsar Glorierius.'

"The court of Rome is now appointing and creating notary apostolics more than ever.—These jurisdictionary powers were not before conferred on any besides the clergy, but this time back the same privileges and authority are extended to some of the laity, who are, as well as the clergy, bound by an oath of fidelity and obedience to the holy see.

"Form—'Ego, N. post hanc horam fidelis et obediens ero B. Petro Apos. et Papæ septimo,' &c. as before. 'I, N. shall be faithful to,' &c. 'Papatum Romanum, et regalia S. Petri ac jura Ecclesiæ Romanæ, &c. Jurabo et defendam,' &c. &c. This oath is taken in Ireland before the bishops or their vicars.

"Alexander IV. in his 15th constitution bound the laity to assist bishops and inquisitors to take, &c. heretics; and said that they are bound, especially if asked, to take an oath to that purpose, viz. to assist, counsel, and favour them in their proceedings against heretical pravity, &c.; and in case of their refusal or hindering them, they incur an excommunication, and are to be deprived of their honour and office, and are incapable of holding any office for the future. Innocent IV. and Urban IV. declare the same.

"After advancing so many authentic documents, and quoting so many indisputable authorities, can any rational, intelligent, and impartial man deny that there is a coalition of foreign influence, ecclesiastical overtures, and domestic acquiescence, maintained by mutual engagements and solemn oaths for the execrable purposes already described, by Papal constitutions, decretals of general councils, and ecclesiastical laws of episcopal synods? The long, complicated, and preconcerted measure cannot any longer be hid in the shades of obscurity. Behold the regular concatenation of sanguinary pursuits and sinister views, from the chief pontiff down to the most obscure plebeian and abandoned character! A solemn attestation of the Divine Being for the confirmation of truth and justice, is now become a bond of iniquity between pontiffs, cardinals, prelates, dignitaries, pastors, clergy, religious and laity, few, comparatively, excepted, for the horrid purposes of exterminating heretics, confiscating their properties, and disinheriting their children—of preventing every resource of redress and vindication, by inflicting similar punishments on their abettors, defenders, and associates! May I presume to ask my learned and conscientious bishops, What are the necessary conditions of a lawful oath? They will, I am confident, reply and say, truth, justice, and judgment. I shall then take the liberty of asking their lordships, Are all these conditions, or even any of them, to be found in the oath above alluded to, which they take privately in their rooms, or sacristies, in the presence of the consecrating bishop, and the rest of the prelates and clergy, before their public consecration in the chapel? If not, I will again ask, Is an oath given without these conditions, perjury or not? If it is, I shall beg pardon for asking the third time, Is the word, oath, or evidence of a perjurer to be either believed or received? If such an oath is no perjury, the good divines and practical civilians, and all men of sound judgment, are wrong, and deceive others in teaching and inculcating the contrary doctrine. May I here insert the Roman adage—Semel mendax, semper mendax,—semel perjurus, semper perjurus,—once a liar always a liar,—once a perjurer, always a perjurer. I may be told by an inquisitor, or even an honest man and good Christian, that, though the holy inquisition, and its binding laws and inquisitorial intrigues, are theoretically planted in Irish hearts, still no presages of its direful operations can be traced, or even allowed by our glorious constitution. I allow in the first instance, that the inquisitorial system cannot be put in force by murdering, burning, imprisoning, &c. but I assert that it is scrupulously and tyrannically put in force, as far as the inquisitors and judges can, without infringing on the restraining laws, or exposing their private views; although their extraordinary zeal and mortal hatred against all other sects and their suspected friends, make them sometimes outstep the legal mark, and inflict intolerant pains and unjust privations, as I shall now disclose by a living example.

"As the foundation of my misfortunes is now laid, I shall briefly begin to relate the painful history.

"In the year 1797, I began my mission in the town of Ballyragget, within three miles of Castlecomer and eight of Kilkenny. In 1798, I had an occasion to show and prove my loyalty in preaching against the rebellion, which at that time threatened destruction in that country. The active part I took in keeping down a revolutionary spirit, and the unfeigned loyalty I showed on all occasions, made inquisitors believe that I was true to my king and country. One day I dined with a Roman Catholic bishop, in company with some of his clergymen. In conversation, they reprobated the conduct of General Johnson for killing the rebels at the battle of Ross, county Wexford. I remarked, that they deserved the punishment for rebelling against their king and constitution;—I was immediately checked by the bishop and clergymen. Here the inquisition began to flash in the face of a suspected abettor of heretical pravity its bitter invectives. (Si non Verberibus Verbis. See Constit. Inn. IV.) The sworn bishop and his faithful inquisitors expressed their liege fidelity to a foreign power. In the time of the rebellion, the bishop of the diocese wherein I lived told me, that some of his clergy were encouraging the subversion of the constitution—I expressed no desire of imitation, nor showed any marks of approbation; I never after saw or heard that these suffered any censure. I was always considered, both by clergy and laity, a declared enemy to all inquisitorial laws and rebellious systems.

"In the year 1801, I was sent to the united parishes of Oning and Templeorum, as a quasi parochus to the Rev. Mr Lalor, then a superannuated P. P. of said parish, by my bishop, Dr Lanigan, with a promise of succession. The following year, 1802, Mr Lalor resigned these parishes formally and canonically into the hands of his bishop, Dr Lanigan, who immediately appointed me as P. P. to the same living, and left me in the full enjoyment and peaceable possession of it to the hour of his death, which, alas! happened the 11th of February, 1812.

"In the year 1810, the infatuated people called Caravats, &c. were forcibly taking firearms from the gentlemen of that country, and shooting some of them; holding nocturnal meetings, and disturbing the happiness of the peaceable inhabitants. I spoke from my altars against such illegal proceedings and rebellious dispositions, and exhorted my flock to keep and preserve the peace and tranquillity of the country, and to guard against the intrusion of strangers, who might endeavour to contaminate their principles, and inflame their minds with chimerical ideas of subverting the constitution for the purpose of ameliorating their condition and establishing religious liberties.

"My loyalty on this occasion was construed into a great crime. My admonition to my flock on this subject was a principal charge—an unpardonable offence, for which, in a few years after, my new bishop told me I should be tried, and punished according to the decision of his inquisitorial clergymen.

"In the year 1812, immediately after Dr Lanigan's death, Doctor Mansfield, P. P. of Kilmaganny, was appointed vicar capitular by the diocesan chapter with full powers to govern the diocese until a bishop would be appointed; he also made the present Doctor Marum, who was then P. P. only, his vicar general, to assist him in the discharge of his new administration, and execution, of heretical pravity. The choice was ominous, for he studied in Spain!!! Now, according to the Council of Trent, these clergymen, on becoming members of the holy inquisition, should take an oath of perpetual obedience and liege fidelity to persecute heretics, and fight against them; but the question was, how could this strayed sheep, this heretical priest, be separated and banished from the sound, the inquisitorial tribe of the diocese of Ossory; as no other canonical crime could be fully established, and as the civil power did not recognise the holy tribunal? Therefore it was necessary and incumbent on these faithful officers to devise some plan to cover the scheme, and punish the heretic.

"Ad rem.—In 1812, I was determined to build a parish chapel, or repair the old one, in the parish of Templeorum. I gave my parishioners the plan and size of a good chapel, built and just finished in a neighbouring parish for £600, with which they were in general well pleased. This chapel would be full large and sufficiently commodious, as there was another in the same parish, to which nearly half the congregation went to mass on Sundays and holidays. The vicar capitular, Dr Mansfield, contrary to custom, and the law of the church, took the building and management of it out of the hands of the lawful pastor, and gave it to his curate and a few of his parishioners. This was the policy of the inquisitorial court of Ossory, as a pretext to disgrace the heretic, and despoil him of his ecclesiastical preferment and benefice. Behold the scheme! "We will first give this building to these people under the pretence that their parish priest would not build it for them; secondly, we will build it on so large a scale as they cannot finish; and thirdly, when it will be impossible to accomplish it, we shall then insist on the pastor to undertake the work, and in case of refusal, will declare him utterly unworthy of being a parish priest and presiding over a flock, who would not build a house of worship for the honour of God, and the good of the people.' The laity were instruments in the hands of the sacerdotal inquisitors and presiding judges, in order to accomplish the destruction of the favourer and abettor of proscribed heretics. In my presence the vicar capitular desired them to adopt any plan they would think well of, and applot any taxes they should deem proportionable, and that he would insist on the payment; and at the same time told me, if I would oppose these measures he would proceed against me, insinuating that he would deprive me of my benefice. Conformable to his instructions, and private understanding with some of the parishioners, and without consulting the parish at large, the foundation of a chapel was laid which would amount to £3000, according to the estimate of the best architects in that country, and applotted the extraordinary tax of 6*s.* per acre, (many acres in said parish were not worth that sum.) The people murmured at the assumption of this arbitrary power, and the injustice of his illegal taxation; therefore, some would not pay, several had not the necessary means; others were reduced to mendicity, and under the necessity of running away from their landlords without paying their rents and lawful debts. Notwithstanding this great distress and visible poverty, the vicar capitular, in his elevated capacity, begins now to scatter his inquisitorial censures from the lofty tops of the Welch mountains (so called) to the level banks of the river Suir, as the following letter will show:

"'Kilmaganny, 13th Dec. 1812.

"'Rev. Sir—As I find that only few people at your side of the parish paid their subscriptions towards the building of their parish chapel, I now give them this notice, that unless the entire of their subscriptions shall be paid up before new year's day, I shall prohibit mass, under pain of suspension, to be given in the chapel of Pilltown, in the aforesaid parish, and every other part of the parish, except the two parish chapels on new year's day, and every subsequent Sunday and holyday, until the whole be paid. You will, I hope, earnestly urge them to it. There is a strong insinuation that they are countenanced by you. I remain your humble servant,

"'RICHARD MANSFIELD.

"'To the Rev. Mr Morrissy, Bessborough.'

"This enjoined order, implying a matter of extreme distress and spiritual dereliction, was complied with; therefore every opportunity of fulfilling the ecclesiastical precept of hearing mass and adoring God by prayer, &c. was taken away from the innocent, indigent, and those who paid in said district, as well as from the supposed guilty, for about twelve months. This prohibition and censure was illegal, unjust, and irreligious, and not binding either on the people or pastor.

"1st.—It was illegal, because the law of God, the true law of the church, and the law of the land, did not sanction such contributions as could not be reasonably and possibly complied with; besides, it was against the law of the realm to impose such taxes by private authority on his majesty's subjects, against their free will and mutual concurrence.

"2d.—It was unjust, because it was an unnecessary and oppressive imposition; whereas £600 would build a chapel sufficiently large and commodious for the circumstances of the people and population of the parish: it must be universally acknowledged that the enormous sum of £2,400 applotted on a poor country parish must be altogether unjust, and must unequivocally call aloud for restitution under the pain of eternal woe. 'No man can enter the kingdom of heaven until he shall pay the last farthing.' £2,400 is the extra sum after the subtraction of £600 from £3000, whereas £600 was sufficient.

"3d.—It was irreligious.—It is the firm belief of the Roman Catholic Church that every Roman Catholic is bound under the penalty of a grievous sin, to attend their respective places of worship on Sundays and holydays, unless prevented by a special case of necessity; and, that any person who is accessary to the prevention of another from the discharge of this obligation, incurs the same guilt, and of course is guilty of as many sins as he shall deprive others of the opportunity."

The author argues at greater length than is necessary, under a fourth head, to show the impropriety of such rigorous measures being resorted to, in order to raise money, for the chapel; and he draws a melancholy picture of a pastor being thus obliged "to desert his flock, leaving them weeping and sighing in their solitary abodes, panting after the sacrifice of the altar, the exhortation of their spiritual father, and the graces conferred by the sacraments through his administration." But his spiritual superior was not moved by these considerations, for he proceeded to still more rigorous measures, as we shall see in next Number.

No. CLXXIII.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 3D, 1821.

I DOUBT not some of my readers will be greatly surprised by the disclosures which are made in my last Number. I have introduced a living, officiating priest of the Romish Church in Ireland, who informs us that the Popish bishops in that kingdom solemnly swear at their consecration:—"I will persecute and fight against all heretics, schismatics, and rebels to our lord the Pope and his successors." This is not given by Mr Morrissy on hearsay; for he was "lately present at a consecration, where such an oath was solemnly taken;" which is, to all intents and purposes, an oath to fight against the reigning sovereign of Great Britain and Ireland, and against all his Protestant loyal subjects. From the same authority it appears, that the oath is so understood by those that take it; and that the principle of it is reduced to practice, by their encouragement of rebellion, and their persecution of those of their own religion who maintain their loyalty to the king. If any other class of His Majesty's subjects were known to take such an oath, they would be strictly looked after, and, perhaps, suffer some abridgment of their personal liberty; but because they are Papists we must conciliate them, and take care not to offend them, and repeal every statute that prevents them from having power over us! That so many Protestants should plead for the repeal of these statutes, reminds me of the saying, Quem Deus vult perdere, &c.—"Those whom God intends to destroy he leaves to be infatuated."

Mr Morrissy quotes for us another oath, which is ordained to be taken by persons in authority, in which they swear as follows:—"And truly this Catholic faith and profession I, at this moment, spontaneously profess and sincerely hold, and the same I shall hold and acknowledge entire and inviolate to the end of my life; and the same I will, to the utmost of my power, make my subjects, and those committed to my charge, hold, teach, and preach. I promise, vow, and swear, so help me God, and these holy gospels of God." If there be such a thing as a man's literally selling himself to the devil, it must be by taking this oath; for it binds every Papist who takes it, to resist the truth to his life's end; and to cause all under his charge or power to do the same. It effectually obstructs every approach of divine truth to the mind; for the fear of being sent to hell for perjury, is like a pledge lodged with the devil for his appearance there. Dispensations and absolutions may be had for other oaths; but the Pope himself never pretended to absolve a man from an oath concerning the faith: and should a conscientious person, in confessing to his priest, hint a doubt with regard to any article of belief, he would instantly be reminded of his oath, and threatened with certain damnation if he did not abide by what he had sworn to. A man is not lawfully bound by an unlawful oath to maintain falsehood, and resist the truth; but it serves the purpose of the priests to make their dupes believe what they please on this and every other subject.

The intelligent reader will consider what would be the consequence of admitting to places of power and authority, persons who had sworn this oath. They solemnly swear that to the utmost of their power, they will MAKE their subjects, and those committed to their charge, hold, teach, and preach the doctrines of Popery. This is Popish tolerance with a witness! The last king of the Stuart line had probably sworn this oath; at least he acted as if he had; and thereby lost the kingdom for himself and his heirs for ever. The oath, however, is not for sovereigns only, or those who have subjects. It seems intended for every functionary who may have persons committed to his charge;—in short, for every person who holds an office of authority or oversight in church or state; and it binds them to be persecutors, or be guilty of perjury; and yet there are Protestants who labour with all their might to get Papists made admissible to places of power and authority over themselves—to have men set over them, who take an oath to make them become Papists whether they will or not! They would act more wisely to become Papists of their own accord beforehand; for then they would have a chance to partake of the good things that Papists expect from emancipation; whereas if they shall wait till the strong arm of arbitrary power MAKE them Papists, they will never enjoy the favour or confidence of their makers; for even Papists know the value of conversions made by force.

The unpardonable sin of Mr Morrissy was his good character, especially for loyalty, and opposition to all seditious practices, which many of his brethren have been known to countenance and encourage. It has always given me pleasure to admit, that amidst the general profligacy of the Church of Rome, especially of the clergy, there are honourable exceptions, even among that corrupt body. That Mr Morrissy holds the doctrines of the Church of Rome is evident from the manner in which he writes of the sacraments; but he seems to be fully convinced that that church, at least in Ireland, has become deplorably corrupt in discipline. Now, purity of discipline is as essential to the church of Christ in this world as purity of doctrine; and if the Church of Rome has failed in this respect, she is not the church of Christ, else, according to her own mode of arguing, Christ's promise has failed. It is well known that she rests her pretension to infallibility upon Christ's promise to be with his church, Mat. xviii. 15—20, "If he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as a heathen and a publican. Verily I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." And "where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." From this passage all Popish writers argue, that if it were possible for the church to fail, Christ's promises must have failed. It is impious and blasphemous to suppose the latter; therefore they consider it a necessary and unavoidable conclusion that the church cannot fail. Now, that, in the above passage, Christ is speaking, not of doctrine, but of discipline, must be evident to every one who reads it, for it prescribes the mode of dealing with an offending brother. Mr Morrissy clearly convicts his church of the grossest and most cruel depravity in discipline; therefore, unless he adopt the impious tenet, that Christ's promise has failed, he must allow that his church has failed, and that therefore she is not the church of Christ.

I recommend this subject to his most serious consideration, as I hope he is a reader of my papers; and I request particularly, that he will read with attention Mr Bradley's letter, in Nos. lxxxix. xc. This gentleman, like himself, was educated in the Church of Rome; and when his eyes began to open to her fearful departure from the Christianity of the New Testament, he found the word church a grevious stumblingblock to him. By attention to the scriptures, however, he got over it; and so I hope Mr Morrissy will do, if he will seriously apply his mind to it.

A man of Mr Morrissy's character and political principles, must have been disliked by those with whom he was associated, and who were set over him. His general good conduct was a standing testimony against their vices; and from his loyalty they would dread him as a spy upon their conduct. It is not necessary to suppose that he was so; for there is always a jealousy in guilty minds that makes them dread the oversight of honest men; and, as was quite natural, they devised means to get him out of the way. But like the great enemy of the Jews, in Esther's time, they scorned the paltry sacrifice of an individual; and, therefore, they determined to make his whole parish suffer with him. The plan they adopted was truly worthy of the inquisition. They ordered a new chapel to be built, upon a scale five times more expensive than was necessary; they tax the parishioners with a sum greater than the yearly rent of their lands; then they set their loyal brother to enforce the payment of this grievous and illegal exaction, for we must not call it extortion on this side of the channel, though Mr Morrissy seems to entertain no dread of calling things by their own names, in Ireland, which it is fashionable to call an enslaved country, though it appears they have more freedom of pen and press, at least, than we have in highly favoured Scotland. As must have been anticipated, the poor people were utterly unable to pay the expense of so fine a chapel; it is left unfinished; Mr Morrissy gets the blame; he is prohibited from giving the sacraments to those who do not, and cannot pay the uttermost farthing of the chapel tax; and so, according to their own tenets, these priests allow men, women, and children to perish for want of the necessary means of salvation, solely because they cannot pay a sufficient sum towards a splendid chapel.

It is firmly believed by every Papist, that a child dying unbaptized must perish. This is believed by Mr Morrissy; and it is according to the authoritative canon of the Council of Trent. DE BAPTISMO. Can. V. Si quis dixerit baptismum liberum esse, hoc est, non necessarium ad salutem; anathema sit. "If any man shall say that baptism is indifferent, that is, not necessary to salvation; let him be accursed." But we shall see that even baptism was prohibited to the innocent children of parents who could not pay the tax which the ghostly father was pleased to impose.

We shall now proceed with the narrative:—"The reverend doctor, wishing still to extend his prohibitions a little farther, and deprive the poor parishioners of more spiritual advantages, sends me the following letter:

"'Kilmaganny, 6th June, 1813.

"'Rev. Sir—As I find that you are to have a station of confession next Wednesday in the chapel of Piltown, hereby I not only prohibit mass to be given in the chapel of Piltown on Sundays and holydays as before, but I also prohibit, under pain of suspension, mass to be given, or any assembly or congregation for spiritual purposes to be held there, even on week days.

"'RICHARD MANSFIELD.

"'To Rev. L. Morrissy, Bessborough.'

"Here the pious doctor prohibits, by severe censures, any good works to be performed, or sacraments to be administered in the chapel of this district, to the indigent, innocent, and pennyless. Are there any similar prohibitions to be found in the written word of God, or traditions of the church? Did the learned doctor consider the decision of the holy fathers —'Baptism and penance can be given in chapels and places interdicted?' St Augustine, &c.

"The vicar capitular is not yet satisfied with the inflictions already described for the punishment of heretical pravity, so he sends the following:—

"'Kilmaganny, 9th Oct. 1813.

"'Rev. Sir—I do hereby order and enjoin you, under pain of suspension, by the fact, not to admit to sacraments those refractory individuals, nor any of their family, until they shall have paid their equitable proportion towards advancing their parish chapel. I remain, your humble servant,

"'RICHARD MANSFIELD.

"'To Rev. L. Morrissy, Bessborough.'

"Here the sacraments of salvation are become the instruments of temporal oppression and spiritual injustice in the hands of the doctor. 1st. By withdrawing the sacraments from the people, several of them would, in a great measure, starve themselves—would refuse the payment of lawful debts and legal taxes, imposed for the support of the king and constitution, in order to pay illegal and oppressive taxations, imposed by spiritual superiors for sinister motives and vindictive objects, sooner than suffer the privation of divine and ecclesiastical rites and pastoral consolation. I was an ocular witness on different occasions to the veracity of these assertions; I know some who paid for said chapel out of subscriptions made for buying a coffin, &c. 2dly. The people have an undoubted right to receive the rites and sacraments of their church, whilst they do not render themselves unworthy of them by personal guilt. Now, with respect to the case in question, did the wife, the child, and the servant of the recusants and indigents deserve to be deprived of the sacraments, &c.? Certainly every good and respectable divine, true Christian, and rational man, will coincide with me in the negative, and conclude that the prohibitions and suspensions of the above letters contain nothing solid, spiritual, or exemplary; but, on the contrary, are replete with temporal oppression and spiritual injustice, with respect to the pastor and his flock.

"Now the renowned doctor begins to manifest his unlimited and uncontrolled authority, and redoubles his censures as well as his taxes.

"'Kilmaganny, 14th Oct. 1813.

"'Rev. Sir—I find you begin now to be sincere, but regret that in throwing off every disguise you not only justify the opinion heretofore entertained of you, but seem also to give manifest proofs that your religion is as false as your promises. From your conduct, as I am informed, you must have misinterpreted some words of my letter to you some days back, which were, 'You will not administer, &c. until they shall have paid an equitable proportion of the chapel tax.' Now, Sir, the meaning of the last underlined words must obviously be, until they should have paid such a proportion of the tax as had been paid by people in equal or similar circumstances with them; yet you have given the words a construction of your own, and acted upon it at no small risk to your conscience. But to remove all ground for error or misapprehension, I do hereby order you, under pain of suspension, by the fact, to administer no sacraments or rites to your parishioners, except the last sacraments to persons in imminent danger of death, and baptism to children, until they shall have paid not only the full amount of the first tax, according as it was settled and applotted, but also a second tax to the same amount with the first. In this prohibition the families of the recusants are included. But as nothing short of a double tax (12s. per acre) would be sufficient to finish the shell of the chapel, it cannot be avoided. If a spark of religion existed in the heart of the pastor, he could easily persuade them that this tax, let it be what it may, would be but a small token of gratitude to God. Your's, &c.

"'RICHARD MANSFIELD.

"'To Rev. Mr Morrissy, Bessborough.'

"I suppose the vicar capitular in the first part of his letter alludes to the opinion entertained of me as a heretic, or a friend to heretics. He pretends I made him promises; which I never did, or could do in conscience—promises to oppress the people, and require impossibilities, for the hidden purposes of preventing disclosures and revealing perfidy; non-compliance betrayed false religion in the estimation of an inquisitorial member. The vicar sanctioned and desired other priests to give sacraments to some friends and accomplices who did not pay the tax but in part; from this example I considered that I was at liberty to do the same, yet he threatens and reprimands me for administering sacraments, &c to any, without paying the entire tax; and he calls this error and misapprehension, &c.—he punishes me for doing what he allows others to do—he suspends me from the discharge of my duty, and commands others to intrude on my pastoral rights.

"By this letter the difficulties, impositions and taxations are redoubled: the poor people are taxed 12s. per acre before half the work is done. But with respect to sacramental privations I must do him this common justice, that he is like the relapsing sinner, rising and falling, for in his former letter he prohibited all the sacraments to be administered to the recusants and their families: but in this letter, he permits almost the one-half of them to be given to the recusants, &c. I could ardently wish that this reformation might prove effectual, but, alas! I dread the next fall will be a woeful one. I am sorry the noble doctor did not permit his clergy to administer the last sacraments to those in danger of death, as the great divines and holy fathers did. No! for he binds them here not to administer them except in case of imminent danger of death, perhaps at a time when the patient could not receive them, or reap but little or no benefit from them.

"As I have predicted, the vicar fell again into his old mode of issuing censures and committing errors, as appears by the following:—

"'Kilmaganny, 12*th March*, 1814.

"'Rev. Sir—I enjoin you again to administer no sacraments whatsoever publicly or privately to any person, or any one of his family, who shall not have previously paid the full amount of both taxes, nor any of the rites of churching women, blessing clay, or celebrating mass for them, under pain of suspension, to be incurred by the fact; and any violation of this injunction you may rely shall be rigorously punished. I also require that Mr Henebry shall say the parish mass in Templeorum, without any obstruction whatever. You married two couple who paid no tax; one in Tobernabroon, and one in Dowling, if so, I beg you look to———'

"I confess I am at a loss to know what to say—what strictures to make, or ideas to form of these melancholy prohibitions, irreligious injunctions, and general exclusion of men, women, and children, born and unborn, guilty or not guilty, from all the sacraments, sacrifices, rites, privileges, &c. of the Catholic Church. My heart feels more than my tongue can express. No man can sufficiently lament this irreparable calamity, but he who contemplates it in mournful silence. I ask you Roman Catholics, Can a child be saved without baptism, according to the divine oracles and the doctrine of our church? 'unless a man is born of water and of the Holy Ghost, he cannot enter the kingdom of heaven,'—Can the sinner in leaving this world be saved without repentance? You will say 'the one cannot without baptism, or the other without real contrition, or at least attrition, with the help of the sacrament of penance.' What opinion then will you form of the man who will not allow either the sacraments necessary for salvation, or the auxiliary means to obtain it, and sacred rites of the church to be administered either in case of absolute or ordinary necessity? I venture to anticipate that you will say nothing less than that 'no heretic, whom the church ever condemned, gave orders more destructive of the very essence of religion!' You will also confess that Luther and Calvin, against whom, together with their followers, the Roman Church pronounced so many woes and anathemas, never made such an attempt to destroy the divine institution of all the sacraments, sacrifices, rites, &c. by issuing orders in positive terms, under severe censures, not to administer to the innocent and pennyless, what Jesus Christ instituted and ordained for their salvation:—no payment, no sacrament! The doctor of censures must acknowledge that there is virtue or no virtue in the sacraments and rites of the church.—If there is any virtue—how could he withdraw them from the well-disposed subject?—If there is no virtue—how can he impose on thousands to receive and pay divine homage to what he believes there is no virtue or efficacy in, and of course be guilty of idolatry? I am sorry that he has given sufficient reasons and convincing proofs to the public at large to believe that he is possessed of the deistical idea, that there is no virtue, &c. Candid reader, you will tell me that his superiors, on intimation and conviction, must condemn and punish this ecclesiastic for his heretical and erroneous principles, or otherwise must participate in his crime—that nothing will palliate but the profession of an inquisitorial member of the holy office. More of this hereafter.

"The vicar also in this letter foisted another priest, Mr Henebry, into my parish, contrary to the ecclesiastical law, to act in direct opposition to my parochial administration and temporal interest in said benefice; in like manner he hindered me from preaching and teaching my flock, by giving up my parish chapel and parish mass to said Mr Henebry, and excluding me, not without reason indeed, for by this prohibition and exclusion, I should not have the power or liberty of preaching loyalty, and preventing the inquisitorial systems, &c.

"By virtue of these vicarial censures, the children and servants of the poor recusants could not be married, let what would depend on chances, or appointments, or melancholy results. To harass and persecute me more and more, the vicar capitular sent the Rev. Mr Forestall, P. P. of Callom, a very active inquisitor, into my parish, as an equestrian suspender, who galloped in full speed through the country, until he met me on the highway in company with several of my parishioners and there suspended me without assigning any reason, if he knew any. I laughed at the madness and inconsistency of his conduct, but at the same time had compassion on the petulant hireling, who incurred a greater censure, ipso jure, than he thought to inflict."

No. CLXXIV.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 10TH, 1821

MY readers, by this time, have become pretty well acquainted with Mr Morrissy, and his controversy with his ecclesiastical superior. It would fill some Numbers more to give his case at length, in his own words; but I do not think this necessary. Suffice it to say, that he was pursued with unrelenting rigour; that he was thrust out of his parish, without reason being assigned; that he appealed to his metropolitan, Dr Troy, without obtaining redress; that he consulted a lawyer, in his extreme difficulties, who was decidedly of opinion, that he could maintain an action of damages against Dr Mansfield; and that the simple fact of his having consulted a Protestant lawyer, in a question between him and his spiritual superior, subjected him to excommunication, though it does not appear that his enemies pronounced the sentence.

Dr Marum was advanced to be bishop, and then poor Morrissy found himself under the fangs of the inquisitor, "who had been educated in Spain!" On the 19th of June, 1815, the new bishop made a visitation of his parish; and after mass, &c. the bishop declared to the congregation, that he had several sheets in folio, full of charges against Mr Morrissy, from his parishioners; but he had not communicated these to the accused person, who was quite ignorant of the existence of such charges. Mr Morrissy had the fortitude to declare before the congregation, that he was quite innocent, which enraged the bishop, who told him, that he would make his protestation of innocence an additional charge. The accused applied to have a copy of the charges which were alleged against him, but was refused. A court of inquisition was appointed to be held, to which he had received no summons, though he was the party chiefly interested. Here I shall give his own words:—

"The appointed day of trial was rapidly approaching; I was in a complete dilemma how to act, without the knowledge of the charges, the advantage of witnesses, or any other auxiliary means, allowed the greatest culprit on the day appointed for the investigation of his conduct, and decision of his fate. At length, I formed a resolution of going to this partial trial, listening to the charges preferred, and calling for an adjournment, and a legal and canonical mode of proceeding. This favour was denied. At my arrival at Kilkenny, Dr Marum asked me abruptly, where I was going? I made reply, and said, 'My lord, I come to my trial;' the bishop exclaimed, 'Sir, you are not to be at your trial, or any person for you, or bearing evidence in your favour, on this day, or any other day you will be tried; you may go home, we will do the business ourselves without you,' &c. I was obliged to withdraw. He summoned to this holy tribunal, erected in his own house, the principal inquisitors in his chapter, and the principal enemies I had among the clergy, to bear testimony, and decide my case."

Next follow the names of those who sat in judgment. One of them, the Rev. John Fitzpatrick, had the courage to speak a good word for the accused,—to declare that he considered Mr Morrissy an injured man; that the expensive chapel was undertaken quite against his will; and he, being his next door neighbour, could bear witness to the general good character of Mr Morrissy. "This honest and candid priest was immediately expelled the inquisitorial court;" and no one dared to follow his example. As a thing of course, the accused person was found guilty, without a hearing, and without witnesses; condemned to a perpetual privation of ecclesiastical living, and clerical functions, and another was appointed in his place. Had he not lived under the protection of Protestant laws, he would have been burned to ashes; and thus the Church of Rome would have saved herself from the exposure which he lives to make; and as he is now employed in His Majesty's service as chaplain in the prisons in Dublin, for the instruction of persons of his own communion, I hope he is beyond the reach of such of his brethren, who would take his life with as little scruple as they would shoot a sparrow.

I proceed now to relate a similar instance of arbitrary clerical power in the United States of America, that "land of freedom." Mr Morrissy tells us of an acquaintance of his having been lately sent from Cork, to establish the inquisition in America, and who has been appointed by the Pope to a bishopric in that quarter. This refers, I suppose, to Dr England, lately consecrated at Cork, bishop of Charleston. I have been informed of his arrival in that city. I have received from a correspondent a copy of his first pastoral letter, in which he informs the people of the great kindness of the Pope, in erecting a new diocese, suffragan to Baltimore, and appointing him bishop thereof. He has commenced hostilities against his Protestant neighbours; and a Charleston merchant, under the signature of "A PROTESTANT," has entered the lists with him, finding, I suppose, the clergy as indifferent to the question of Popery there, as most of them are here; and this merchant, if I may judge from his first publication, which is in my possession, though his beginning be but small, may come in good time to be as formidable to the bishop of Charleston, as a Glasgow merchant has been to the Scottish conclave. The arrival of Dr England in America is hailed by one of his clerical brethren, in a pamphlet, lately published in Philadelphia, in the following style, which will justly be considered as bordering on blasphemy :—

"The Right Rev. Dr England, lately of Cork, and now bishop of Charleston, will, I trust, change the face of things. The profound theologian, the pious prelate, the eloquent preacher, the disinterested cleric, and the accomplished gentleman, will not be an unobservant spectator of these proceedings ; no, his soul is too noble, and his heart too pure; well, indeed, may the people of Charleston say, in the inspired language of the Psalmist, it is the day-star from on high that has come to visit us ; it is the morning spread upon the mountains. With such a prelate in this country, it is fondly to be hoped our religion will flourish; with such a parent to advise them, its children will not disobey ! with such an orb to light them, its prelates cannot stray."—Address to the Congregation of St Mary's Church, Philadelphia, by the Rev. Wm. Hogan, Pastor of St Mary's, Feb. 2d, 1821, pp. 26, 27.

This pamphlet, by the Rev. Wm. Hogan, which the reader will see, refers to something, under the expression, "these proceedings," is a complaint against his bishop, not unlike that of Mr Morrissy against his. Mr Hogan appears, by the testimony of a number of his congregation, to be a man of good character, a popular preacher, and a diligent instructor of the young in the faith of the church. His zeal and good conduct were felt by his ghostly brethren as a reproach to them; the bishop became jealous of his popularity, and accordingly deposed, and deprived him of his living, without assigning any reason. But the congregation took their pastor's part, and would know why they were deprived of his acceptable and useful labours ; for even Papists in America will insist upon a why and a wherefore, with regard to things in which they are interested. The bishop was obliged to comply : he gave his reasons, and published them. I insert them here entire, as a literary curiosity, and as furnishing a fair specimen of the literature and taste of the Popish hierarchy in the most enlightened country in the world except our own :—

A Pastoral Charge, delivered by the Right Rev. Henry, Bishop of Philadelphia, February 11th, 1821.

My Beloved Children,

I thought this business was over, but I am sorry it is not, for indeed a very disagreeable business it is. In all the countries I travelled I never saw any business like it, but one, and that was in Ireland, in the place I myself came from; it happened in a town they call Drogheda, which I knew very well ; and indeed a very pious town it was, for religion was carried on there as devoutly as it was in any town I ever was in, even as devoutly as in Dublin itself. The business happened in the diocess of the primate of all Ireland, to whom I was vicar general for 24 years, and under whom I learned. The case was this. An unfortunate man like the present of the name of Brannegan, after being suspended, continued to discharge his duties, and the primate to save his flock from the jaws of the lion was put to the disagreeable necessity, (for of all the necessities in this world, that is the most disagreeable necessity of all,) well, the primate of all Ireland, as I said before, was put to this painful necessity of separating that unfortunate man from his flock.

I did not think I would be put to this disagreeable necessity with regard to this person, I thought he would leave this place and go elsewhere to follow the discharge of his duty. For when I suspended him, that is, when I withdrew his faculties, I did not mean a heavy punishment, for suspension is a light punishment, for it is medicinal, and I only meant to withdraw his faculties in my diocess of Philadelphia, and to let him go any where else, and that I would recommend him, though I could not nor ought not DOWNRIGHTLY recommend him. Well now, my children, when I, for reasons which I know myself from my conscience, was put to the very disagreeable necessity, (for indeed very disagreeable it is, as I said before,) I sent for this person, and in the presence of the Rev. Mr Kenny, Mr Hurly, and Mr Roloff, I ordered this person not to discharge any sacerdotal duty in my diocess of Philadelphia, and to go immediately and not to disturb my flock : I did not mean this, as I said before, to be a suspension, for he had full liberty to go any where else ; but he asked me was this a suspension, I desired him again to leave the city, but he forced me at last to tell him it was suspension, though as I said before, I only meant to withdraw his faculties in my diocess, and let him go any where else. Well, my children, this person then asked me what cause I had for suspending him : but I did not then like to give him the reasons, for they were only in my own conscience, and I thought to recommend him elsewhere as well as my conscience would allow me, for I could not downrightly recommend him, and did not wish for his sake to let the things be known that were in my conscience ; nor indeed, my children, I can't now without the most disagreeable feelings, for they are such shocking things, that I am ashamed to mention them, but as I perceive that this person is holding out and I am sure and I know he has bad advisers, I am, as I said before, put to the disagreeable necessity of letting you know some of my reasons, though it is a thing I never meant to do, for they can't
